DR. WATERMAN'S

RHEUMATIC AND STRENGTHENING PLASTER.

The peculiarities of this compound are owing to the immediate effects produced on the animal fibre, it being carried by the absorbants to the seat of disease or pain, without producing disagreeable sensations. As an external application it is a powerful auxiliary, and will cure, in all curable cases; such as acute and chronic Rheumatisms, Scrofulous Affections, weakness of back, pain in the side, head and limbs, affections of the Spine, &c. &c. &c.

This Plaster is warranted to be by far the best ever offered to the public—much superior to "Jew David, or Hebrew Plaster," and at less than half the price.

WINSLOW'S

BALSAM OF HOREHOUND.

An unparalleled remedy for common Colds, Coughs, Asthma, Influenza, Whooping Cough, Bronchitis, and all diseases of the Breast and Lungs, leading to Consumption; composed of the concentrated virtues of Horehound, Boneset, Blood Root, Liverwort, aad several other vegetable substances. Prepared only by J. M. WINSLOW, Rochester, N. Y.

The innocence and universally admitted pectoral virtues of the Herbs from which the BALSAM OF HOREHOUND is made, are too generally known to require recommendation; it is therefore only necessary to observe that the Medicine contains the whole of their Medicinal properties, highly concentrated, and so happily combined with several other vegetable substances, as to render it the most speedy, mild, and certain remedy, now in use, for the complaints above mentioned.

Thousands of testimonials will be shown, if wanted, at any time, placing the above medicines beyond reproach.

In conclusion he would only say, that he will not be under-sold on any article which he offers for sale.

POETRY.

The Dying Mother's Counsel to her Little Ones.

BY MRS. L. H. SIGOURNEY.

"Come Near, my little daughters,
And listen to my lore,
My parting words—for you must hear
My voice on earth no more:
Come nearer little daughters,
Your mother's eye grows dim;
God calleth me away from you;
I trust, I trust in him.

Oh, keep his holy Sabbath,
Revere his sacred Word,
And love the blessed Savior,
Our dear ascended Lord;
And cheer your lonely father,
When I am far away,
And run to meet him when he comes
Home at the close of day.

Watch o'er your baby-brother,
And soothe his infant fears,
And lull him in your loving arms,
And kiss away his tears;
And when his mind expandeth,
Like blossoms bright with dew,
Then teach his lisping tongue the prayer
That I have taught to you.

They'll cover me, my daughters,
With the fresh broken mould,
And you may plant a rose-tree there,
And see its buds unfold;
And when you breathe its fragrance,
Lift up the prayerful sigh,
That you may meet your mother dear,
In glory, when you die.

Farewell my darling children,
Once more my neck enfold."
And long upon their brows she prest
Her lips so white and cold,
And then a still and lifeless corpse
That fair young mother lay,
For to a blissful home in heaven
God summoned her away.

THOUGHTS ON PHYSIOLOGY.

ADDRESSED TO MOTHERS AND DAUGHTERS.

BY WILLIAM A. ALCOTT.

COMPRESSION OF THE CHEST.

I have spoken elsewhere of some of the evils which follow, in greater or less degree, from compression of the chest, especially to the bony system. I must, however, enter once more upon the painful subject, by repeating and extending my remarks.

When the lungs are compressed, the chyle is less perfectly changed in its color, and the blood is consequently less perfect in its character. Then the blood which has been carried round the system is less perfectly renovated, and goes back to the heart in this imperfect state. Its presence in an imperfect state, in the cavities of that citadel of life, soon causes more or less disturbance; which, added to the compression of the heart itself, is the source of a good deal of excitement. The heart and arteries beat faster, though with less force; as if it were in great haste to get the blood through the system, and get rid of it in some way.

But the system cannot get rid of it, at once. Round and round it goes, charged with bad or irritating particles which should have been cast off or changed in the lungs; and, as all parts of the system are to be built up from the blood, it follows that they must be built of imperfect materials. If this building up of bones, flesh, and vital organs themselves, from bad materials—if, after the lapse of an hour or two, the lungs were to be relieved, and the blood to be properly changed—the evil would be of little comparative consequence; but when we consider that the material is to continue the same, or worse, from day to day, and from year to year, well may we shudder at the consequences. To me, nothing shows in a more striking manner the forbearance of God, than the power which he has delegated to the human frame to withstand repeated and multiplied abuses. I wonder, often, when I think on the subject, that one person out of fifty, in the fashionable female world, should ever attain to old age. Nay, I wonder how any who compress their lungs can possibly do so.

For the evil does not end with diseased or irritated lungs, heart, and arteries, and with what may be called an inferior framework, (because built of inferior materials.) All the other vital organs soon participate in the suffering, and become involved in the wide-wasting instruction. When the lungs and heart are compressed, it often happens that the stomach and liver are, by the same means; and yet, if they escape actual compression by the dress, the struggling, half-convulsed diaphragm compresses them. The consequences are, imperfect digestion, imperfect chyme, imperfect chyle, and imperfect blood, together with irregular action of the liver; and, in the end, often, structural derangement of one or both of these organs.

When, however, the system becomes involved in suffering to the extent I have mentioned, the brain and nervous system fall into the same train of diseased action. And now, by means of nervous sympathy and otherwise, the diseases which were before slow in their progress, advance with fearful rapidity. Derangement of the bowels—constipation, especially—with tubercles of the mesenteric glands and of other parts—and perhaps, ere long, ulceration or schirrus, complete the frightful catalogue of Nature's penalties for the violation of her wise, salutary, but slighted laws.

Here let me say, that I received but yesterday a letter from a friend, in regard to the decease of a near friend of his, and a post mortem examination of her lungs, stomach, and other organs. For though the individual in question began the work of reformation very early, yet she did not begin it till she had either sown the seeds of extensive and deep-seated disease, or produced a state of things favorable to the rapid progress and development and fatal termination of severe or violent diseases, should they ever attack her! But I will proceed to make a few extracts from the letter itself:

"The liver and the digestive organs were almost the only sound organs in the body; and these organs, as well as the lungs and heart, were so imbedded and attached, that action seemed impossible."

Again, in another place, the writer speaks of the "cancer or mania which were threatened by the fungous tubercles in the brain, and the cancerous, almost suppurating tumors of the abdomen." In short, he calls the individual (so much a mass of disease was she) "a mere body of death."

Be it known, however, to all who are anxious to learn the truth on this subject, that there are few who compress the chest in early life, who, like the individual to whom I have referred, become, at the early age of twenty-five, emancipated—very few indeed. And still fewer is the number of those who escape to middle age with as little disease as the individual whose case I have described. She was peculiarly constituted to resist disease for a long time—though not, of course, for ever.

But not only all the vital organs become involved, as it were, in a general war against the lawful tenant of their abode: the skin also suffers. It is as impossible to have a good skin or a healthy complexion, when the lungs do not perform their wonted office, as it is for two and two to make five. Hence the cold skin, want of perspiration, cold extremities, head-ache, &c. &c.

I have not adverted, in this number, to the particular derangement and disease of one portion of the female system—induced by tight-lacing—because I would gladly be spared the task. The truth, here, has never yet been half told—I mean by our sex; nor do I know that it can be, by any individual. It is absolutely immeasurable.

And one of the worst features of the last-named sad condition of woman is, that though she has it in her power to do very much towards destroying herself and her posterity, yet it takes a long time to undo the mischief she has done. I should be surprised to find that five generations should bring up our race to the condition in which they were before the present generation began to abuse themselves: perhaps it will take much longer than even this.

I entreat the reader, once more, not to shrink from the truth on this great subject. Remember the thousands of the sinning and suffering all around, and endeavor to believe, for their sakes, if not for your own. Remember that, though no one acknowledges herself in fault in this matter, there is a dreadful responsibility somewhere: and wo to those who shut their eyes, for fear they shall discover it, either in themselves or their neighbors.

From Frazer's Magazine for May.

THE HAUNTS OF GENIUS.

There is a peculiar pleasure in tracing out for the first time the haunts of a favorite author, and nestling, as it were, in the private recesses of genius. It is a new-found delight that we can enjoy in secret, with something of the freshness and gladness of youth. To wander among scenes of inspiration seems a high and select privilege, that brings us into closer communion with the master-spirits whom we have loved and revered. An antique house in the country, a wood or tree, a green lane or hill-side, a murmuring river or brook, thus becomes an object of deep interest, and calls up a thousand associations. Not a leaf stirs, nor a flower blossoms, but awakens some train of thought and sentiment. The solitude is made populous with images of the past; and the busiest scenes of crowded cities are separated from the present, and to memory and imagination become silent as the desert.

A cynical observer may say that some portion of this fond idolatry arises from a lurking egotism or self-love. We appear to exalt our common nature by identifying ourselves with objects of general homage and admiration. A ray from the great temple seems to light on ourselves, humble worshipers. We are elated at discharging a duty or paying a debt due by all mankind. When Cicero found the tomb of Archimedes hid among briars and thorns, he was proud to tell the nobles of Syracuse that a man of Arpinum had pointed out to them the grave of their famous citizen. For the moment, he was elevated in their eyes by his temporary relationship to one still higher. It seems clear, however, that the effect of such literary pilgrimages must be as salutary and instructive as they are delightful. We are lifted into the region of intellect above the sphere of the senses; and are led to trace the steps by which genius shapes its course and achieves its triumphs. This is a wholesome corrective of inflated hopes, and a spur to generous ambition. Doubtless, there are worthless as well as ennobling emanations of high minds; but their number is not great, and they seldom excite permanent feelings of admiration. Vows are rarely made at such shrines. The world is ultimately just in its judgments; and, though men may for a time tolerate or applaud compositions that were better left unwritten, posterity drops them from her roll, and refuses to dwell on what is in its nature unworthy of immortality. Thus time is constantly performing a purifying as well as embalming process with the labors of genius.

To the general delight and gratification experienced by visiting poetical scenes, must be added the particular embodiment or revivification of the poet's fancies or creations. All that has been written or meditated on the spot seems present with us. An old stone can conjure up a host of life-like figures or abstractions as good as realities. The branch of a tree or the bubbling of a fountain is as potent as the wand of a magician. Every laurel-leaf at Vaucluse seems inscribed with the love-sonnets of Petrarch. On the banks of the Avon we seem to be attended by Ariel and a troop of spirits. Miranda, Viola, and Perdita gather flowers by the way-side; Rosalind roams the forest; Jacques moralizes to his "co-mates and brothers in exile" under an oak-tree; Prospero waves his rod; or the darker spirits of the Tragic Muse beckon from hill and cloud! We have more than once visited Thomson's house at the bottom of Kew-Lane, Richmond—a snug, wood-embowered nest; but we never saw it in a calm summer noon or evening, without half-expecting to meet a body of fays or elves rushing from the leaves and bushes, as from the airy portal of the Castle of Indolence. Who that has drunk of the genial stream of Chaucer—that morning-star of the English muse—can pass the Tabard Inn, Southwark, without recalling the gay and glorious troop of travelers,

> "Ready to wenden on their pilgrimage
> To Canterbury, with devoute corage!"

The knight that had warred with the heathen in Turkey—the yonng squire, with his curled locks—the fair prioress,

> "That of her smiling was full simple and coy"—

the monk, the friar, jolly franklin, red-faced sompnour, gentle pardoner, merry wife of Bath, and other personages of that living and speaking drama, seem all once more in motion, conjured up by the mere site of an ordinary tavern!

From the Youth's Cabinet.

ORIGINAL FOOD FOR MAN.

In speaking of fat, and its effects on the system, I quote from the Bible, as I wish it distinctly understood this Book is to be my guide in all my observations. I appeal to the Law and to the Testimony, for first principles.

Lev. iv. 17. "It shall be a perpetual statute for your generations, throughout all your generations, that ye eat neither fat nor blood."

Lev. vii. 23. "Ye shall eat no manner of fat; of ox, of sheep, or of goat."

Here we are strictly forbidden the use of fat as an article of diet, but it might be used in any other way if the animal had not been offered to the Lord; but if offered in sacrifice it could not be used, as the fat was the Lord's, and the soul that despised this command was to be cut off from among the people.

The use of fat meats is always prejudicial to health, and this is the physical reason why we should abstain from them.—Experience and research have both proved that fat is a great hindrance to digestion, and, as Rosenmuller remarks, is the source and fuel of the most difficult bilious and putrid diseases; and the very fact that enlightened physicians forbid their patients the use of fat or butter, whether in the form of pastry or otherwise, speaks plainly their views on this subject, as to the effect in stimulating the disease.

It is not only in disease we see their pernicious tendency, but, in what we are accustomed to call a state of health, the injurious effects on the skin are plainly discernible. Eruptions of the face and different parts of the body, boils, blotches, &c., are indicative of a greasy habit. Cutaneous diseases do not always arise from the use of fat; but they are generally induced by diet—for instance, the free use of salt, alcohol, &c. &c.

Fat individuals are generally persons of depraved appetites. I do not say of depraved character, but appetite They would not relish a pure vegetable repast, because so long accustomed to one so different. They are often persons of no decision of character. It is with difficulty you can awaken their ambition. David, in speaking of the wicked, says: "Their heart is as fat as grease"—meaning they were insensible to the dangers of their sinful course, as fat is supposed to be without feeling.

Scott says that "insensibility of heart to God's promises, threatenings, and judgments, and to the good of other men (which result from indulged luxury,) is aptly described by the similitude of fat."

Do not understand me to say that all fat persons use fat as diet. I know of many other fattening substances, even in the vegetable kingdom, but am only now stating what is the nature of fat as found in the animal economy.

Persons using much animal food or fat meats will, after death, decompose much sooner than those using a vegetable diet; and, if wounded, their flesh is much more difficult to heal. Indeed, it is the surest indication of perfect health, when our flesh heals readily—a proof which my little readers have, doubtless, too many opportunities of testing. John Burdell.

DON'T BE DISCOURAGED.

Don't be discouraged, if, in the outset of life, things do not go on smoothly. It seldom happens that the hopes which we cherish for the future are realized. The path of life, in the prospect, appears smooth and level; but, when we come to travel it, we find it all up hill, and generally rough enough. The journey is a laborious one; and, whether poor or wealthy, high or low, we shall find it to our disappointment, if we have built on any other calculation. To endure it with as much cheerfulness as possible, and to elbow our way through the great crowd, "hoping for little, yet striving much," is perhaps the best plan. But,

Don't be discouraged, if occasionally you slip down by the way, and your neighbor treads over you a little; or, in other words, don't let a failure or two dishearten you. Accidents will happen—miscalculations will sometimes be made—things will turn out differently from our expectations, and we may be sufferers. It is worth while to remember that fortune is like the skies in April, sometimes clear and favorable; and as it would be folly to despair of again seeing the sun, because to-day is stormy, so it is unwise to sink into despondency when fortune frowns, since, in the common course of things, she may surely be expected to smile and smile again.

Don't be discouraged, if you are deceived in the people of the world: they are rotten at the core. From such sources as these, you may be most unexpectedly deceived; and you naturally feel sore under such deceptions. But to these you must become used: if you fare as other people do, they will lose their novelty before you grow gray, and you will learn to trust men cautiously, and examine their character closely, before you allow them great opportunities to injure you.

Don't be discouraged under any circumstances. Go steadily forward. Rather consult your own conscience than the opinion of men, though the latter is not to be disregarded. Be industrious—be sober—be honest: dealing in perfect kindness with all who come in your way, exercising a neighborly and obliging spirit in your whole intercourse; and, if you do not prosper as rapidly now as some of your neighbors, depend upon it, you will be happy.—Monthly Repository.

Importance of Ventilated Apartments.—A man consumes or spoils more than one gallon of air in a minute: consequently all closely confined places must be very unwholesome. Candles and lamps become dim in public assemblies, and this is an indication of the impurity of the air. The perspiration from animal bodies is exceedingly injurious in a confined space.—"Three thousand human beings," observes Dr. Arbuthnot, "living within the space of an acre of ground, would make an atmosphere of their own steam about seventy-one feet high, which, if not carried away by winds, would become pestiferous in a moment." Dressed food, both animal and vegetable, pollutes the atmosphere; consequently, a room is very insalubrious after it has been used for the purpose of dining. Dr. Priestley, on one occasion, corked up a bottle of air of this kind, and found that it was deprived of a considerable portion of oxygen. Every room ought to be completely purified, by the opening of the door and windows, at least once in the day. A close bed-room is extremely unwholesome; neither ought the bed to be surrounded with curtains. Many persons have a habit of sleeping with the curtains drawn entirely around the bed: no practice can be more injurious. The fire-place should never be stopped up by chimney-boards; but, in damp and very cold weather, a fire is essential to health, care being taken that the room is not over-heated. Many dangerous colds are caught by those whose lungs are delicate, by changing the atmosphere of a warm and dry sitting-room for that of a damp and cool chamber. Such transitions are injurious even to the robust, and often fatal to the weak and delicate.

Woman.—The right education of this sex is of the utmost importance to human life. There is nothing that is more desirable for the common good of all the world, since, as mothers and mistresses of families, they have for some time the care of the education of their children of both sexes, they are entrusted with that which is of the greatest consequence to human life.

As the health and strength or weakness of our bodies is very much owing to their methods of treating us when we were young, so the soundness or folly of our minds is not less owing to their first tempers and ways of thinking, which we eagerly received from the love, tenderness, authority, and constant conversation of our mothers.

As we call our first language our mother tongue, so we may as justly call our first tempers mother-tempers; and perhaps it may be found more easy to forget the language than to part entirely with those tempers we learned in the nursery.

It is therefore to be lamented that the sex on whom so much depends—who have the first forming of our bodies and minds, are not only educated in pride, but in the silliest and most contemptible part of it.

Girls are indulged in great vanity, and mankind seem to consider them in no other view than as so many painted idols, who are to allure and gratify their passions.—Lady's Book.

Bronchitis: its Cause.—A writer in the March number of the American Repertory makes the following remarks respecting Bronchitis, and we do not know but his inference may be to a great extent correct:

"Various causes have been assigned for this disease, such as the use of anthracite coal, wearing cravats, constrained posture in public prayer, speaking in basements or other damp or ill-ventilated places, reading the funeral service with the head uncovered, &c.; but the chief cause, in our opinion, is exercising the vocal organs disproportionately to the rest of the body. Were the whole system hardened by systematic exercise, we should rarely meet with Bronchitis, caused by the ordinary efforts of public speaking. We seldom observe this affection among the itinerant Methodist clergy, whose active habits of life tend to invigorate the corporeal powers; nor was it known in former times, when clergymen were obliged to devote a portion of their time to the cultivation of the soil. It is by no means strange that the vocal apparatus, the most delicate and irritable structure in the body, should give way under the excessive task often laid upon it, when there is a general debility and want of tone in the whole muscular tissues."

Female Education.—Women, such is their unfortunate style of education, hazard every thing upon one cast of the dye: when youth is gone, art is gone. No human creature gives his admiration for nothing: either the eye must be charmed, or the understanding gratified. A woman must talk wisely or look well. Every human being must put up with the coldest civility, who has neither the charms of youth nor the wisdom of age. Neither is there the slightest commiseration for decayed accomplishments: no man mourns over the fragments of a dancer, or drops a tear on the relics of musical skill.

Infatuation.—A physician in Albany says: "We read a heart-sickening account of the decease of a fine and amiable young lady, who fell a victim to fashion—she laced herself to death! Apart from the prevailing infatuation which leads females to commit elegant and refined suicide, she is said to have been an uncommonly intelligent and accomplished girl. The body presented a dreadful sight. The ribs were contracted to within their natural circumference, and the shoulder-blades were actually lapped over each other! The chest was of course extremely narrow, and not half the natural room was left for the action of the heart, and the inspiration of air into the lungs. The consequence was death!"

MANURING GROUND.

If you would have sound and large crops, put on the manure liberally. Don't think to cheat mother earth with the appearance of granting her an ample allowance of the food for plants; for she will tell the truth and the whole story in the proper season.

There is not, generally, care enough taken, when applying manure to the earth, to mix it well with the soil. All the lumps, both of manure and of earth, should be broken finely up, and the soil stirred till the whole is mixed intimately together.—Roots do not want to find a large lump of hard manure, of the size of a man's head, in one place—a lump which they can hardly penetrate, and which may be strong enough to kill the roots as they approach it—and then have to travel over a square yard of unmanured soil, getting no nutriment by the way, before they find another undigestible lump of rank food. The food of plants should be as well broken up and mixed before it can go into the bodies of vegetables, as the food of animals is after mastication. We repeat, therefore, mix the manure well and equally with the soil, if you would give your plants the best chance.

We said, put on the manure liberally; but we did not say, put it on extravagantly or prodigally.

There is such a thing as giving the earth too much, and creating a surfeit for the plants. By this means, vegetation is as much injured as is the friend whom you would treat hospitably when you force him to eat too hearty food, or too much of it. The best plan is to give the soil just as much as the crop you put on it can and will eat up in the course of the season, leaving the earth, in autumn, in about the same state for richness that it was in when you began upon it in spring. When manure, beyond what the plants can take up in one season, is applied to and left on the ground, that portion becomes inert and dead, doing more hurt than good, because it produces a gangrenous state of soil, which will greatly injure the crop the next year. It is for this reason that old gardens, that have been long and extravagantly enriched, will not produce good potatoes and beets. They will be warty and wormy, from this cause. Keep the ground just lively and healthy, by applying as much manure as the plants, which work hard all summer growing, can eat up and convert into seed; but be careful to apply no more. At least, we have always found this to be the best system.—Maine Cultivator.

The Cow.—One of the most useful and valuable of all animals, is the cow. Perhaps there is none, in a large part of the world, that contributes so essentially to the comfort of mankind, as the cow; and certainly there is none that better repays what care and attention are given to them by the own. Milk, in many respects, is one of the most indispensable articles of food; and by far the largest quantity, in nearly all countries, used for human sustenance, is obtained from this animal. The cow is in prime condition for milk, from four or five years of age to eight or nine, though many of them retain all their valuable milking qualities to a much later period. In all temperate climates, the cow and her products of milk, butter, cheese, and beef, constitute one of the most important items in the profits of agriculture. By paying attention to the breeding of the cow, with reference to her milking qualities, they have been greatly improved in this respect; though, as a general rule, the tendency to be a great milker is found to be incompatible with that of great size and ready fattening. We much question whether instances among our native breeds of cows cannot be found, which fully rival, in quantity and quality, the best milkers of the improved breeds; but the difficulty in such cases lies in the fact, that the heifers from such cows do not always partake of the milking qualities of the parent, while those which have been bred with reference to this point rarely depart from it. Some of the finest dairies in the United States, and perhaps which exhibit as great product, in proportion to the number of cows kept, as any dairies in the world, may be found in the western part of Massachusetts and the northern part of Connecticut, in the counties of Berkshire and Litchfield. The quality of the products of the dairy depends, in a great measure on the sweetness and purity of the herbage on which they feed; and the fine clovers and grasses of elevated pastures are better for milk than the coarser and more luxuriant herbage of lower and richer lands.

The Progress of Science in connection with the Advancement of Civilization.

A LECTURE, delivered before the "Quæsitor Scientia Society" of De Ruyter Institute.

BY J. A. BADGER.

As an inducement to constant and continued perseverance in any pursuit, it is well to take, occasionally, a retrospective glance at the benefits already obtained in such pursuit, as well as a prospective view of the advantages yet to be derived. I have, therefore, chosen for my subject,—the Progress of Science in connection with the Advancement of Civilization. The terms Science and Civilization, I wish to be understood in their most extensive signification; the latter as comprehending all those particulars which constitute the specific difference between the most truly refined society, and a state of abject barbarism; the former as especially embracing the following specifications, viz: Grammar, Rhetoric, Music, Arithmetic, Geometry, and Philosophy; which last properly includes, Physics, or Natural Philosophy, Metaphysics, or Intellectual Philosophy, Ethics, or Moral Philosophy, and Theology, or the Philosophy which treats of the Supreme Being.

In prosecuting this subject, it may be necessary to take a cursory view of mankind in a savage state, or in the earlier ages of the world, while they were yet ignorant of those principles in science which have, in later times, been applied to their benefit.

Extreme rudeness in every respect characterized the early ages of the world. Men, in those times, were rude in their language and habits of thought; rude in their manners; rude in their dress; and rude in their dwellings, and in their methods for subsistence. As society is never stationary, but is either on the advance or the retrograde, (or, perchance, both, if viewed from different points,) we see during successive ages mankind improving in some respects, but sinking lower and lower continually in others. While the good schoolmaster experience gave him instruction in some of those arts which tend to improve his physical condition, the darkness of his mind, on the other hand, ten-fold worse than the night which hovered over Egypt and her devoted king, became almost impenetrable, and almost completely obscured the great fountains of happiness. Tracing his history along from century to century, we see him, at length, groping in the deepest ignorance, the victim of the most degrading superstition. His ideas of a Supreme Being were exceedingly defective. Possessing no certain knowledge on this point, but being intuitively convinced that the world was made, and regulated, and governed by the agency of superior beings, borne on the wings of imagination, he made for himself a host of gods and demi-gods, both supernal and infernal, and to these he yielded the homage of his heart. To these he offered frequent sacrifices to gain the favor of the one, and appease the wrath of the other. Yea! for this purpose, not unfrequently, human victims were immolated upon the altars of the infernal deities!

These gods were represented as being actuated by the most malevolent passions which can disgrace the soul of an intelligent being; such as hatred, envy, jealousy, and revenge. Dissensions and feuds were represented as common occurrences among them. Above the concave vault of the sky was located the heaven, the abode of the superior gods. This was described as the scene of little else than revelry, riot, and gross debauchery. In order to afford you a specimen of the heathen description of heaven, I have selected a passage from the Mythological writings of Lucian, which I present to you in an English dress.

"Heaven upon the outer side is formed of brass. To one who has ascended the celestial heights, the light appears of transcendent brilliancy; the sun, and the stars shine with exceeding splendor; and the floor of the place is glittering gold. When one has entered in, he first arrives where the Houries dwell; for they are the appointed keepers of the gate. Next he meets with Iris and Mercury, who are the servants and messengers of Jupiter, the king. The next object that meets his eye, is the smith shop of Vulcan, which abounds with every specimen of art. And next to this appear the houses of the gods, and the palace of Jupiter, richly adorned with the workmanship of Vulcan. Here, the gods, together with their king recline, and feast themselves upon nectarine drink, and ambrosial food. Once, the men Ixion and Tantalus ate and drank with them; but having become insolent and loquacious, they now are punished, and heaven is inaccessible to the race of mortals." And to finish the story of Ixion and Tantalus from the Roman poets, the former was fastened to a wheel which kept continually revolving; and the latter, hungry and thirsty, was placed up to his chin in a pool of water, with bunches of golden fruit hanging just before him. If he stretched forth his hand to pluck the proffered boon, a gentle gale would waft them beyond his reach. If he inclined his head to drink of the surrounding water, it instantly flowed away. Says Horace:

> Thirsty Tantalus ope'd his parched lips,
> And longed to drink from the retreating wave

Such were the degrading notions to which men yielded their asent in the days of Homer, and of Socrates; of Plato, and of Aristotle. And it is affecting to behold many of the writers of antiquity striving to free themselves from the conceptions of Materialism, and then bending beneath the burden imposed upon them by a childish Mythology. But, passing the boundary from ancient to modern times, when the light which dawned at the Christian era had again set in darkness, we behold mankind sunk again in degradation, deeper than ever before, (if deeper might be possible.) Superstition had again fastened her treple bands around the human intellect, and with her withering touch had marred the fair face of nature, and had transformed earth's flowery fields, which were intended for the benefit and enjoyment of the human family, into an arena for malevolent demons; into play-grounds for fairies, and genii, and spirits of another world.

The conjurer's budget and the magician's wand were omnipotent in their influence upon society; and by these, princes ruled, and kings swayed the sceptre over nations. The writings of these times abound in accounts of pretended miracles; of enchantments, demonology, and witchcraft. This picture, though but a faint sketch, with imperfect outlines, is indeed truly revolting; but if thus the picture, what must the reality have been?

It cannot be denied, that minds, beaming with the light of intelligence and truth, occasionally arose, during the periods to which I have referred; but their light was too feeble to penetrate the surrounding darkness. The glorious luminary of truth, which dawned at the Christian era, continued to shine through many obscurities for four or five centuries, and with greatly diminished splendor, even longer. But ignorance, not the mother of devotion as it has been contemptuously asserted, but the antagonist of Christianity, yet lingered upon the earth; and, at length, it completely eclipsed the only ray that could direct man's steps in the path of happiness.

Such as I have described, is an imperfect view of the state of society previous to the revival, or (with greater propriety,) the origination of learning, which, perhaps, should be dated at about the 15th century. But now seems to have arrived the time which was to usher in that series of events which are destined, ultimately, to renovate the world. The Art of Printing had just now began to illuminate mankind. The power of the Papal Church, which had always been arrayed against the progress of Science, and of liberal principles, now began to totter to its base. The Magnetic Needle about this time began to be applied to the Art of Navigation; and, by its aid, the immortal Columbus steered his course across the unknown and pathless ocean; and laid open to the world a new continent with its exhaustless resources. But, in another respect, this was one of the most important epochs in the history of demonstrative Philosophy. The science of Astronomy now received a mighty impulse from the hand of Nicolaus Copernicus. The Ptolemaic, which, previous to this time, had been the prevailing system of Astronomy, supposed the earth to be a quiescent body placed in the middle of the Universe, around which all other bodies continually revolved. To explain the phenomena of the heavens, the advocates of this system were obliged to use cycles and epi-cycles; circles, deferents, and chrystaline spheres. But, by the aid of all these, the Ptolemaic philosophers were unable to unravel all the intricacies of planetary motion. And every new discovery throwed new obstacles in the way of the completion of that complex system. But, before the masterly mind of Copernicus these complicated works all vanished into smoke. With a mighty hand he made the sun stand still, and set the earth, with her sisterhood of planets in motion through the regions of empty space; and, thus, made that science which had been too complicated to admit of entire explanation, even by a philosopher, so simple as to be within the comprehension of the most untutored child of nature. The question may now be properly asked, what particular benefit has accrued to the world from this increase in knowledge? I reply, all that elevates the most refined society of the present day above the most barbarous tribes, is the direct result of scientific investigations.

In the enumeration, which I made at the commencement of this Lecture, of the different specifications included in the term Science, I mentioned Grammar, and Rhetoric, or the Science of Language. Now a knowledge of this Science is important only so far as it is the medium for transmitting knowledge of a more permanent character. Language, in itself, has no intrinsic value; nor does it alone bestow any advantage upon him that is versed in it. Had I a knowledge of all the languages under heaven, with no other knowledge beside, I should be like the "sounding brass," or like the babbling parrot that ignorantly mocks the words of its keeper. But if it be borne in mind that words are the vocal signs of ideas which are themselves the elements of knowledge, then the acquisition of language becomes of the first importance; since, in the nature of things, but little knowledge can be obtained by personal observation, but it must be derived almost entirely from testimony. And if this view of the subject be correct, it must entirely overthrow the opinion that has gained ground so extensively for the last few years, that all the time that is spent in the acquisition of languages is a total loss. The fact in the case is, an individual, while acquiring languages, is furnishing himself with the keys to the vast storehouse of knowledge, and is preparing to avail himself of the united labors of others who have trod the ground before him. He is using the only possible means to alleviate the curse entailed upon the human family, when the sons of men, on the plains of Shinar, raised an impious hand to build a tower to heaven. When, however, the acquisition of language becomes an end, rather than a means for promoting more important ends, it becomes subversive of the primary design of philological pursuits, and should then be discountenanced.

Music, again, was specified as one of the subdivisions of Science. I believe that the pursuit of the practice, and, as a subsidiary step, the theory of music has an important influence upon the refinement of society. It has a charm which can control the ferocious passions of the soul, and touch the tender fibres of the heart though it be bound with chains of perpetual adamant. When Saul, the king of Israel, was tormented by an evil spirit, if the sweet David played upon his harp, "the king was refreshed, and the evil spirit departed from him." An eminent clergyman of New England, who had a large family of daughters, who were exceedingly amiable, and gentle, and lovely in their dispositions, was interrogated as to the secret of his great success in thus training up his numerous family. He replied, "that in their early days he had taught them the practice of music; that whenever he saw one angry he would tell her, come, sit down by me and sing! That if he saw another fretful and ill-humored, he would tell her, sing! If he saw a third obstinate and disobedient, he would tell her, sing!" Thus, if there was any secret in his success, this was the explanation. In this point of view, then, that branch, which has been regarded as a mere polite accomplishment, becomes of the first importance. It may be asked why, if music has such a subduing influence over the passions, it is employed upon the battle-field to urge an infuriated army to the fierce onset, and to the deadly slaughter? My reply is, the beating of drums, the sound of the fife and the clarion is far different from the soft tones that blend in perfect harmony, and fall upon the ear like gentle zephyrs; that while the latter has the power to soften and subdue, the former may have the contrary effect. And I submit it to the consideration of the observer of human nature, whether the power of unharmonious and discordant sounds, to excite and arouse the passions, is not proportionate to the power of soft and gentle music to subdue and calm them. But, to the notes of melody should be united the flowing numbers of poetry; of poetry fraught with the richest stores of wisdom; of poetry that breathes the atmosphere of heaven.

Again, Arithmetic and Geometry were specified as being embraced in the subdivisions of Science. These constitute the foundation of all the demonstrated principles in Natural Philosophy. By Arithmetic is meant the various methods employed for performing calculations, or of finding required results from given data, or known conditions; whether this be done by means of numbers, or by the use of certain symbols used as the representatives of certain numbers. By Geometry is meant that branch of Science which treats of magnitudes, such as lines, surfaces, and solids; in which the relations between the different parts of any magnitude, are established by a process of reasoning, in which the magnitude itself is presented to the eye: and these relations, which are true for a particular case, are true for all similar cases. The importance of these branches is two-fold; first, on account of their intimate connection with every true principle in Physical Science, which precludes the possibility of gaining a thorough knowledge of the one, without having a previous knowledge of the other. And, secondly, on account of the invigorating influence which they exert upon the mind when they are attentively pursued, fitting it for undertaking an extensive investigation of the laws which govern the material world. Had it not been for a thorough knowledge of the Mathematics, Copernicus, and Galileo, Kepler, and Newton could never have made, and demonstrated the truth of those surprising discoveries upon which rests the immortality of their fame.

I come now to speak of the effects that have been produced upon society by Philosophical investigations. Physical Philosophy has developed many of the exhaustless resources which nature has provided for promoting the comfort and happiness of mankind. As a tender, foster-mother, she has exercised her maternal care over every department of the Arts. The Agriculturist, the Mechanic, and the Manufacturer are under infinite obligations to her, for the instructions she has given them in their respective avocations. She has smoothed the asperities of nature; brought the high places low, and made the crooked places straight. She has revealed many of the simple elements of matter; and then arising in her majesty has tamed the lightnings of heaven. The fierce lion, which roars in the dark tempest, in her presence is transformed into the gentle lamb. She has disclosed an unerring and never-failing guide across the pathless ocean. Though clouds, fogs, and raging storms obscure the sun by day, and the stars by night, the little magnet, faithful to its trust, points out to him the direction to the pole star.—Though a tempest may have thrown him upon an unexplored and untrodden shore, or driven him into unknown seas, this kind mother has placed in his hand a little instrument, by which, when the stars are visible in the nightly firmament, he can determine his true position upon the surface of the globe. But the obligations which the Art of Navigation owes to Philosophy, stop not here. She has furnished a propelling force beyond, I had almost said, the power of numbers to compute. The subtle, but elastic vapor is made to propel, with an almost inconceivable velocity, the ponderous wheels which no muscular force could move. Contrast the fleet of Æneas, as it coasted along from Troy in quest of the shores of Italy, experiencing many reverses and misfortunes, and occupying ten years in making the voyage—with the British Queen as she proudly rides upon the foaming waves, "belching fire and steam at every heave"—bearing in her bosom a greater cargo than the twenty ships of the Trojan emigrant, and crossing the wide Atlantic in less than a score of days. Philosophy has, indeed, made the trackless ocean the highway of nations; and conquered time and distance, so that nations, separated by the half circumference of the globe, may carry on the most familiar intercourse.

Again, Natural Philosophy, or that branch of it called Celestial Mechanics, unfolds, as I have before hinted, the true arrangement of the solar system. It has demonstrated, in regard to most of the planets, that they are worlds which, like our own, revolve upon their axes, producing the change of day and night, and revolve in orbits around the sun, with axes inclined to the plane of their orbits, thus producing the variations in the seasons. These, in their general arrangement, appear to be fitted for the abodes of intelligent beings; and since it appears to be inconsistent with the character and perfections of the Great Creator, that he should make such arrangements without any design, or with a design not proportionate to his arrangements, the presumptive argument amounts to a moral demonstration, that these vast worlds, some of which are a thousand times larger than our own, are the abodes of rational beings, capable of contemplating the works, and adoring the perfections of their Almighty Creator. But, still further; the Astronomer's eye has penetrated beyond the bounds of the solar system, and contemplated the arrangements that belong to worlds far off in empty space. The same order, the same regularity appear to exist so far as his eye has reached. He sees suns revolving in ample orbits around other suns, and all the stars within the reach of human ken appear to revolve around a common centre. The study of Astronomy tends to induce the most sublime conceptions of the extent and arrangements of the universe, and of the perfections and attributes of the Deity. It imparts energy, and life, and vigor to the intellectual faculties, and dissipates the superstitious fears and notions which have so long held the mind of men in the most galling captivity. The time is not far in the past when an eclipse of the sun, or moon, or the appearance of a comet was regarded as an indication of the wrath of the gods, and the premonition of famine, pestilence, or war; and they were never seen but with terror and amazement. You may, indeed, wonder that the most interesting phenomena in nature should thus become objects of alarm and terror. But the surprise you feel shows you the extent of the obligations you are under to Science for the light she has benignly shed upon you. Had you been born in other times, you would, in all probability, have been the subjects of the same fell-tyrant to which others have been. Had you received your existence in a land covered with the thick darkness of ignorance, her inseperable companion, superstition, might have thrown around you her horrid chains, and dragged you to her gloomy prison house, to linger out a miserable existence in misery and despair.

With pleasure to myself I could lengthily expatiate on these, and other topics connected with the general subject, to several of which I have only hinted. But I have already transcended the bounds I had in view at the commencement; but, young gentlemen, a broad field is open before you. A rich harvest of intellectual and moral treasure is waiting to reward the labor of your hands. All that elevates your condition above the condition of those that lived in former ages has been gathered from this field. With vigilance, begin and carry on the work before the day is past, and rich will be your reward.

THE FIRST LOVE.

This sweet and delightful state, is generally experienced in the early period of conversion. Under the almighty influence of the Spirit of God, the delusions that had obscured the barrenness of our heart, gradually melt away like snow. It rends the veil of self-deception; and, before we are aware, our entire destitution of peace and joy is presented to our view, though we had till then deemed ourselves full and in need of nothing. We feel voids that must be filled up, and spiritual wants that must be satisfied. We find it is not with us as it should be, and we become deeply impressed with the necessity of a change. Words and actions, sentiments and pursuits, which have hitherto appeared correct and good, begin to disturb us; and we feel an inward gnawing, like the worm that dieth not, and the fire that is not quenched. Then we run to and fro to seek a cure, and how we may still the raging thirst of the soul. But this world is not Gilead, and its reliefs, counsels, and consolations are broken cisterns, that can hold no water. The stronger this feeling becomes, the greater our depression and grief; till at length there is an end of all joy, the sluices of sorrow are opened, and laughing is turned into weeping. The Spirit breathes upon the soul; the icy bands of natural pride and impenitence begin to fall asunder, and the sinner beholds his misery divested of every covering. Where now shall he look for help? Behold even here the work of grace; a Hand in the cloud which guides securely and never leads astray. He comes to Jesus, sighs and implores for mercy; and and having received an answer in his soul, that sweet season commences, when, like the Bride, he has the Lord upon his couch. How delightful his sensations! What is life compared with the miserable existence afforded by the world? Let us call to mind our experience, when our spiritual affections possessed their early freshness. We could then, like children, shed tears of joyful emotion, as often as we perused the scriptures, or reflected on the faithfulness of the Lord, on his word and history. How great was then our joy, when we heard his name preached, and his people bear testimony to his faithfulness? With what ardor we were filled when his praises were sung: with what fervor we prayed, with what necessity, with what desire and love? How strongly we were then inclined to speak of him, and thought to convert the world at once, and to proclaim his name from the house-tops, and in the streets! Then we gloried in difficulties, that we might overcome them in the strength of the Lord; and we sought for living stones, wherewith speedily to erect a temple to our God. How incomprehensible it appears to us, that other Christians were so still, so calm and composed; that they did not participate in the fulness of our joy, or join in our triumphal complaints, while we imagined that with sighing and complaining we had done forever! Do you still recollect this time? Then, in this sense, in which the Bride in the text meant it, we had the Lord upon our couch.—Krummacher's Solomon.

TO-MORROW.

Who can tell how much is embraced in this expression? Though a few hours intervene between it and us—though it will soon commence its course—who is there that can read its single page and pronounce the character of its events?

Those who are now on the mountain summit may be in the valley. That rosy cheek may be overspread with paleness—the strong step may falter. DEATH may have overtaken us.

To-morrow! It may entirely change the course of our lives. It may form a new era in our existence. What we fear may not happen.

To-morrow! away with anxiety. Let us lean on Providence. There is a Being to whom all the destructions of time are the same, and who is able to dispose every thing for our wise improvement.

DEATH.—The following sublime effusion, which we do not remember to have read before, and with the authority of which we are entirely unacquainted, chanced to fall into our hands a day or two since, among other relics of a deceased friend. A fine imagination is blended with a fervent piety, in reflections like these:

"Heavens! what a moment must be that, when the last flutter expires on our lips! What a change! Tell me, ye who are deepest read in nature and in God, to what new worlds are we borne? What new being do we receive?—Whither hath that spark, that unseen, that uncomprehended intelligence fled? Look upon the cold, livid, ghastly corpse that lies before you!—That was but a shell, a gross and earthly covering, which held for a while the immortal essence that has now left it—left it, to range, perhaps, through illimitable space; to receive new capacities of delight, new powers of perception, new glories of beatitude! Ten thousand fancies rush upon the mind as it contemplates the awful moment between life and death! It is a moment big with imagination's greatest hopes and fears; it is the consummation that clears up all mystery—resolves all doubt—which removes contradiction and destroys error. Great God! what a flood of rapture may at once burst upon the departed soul. The unclouded brightness of the celestial regions—the pure existence of ethereal being—the solemn secrets of nature may then be divulged; the immediate unity of the past, the present and the future; strains of unimaginable harmony, forms of imperishable beauty, may then suddenly disclose themselves, bursting upon the delighted sense and bathing them in measureless bliss! The mind is lost in the excess of wondrous light, and dare not turn from the heavenly vision to one so gloomy, so tremendous as the department of the wicked! Human fancy shrinks back appalled.

CHRISTIANITY.—Some men love the Christian religion for its poetry, others for its philosophy, and others for its sublime morality. And it is full of the truest poetry, breathing in strains of majesty, of love, of joy, from the throne of God, from the cross on Cavalry, from the church of the redeemed. And it is the noblest philosophy, revealing truths unknown to ancient sages, and grand principles which they could not discover. And it teaches a morality which outshine the purest code that human virtue and wisdom have ever devised—to which every intellect, and every heart involuntarily does homage. But the penitent sinner loves it because it is to him the gospel, the glad tidings of salvation, and its excellence is summed up in those precious words—"God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish but have everlasting life. And the poor and lowly disciple loves it, for it tells him of a never-failing treasure laid up for him in heaven. The widow and the fatherless love it; for it conducts them to the best of Fathers and of Friends. And the tried and sorrowful disciple hears there a sweet voice which says "Come unto me all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest."—Ohio Obs.

Almost all our desires are apt to wander into an improper course; to direct them properly requires care; but that care will render us safe and happy through life.

How rapidly should we forgive those who offend us, if we consider how much our heavenly Father has forgiven us!

That time is partly lost, which could have been better employed.

Association Minutes, &c.

The Minutes of the Central Association are ready for distribution. The Circular and Corresponding Letters may be found in this week's paper. The session was characterised with great harmony and good feeling, and to us, it was profitable and pleasant to be there. These yearly convocations of the churches are a feast to the soul. They serve to bind the affections stronger to each other, and to the institutions of Christ's church, and nerve up the energies to greater effort in the cause of truth. We could wish that all of our brethren might oftener be brought under such influence, being confident the tendency would be to give life and efficiency to our institutions, at the same time that it warmed and made glad the heart.

Ordination.—During the session of the Association, Br. Elihu Robinson, of Newport, was regularly set apart to the work of the gospel ministry. The examination was in the highest degree satisfactory, and the exercises were accompanied with much interest and solemnity.

Post-Office.—The Post Office in this village is removed to the "Bar-Room" of Martin Spear, who has been appointed Post Master; vice George Sears, removed.

Alteration.—We propose in a few weeks to alter the publication of the Register to an earlier day in the week, so that nearly all of our subscribers can get them before the Sabbath.

Irregularity.—Some of our subscribers complain that they do not receive the Register regularly. The fault must be with the Post Masters, as we are very careful to have them all mailed regularly one day at least before the day of publication.

Churches Organized.—A S. D. Baptist Church was organized at Hounsfield, Jefferson co., N. Y., on the 3d inst., consisting of 49 members. Also, one at Watson, Lewis co., on the 23d ult., consisting of 36 members.

These Churches, by unanimous votes, became members of the Central Association, at its session in Adams.

James R. Irish.

The article over this signature was published during our absence to attend the Association. We wish, however, simply to remark relative to it, that he has misjudged as to the authorship of "Spectator."

☞ We omit our usual quantity of Editorial this week, to make room for communications.

Revolutionary Men---Fourth of July.

I fully concur with the suggestion of "A Christian Patriot," viz: That, in arrangements for the celebration of the Nation's Birth-day, 'we pay special attention to our thousands of children and youth, and to our few remaining Revolutionary Soldiers. These men will be with us but a little time longer. We must search them out. Last year, we had but one man of the Revolution to lead the long procession of youth: he yet remains among us, and we hope to meet him on the approaching celebration—and we must see to it that all others in this vicinity, who, with him, toiled to gain what we now enjoy, shall have place in the procession; if any of them are too infirm to walk, let them ride. How interesting it will be to contrast age and youth; the remnant of the honored fathers of the American Revolution, leading the smiling throng of American youth! What scene can more deeply interest ALL classes of this Republican community?

The Celebration of National Independence.

"Thou shalt rejoice in thy feast, thou, and thy son, and thy daughter, and thy man servant, and thy maid servant, and the Levite, the stranger, and the fatherless, and the widow, that are within thy gates."

Mr. Editor, Sir.—The spirit and tendency of the Bible, throughout democratic, is never more unequivocally brought to view, than in the regulation of the national feasts of the Jews. In the passage just referred to, we see it enjoining upon that whole people, to mingle together without distinction of rank, or circumstance, sex, or age, in celebrating the goodness of Jehovah. Here, the rich and the poor meet together, the Lord is the maker of them all.

Had a mode of celebrating the independence of this Republic, been suggested by those who framed the Declaration, and put forth every energy to secure the blessings which it claims as the inalienable rights of man, they could not have presented a plan more in accordance with the truth so nobly embodied in that Declaration, "that God hath made of one blood, all nations of men to dwell on all the face of the earth."

This plan of celebration, has, in more or less of its features, been carried out in the length and breadth of our land, and from its unison with the purest feelings of our nature, and its pre-eminently social character, will assuredly, in the end, prevail over every other; and, as it is designed to be carried out to its full extent at the approaching celebration in this village, I trust the community will rejoice in the opportunity of uniting to give it full effect.

But, if the poor as well as the rich are to be embraced, the inquiry will arise, how are the entertainments to be provided? The only way in which this can be done, is by subscription. In this way, the whole will be upon an equality, and together "eat the fat and drink the sweet, portions being provided for such as are not able, for it is a day of rejoicing before the Lord; neither should the heart of any be sad." This part of the subject, must, if we are suitably to enjoy the occasion, receive prompt consideration. It would not be just that the inhabitants of this village should, alone, defray the expense of furnishing the entertainments. Our farmers, in good circumstances, ought to aid in this matter. Doubtless all who attend, or whose families attend, and who are able, will contribute in proportion to the entertainments anticipated; but the thought I wish clearly to convey, is, that we all ought also to consider our less favored neighbors, and "provide a portion for them for whom nothing is prepared, that all may rejoice together"; or, in other words, give a little more than may be necessary for our own entertainment, to provide for those who are not able to pay enough.

In this celebration, there is no sinister end to be obtained. The great objects in view, are the suitable expression of gratitude to God for the blessings we enjoy under our free and independent Government—to keep alive in the breast of community a sense of these obligations, and the correspondent obligations imposed upon us as a people, and to imbue the rising generation with the temper and spirit of our institutions.

I have had the pleasure of celebrating three successive anniversaries of our National Independence with this community, though not as a citizen of this Republic; but on this occasion, I congratulate myself that I can unite with them in that character, and, permit me to add, that it is the warm desire of my heart that this entire community may mingle together on every returning anniversary, to commemorate the occasion on which it was announced to the world, that the political maxim which was to be the foundation of this Republic, was, "that all men are created free and equal."

Yours respectfully,
WM. D. COCHRAN.

Religious Discussion.

For the Register.

Reasons for not embracing the doctrine of the Trinity.

NO. VIII.

Mr. Editor.—I will next examine the argument for the Supreme Deity of Christ, founded on the rendering of worship to him. It may be stated thus: God only is the object of religious worship; and as worship is expressly required to be given to Jesus Christ, it proves him to be the Supreme God.

This argument assumes the principle that there is no distinction between supreme and subordinate worship; whereas, it appears clear that there is such a distinction. Worship is modified by the nature of the object toward which it is rendered, just as service or obedience is. The text commonly adduced to prove that there is no such distinction as now stated, and that Christ cannot be properly worshiped, unless he be the Supreme God, is Matt. iv. 10.—"It is written, thou shalt worship the Lord thy God, and him only shalt thou serve." But this passage as positively restricts service, or obedience to God, as it does worship. Hence, upon the principle contained in the argument, no service is to be rendered to kings, governors, parents, or masters, which would be contradicting the express testimony of the scriptures, which requires us to obey magistrates, parents and masters. The true state of the case is that service, or obedience is modified by the nature of the being to whom it is rendered. Or, in other terms, there is a distinction between supreme and subordinate obedience. And just such a distinction there is between supreme and subordinate worship. Thus we are told that "all the congregation of Israel blessed the Lord God of their fathers, and bowed down their heads and worshiped the Lord and the king." 1 Chron. xxix. 29, i. e., they worshiped the Lord as the Lord, and the king as the king; or rendered to the former supreme worship, and to the latter subordinate. On the same principle, the inhabitants of heaven worship "him that sits upon the throne" as the Supreme God, and Jesus Christ as the Lamb that was slain—the Son of God and Mediator. Subordinate worship is to be rendered to Christ even on Trinitarian principles, if any thanks or honor belong to the man who died for us; and seeing that the office of Mediator itself is confessedly subordinate. Its being said, John v. 23, "that all men should honor the Son even as they honor the Father," does not imply that they should render him equal honor; for Paul says the Galatians "received him as an angel of God, even as Christ Jesus," Gal. iv. 14, which by no means implies that they gave him equal respect in all points. All that the Saviour means, is, that they should honor the Son in his capacity, as they do the Father in his, without implying an equality of honor. There is no example of Christ's being worshiped as the Supreme God. He is worshiped only as the Son of God and Mediator; and the highest honor that he receives, is, "to the glory of God the Father." Phil. ii. 11. It does not center and terminate in him; but posses from him to a superior.

I will next consider the argument from the office of Savior which is ascribed both to God and to Christ. God often styles himself the Savior; and, moreover, says, "I am the Lord, and besides me there is no Savior." Isa. xliii. 11. At the same time, Jesus Christ is called the Savior; and the only name given under heaven, whereby we must be saved. Hence, it is argued that he must be the Supreme God. But this conclusion by no means follows. Its being said that there is no Savior besides God, does not mean that there is no Savior in any sense besides him; but merely that there is none originally, supremely, and essentially the Savior, but himself. For there are certainly other beings to whom this character subordinately belongs. Moses was called a deliverer, i. e., a Savior to Israel. God also sent Othniel and other Saviors to Israel from time to time. Referring to Gospel times, it was predicted that Saviors should come up upon Mount Esau." It is also written, Isai. xix. 20. "They shall cry unto the Lord because of the oppressors, and he shall send them a Savior, and a great one, and he shall deliver them." This is, doubtless, a prophecy of Christ. He is, then, a Savior whom God provided and sent; and therefore can not be the original Savior. Hence, "God our Savior" is represented as saving "through Jesus Christ our Savior." Titus iii. 4—6. Here, then, is one Supreme Savior saving by a subordinate Savior. Christ is the only Savior in the sense that office is attributed to him, i. e., as the agent by whom God effects the redemption of sinners. And, yet, God is the only Savior in the sense in which that office is attributed to him, i. e., as the original deliverer—the first and efficient cause of the whole work of redemption. This distinction is strikingly illustrated by our Lord's declaration concerning the goodness of God.—Matt. xix. 17. "Why callest thou me good? there is none good but one, that is God." This is not a denial of the existence of other good beings besides God; for there are many such beings; and Jesus was eminently good, being "holy, harmless, undefiled and separate from sinners." It is simply a denial of the original, essential and supreme goodness of any other being but God. The goodness of all others is derived and dependent. Just, therefore, in the sense that God only is good, is he the only Savior. Yet as there is derived and subordinate goodness in some of his creatures; so there are subordinate Saviors; and as to one particular work of deliverance an only subordinate Savior, even Jesus the Son of the living God. This is all so plain that he "may run that readeth it." Hab. ii. 13.

Moreover; the Holy Spirit's being said to be sent by Christ from the Father in the character of Comforter, (or more properly an advocate, as that is the primary meaning of the original word, paraklectos,) does not prove that he is the Supreme God. I find no passage in which the Holy Spirit is unequivocally represented to be the Spirit of Christ; but uniformly the Spirit of the Father, and essential to his person. If it be Christ's own Spirit, how could it be given to him? or how could he receive it? The very fact that the Spirit is given to him, proves that he is a dependent being, and needs help. By the Spirit's being given to him, we are to understand that its presence, influence, and various gifts and operations are imparted to him to aid the Mediatorial cause and government. And he is said to send the Spirit from the Father, because of this engaged assistance, and because he is the dispenser or minister of God's bounty to the church—not that he is the original giver of the Spirit. It is God, who, in reality, sheds forth the Spirit's influences. Christ is said to do it, because the Spirit is conferred by or through his agency, much in the same sense that the Apostles were said to work miracles and to minister the Spirit. The "Holy Ghost was given through the laying on of their hands." Peter said to the lame man, "but such as I have, give I unto thee. In the name of Jesus Christ of Nazareth, rise up and walk." Here, he speaks of having that power by which this man was cured, to give; but in reality it was God who gave it by, or through his instrumentality. In a similar manner, Christ is said to give or send the Spirit, which was given to him much more abundantly—even "without measure." Its being said that "the Spirit should not speak of himself," &c. evidently means that he should not speak particularly of the absolute kingdom of God; but of the Mediatorial kingdom of Jesus Christ, as his advocate.

Its being said that "in Christ dwelleth all the fulness of the Godhead bodily;" Col. ii. 9, is explained by the Spirit's being given to him without measure. He inherited a fullness of divine communications. In a similar, (though in a much less sense,) the church is said to "be filled with all the fulness of God." Eph. iii. 11, and to be "the fulness of him that filleth all in all." ch. i. 23.

Moreover; Christ's being called "King of kings, and Lord of lords," or, rather, "a King of kings, and a Lord of lords," (for this translation is admissible,) Rev. xix. 16, is no proof of his Supreme Deity. This title is not peculiar to Jehovah. Nebuchadnezzar is called "a king of kings," Dan. ii. 37. This title manifestly relates to Christ's Mediatorial authority, which is confessedly derived, and, therefore, it is applied in the subordinate sense.

And Christ's declaration, John xiv. 9, "He that hath seen me, hath seen the Father," cannot mean that he is the Father himself; but, simply, means that he that had seen him in his true character, had seen the Father also—not in his entire person. (for in this sense no man hath seen God at any time,) but in his doctrine and power. He had seen another besides Christ, i. e., the Giver, as well as the gift—the sender, as well as the sent. Nicodemus perfectly understood this; "for no man," said he, "can do the miracles which thou doest, except God be with him." John iii. 2. Christ also says, "if ye had known me, ye should have known my Father also." Ch. xiv. 7.

Again, "he that believeth on me, believeth not on me, but on him that sent me. And he that seeth me, seeth him that sent me." ch. xii. 44, 45, i. e., his faith and vision did not terminate on him, but extended to another, viz: God, on whose errand he came, and by whose power he operated; for he repeatedly confessed that he could do nothing of himself.

The foregoing are, I believe, the principal passages and arguments adduced for the Supreme Deity of Christ, and, consequently, for the Trinity, and they appear altogether insufficient to sustain that opinion. I think I have fairly removed all the support which can be derived from them, and that the positive evidence which I have furnished against the doctrine of the Trinity remains unimpaired and in full force, and that it fully authorizes the rejection of that doctrine. I have one reason more to offer, which I shall present in the next number.

Yours, Dear Sir, for a pure Theology.
JABEZ CHADWICK.

CIRCULAR LETTER.

The Ministers and Messengers composing the Seventh-Day Baptist Central Association, assembled at Adams, June, 1841, to the Churches they represent, send greeting:

Dear Brethren—Permitted by a gracious Providence to enjoy another harmonious interview in an associated capacity, we would record our gratitude for the tokens of the Divine approbation, and the blessings of Christian union which we have experienced. Many affecting changes have transpired the past year, and the ranks of Zion's soldiers have been thinned by death. Among other valuable brethren who have been called away from the church militant, we record the name of our beloved Brother and fellow-laborer, Elder Orson Campbell, who has entered his rest in triumph. Instead of repining under these inscrutable visitations, we would regard them as additional proofs of the Divine wisdom and goodness, and the most powerful incentives to increased activity in the cause of Christ.

Permit us, Dear Brethren, to present for your consideration at this time, the important subject of DEADNESS TO THE WORLD. Our limits will not admit of lengthy remarks at this time, but the magnitude of the subject—its connection with the welfare of every one—and its bearing on the prosperity of Zion, and the salvation of a lost world, constrain us to offer our thoughts with as much brevity as possible.

Every child of God, has, by virtue of his union with Christ, been crucified to the world—its spirit and rudiments—its maxims, policy and aims—and to complete the work thus commenced, through the grace of God, is the high privilege as well as the imperative duty of all Christians—is most essential to their enjoyment and happiness. This work is promoted,

1. By habitual meditation on the Christian's high-calling. Absorbed in these reflections, the world appears in its true and supreme insignificance; and the grace and munificence of God to the Church in its calling and destiny, in all their excellence and glory. This work is promoted,

2. By frequent pious communion with the people of God. It is with the holiness of the Divine law—the glory of the Gospel—and the mysteries of redemption are brought in review before the mind, that the hearts of Christians are made to burn within them. Then, indeed, the titles, and honors, and riches, and spirit of this world appears to the true disciple,

"Base as the dirt beneath his feet,
And mischievous as hell."

Deadness to the world is promoted,

3. By a strict attention to the means of God's appointment for the Christian's growth in grace. Such are the Sabbath—the social meeting—the preaching of the Gospel—the ordinances of Religion—and the study of God's word; and though these, to the mere formalist, may be as wells without water, to the faithful Christian they bring inward death to the world, and life unto holiness, and to God, through Jesus our Lord.

Deadness to the world is evinced to the believer,

1. By an increased attachment to secret communion with God. The destruction of wrong affections is best witnessed by the existence and growth of right ones.

2. By increased charity to the brethren. If we love those who bear God's image faintly, we must love Him whose image they bear; and, consequently, are dying to sin. To others, we evidence deadness to the world by the works of piety and charity. Among these, we mention, uprightness of demeanor in the various walks of life.

3. Attachment to the great duties of Religion.

4. Zeal for the upbuilding of the cause of Zion.

5. By having our conversation in Heaven.

Such, Dear Brethren, are no less convincing to men of the Christian's death to the world, than acceptable to God as the legitimate fruits of a divine life commenced within us—cheering to us as a prospect of divine life before us. Permit us, in the warmth of Christian affection, to urge upon you to cherish habitual deadness to this world, and aspire constantly to the life of God. Such devotedness as is implied in the holy vows that we have taken upon us, cannot fail to tell in the increased piety of our members—in the harmony of our Churches—in the revival of our dilapidated institutions—and the success of the Gospel in our hands. If we devote ourselves to the service and glory of God, he will send prosperity.

"Put on, therefore, as the elect of God, holy and beloved, bowels of mercies, kindness, humbleness of mind, meekness, long-suffering, forbearing one another, and forgiving one another if any man have a quarrel against any, even as Christ forgave you; so also do we." "So, likewise, reckon ye yourselves dead, indeed, unto sin, but alive unto God." "For if ye live after the flesh, ye shall die; but if ye, through the Spirit, do mortify the deeds of the body, ye shall live." The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you all. Amen.

CORRESPONDING LETTER.

The Seventh-Day Baptist Central Association, convened at Adams, June 10th, 1811, to her sister Associations sendeth Christian salutations:

Dear Brethren—Through the permission of the Great Head of the Church, we have enjoyed the privileges of another anniversary of this body; during which we have received returns from the greater part of the churches composing it, from whom no account of especial revival is presented; but, still, their general expressions are such as give us confidence to believe that the feeling pervading us, generally, is, we mean yet to cultivate love to God, and our brethren, and contend with proper motives and feelings, earnestly, for the faith once delivered to the saints. We have been favored, also, with the minutes from the Eastern Association. We would be glad to send Delegates to your Associations, but circumstances seem now to forbid it. But we wish you to understand that it will be highly gratifying to us to receive communications or delegations from you, believing that an interchange of views and feelings is directly calculated to strengthen the bonds of union among us.

FOREIGN NEWS.

From the New Yorker.

NINE DAYS LATER FROM EUROPE.

ARRIVAL OF THE GREAT WESTERN.

The steamship Great Western, Captain Hosken, arrived at this port about 8 on the evening of the 10th, in 14 days from Bristol, whence she sailed on the 27th ult. By this arrival we have our regular files of London papers to the evening of the 26th.

Great Britain is convulsed by the preliminary throes of a zealous political contest. The Whig Ministry, signally defeated in several successive divisions in the House of Commons, have been prevented from resigning according to the British custom, by the personal entreaties of the Queen superadded to their own inclinations. Defeated afresh on their proposition to modify the sugar duties, and not daring to press to a division their motion for a reform of the corn laws, they proposed a brief adjournment to enable them to look about and take breath. They have been met, however, by a proposition of the Tory leader in the Commons, Sir Robert Peel, that the present Ministry do not sufficiently possess the confidence of Parliament to enable them to carry on efficiently and usefully, the Government of the country. The debate on this proposition was to commence in the evening of the day the Great Western sailed, and the agitation already excited by it was intense and rapidly becoming universal.

From the tenor and spirit of the London Journals, we gather that the defeat of the Ministry on Sir Robert Peel's motion is nearly certain. If not on that, they will inevitably be defeated on their corn law proposition. But still they will not resign, but dissolve Parliament, and take the chances of a general election.

This is already regarded as so imminent as well as inevitable that preparations are making for it by both parties. A great city of London Meeting in favor of the modification of the Corn Laws, was to be held on the 1st inst. The Tories intended to muster their strength there, and offer an amendment, setting forth that in the present state of the country, the Ministers ought to resign. If they do this, they will be able to break up or defeat the object of the meeting. Violence will very probably ensue.

The Whigs of the City of London are about to formally request Lord John Russell, the distinguished Whig Ministerial Leader of the House of Commons, and the mover of the Corn-Law Reform, to stand as their candidate for Parliament in the approaching contest. Of course, he will be elected, after a furious struggle.

There is very little Commercial Intelligence of Interest. Scarcely a shade of change in Cotton, Teas, Grain, or Stocks. Money was in demand. Exchanges not unfavorable. Business in the Manufacturing Districts was greatly depressed, and severe distress has been experienced.

Lord John Russell said that he had on a former night, in answer to a question put by the right Honorable Baronet the member from Tamworth, stated that the case of Mr. McLeod had been removed into the Federal Court. Upon that point he was mistaken. The case had been removed, not into the Federal Court, but into the Supreme Court of the State of New York, upon a writ of habeas corpus.

The Minister's proposition for a modification of the Sugar Duties, was negatived on the 18th, by the very decisive vote of 317 to 281; Tory majority 36.

HOPE FOR THE PRESIDENT!

The Captain of the Portuguese ship Conde de Palma, which arrived at Lisbon from Rio Janeiro on the 6th of May, saw a large steamer under canvass on the 23d and 24th of April, but did not speak with her. The following is a copy of the log: "On the 23d of April, 3 o'clock, P. M. in lat. 31 21 N., long. 40 33 W., saw a very large steamer, without showing her colors, under canvass; the next morning, at 6 o'clock, saw her again, under topsail and latine, steering N. N. E., the wind E., the weather moderate. The following day the wind veered to the north, and blew strong, which would prevent the steamer approaching the Islands. Neither smoke nor paddles were in motion."

On the 35th the wind veered to N. W., and blew strong, which would prevent the said steamer reaching the Western Isles:

SPAIN.

Madrid Journals of the 17th inst., have reached us. Senor Olozaga had failed to form a Cabinet, and the Regent had invested Count Almodovar with powers to try what he could do. At a Cabinet Council it had been resolved that the title "Highness" should be prefixed to the name of the Regent.

Letters from Corunna, of the 14th inst., state that Madame Mina had been appointed governante of Her Majesty Queen Isabella, and her sister the infanta, at the special entreaty of their mother, Queen Christiana, ex-Regent of Spain.

El Castellanto of the 17th states that the Commander Don Miguel Matan, had surprised the famous Carlist Chief Jose Canela in a farm-house near Agromont.—He had come from the valley of Andoura, with a commission from Tristany to raise guerillas in the Segara, Before he was executed he made some important confessions, which might serve to defeat the plans of several other Carlist chiefs, who propose making similar attempts during the summer. Canela suffered death with resignation; but to the last moment he besought an interview with Espartero.

FRANCE.

The Paris papers of Monday, the 21th, contain the first day's report of the trial of Darmes and his two accomplices, Duelos, and Considere, for attempting the life of the King, on the 11th of October last. The trial excited no interest, and none of the usual precautions were taken to preserve the peace of the metropolis. This augurs well for the Government, and for the state of public feeling in Paris.

The Budget of Expenditures was voted by the Chamber of Deputies on the 17th, by a majority of 198 against 46.

Rumors of a dissention in the Cabinet are very currently received. It is supposed to be divided into two parties—one set adhere to Guizot, and the other to Marshal Soult.

The Duke de Joinville left Paris for Cherbourg on Monday evening. King Louis Phillippe and the Royal Family removed on the same day from the Tuilleries to the Chateau de Neuilly.

M. Thiers, according to the Commerce, is about to leave Paris for Lille, where he will occupy part of the Parliamentary vacation in terminating his History of the Empire.

GERMANY.

A Hamburgh paper says that the Bremen ship Julia St. Edward, had been brought into the Weser under the care of a Lieutenant of the English Navy, on a pretext alleged by an English Cruiser, that she was to be employed in the slave trade. The only ground of suspicion, was, his having on board more water butts than the officer thought necessary, and there being some packages which he could not get at, which might contain something suspicious.

AFFAIRS OF THE EAST.

The Times, of May 25th, says: "We are informed, upon what we consider to be the best authority, that the London Conference has proceeded to the formal signature of the protocols respecting the East, which had received only the initials of the five plenipotentiaries. Thus is consummated, in the official form, the return of France into the European Alliance, and the end of the embarrassment which the treaty of the 15th of July had created. Although long foreseen, this step has not been considered without importance in the political circles."

From the German Papers.

INSURRECTION IN THE TURKISH EMPIRE

The Augsburg Gazette publishes a letter dated from the frontiers of Turkey, the 10th inst., which states that the mail from Constantinople of the 26th ult. had been overdue several days, which was considered the more extraordinary, the Pasha of Nissa having so positively asserted that the roads should be kept free for Couriers.—One report stated that the Turks who were escorting the mail had surrendered to the insurgents, or that they had taken the road through Widdin.

In general the intelligence from Bulgaria is confined to details of the atrocities committed by the Turks on the Christians.—The fugitives had related the particulars of the cruelties of which they had been the victims so circumstantially, that there could be no doubt of the truth of their statements. This conduct may, therefore, be assumed as the cause of the late insurrection in Bulgaria and the other Turkish provinces. The report that the revolt had extended to Macedonia is not confirmed.—The latest letters from Bitoglia and Salonica (to the 21st ult.,) make no mention of such an occurrence. The number of fugitives taking refuge in the Servian territory continued to increase, but the armed men occupy the mountains. They have much want, however, of arms; scarcely one man in ten possesses a gun, the others have only hooks, scythes, and hay-forks their weapons. It is now evident that the population of Servia were concerned in the revolt, although the Government wishes to keep it secret. In Belgrade itself considerable excitement prevails, which has been increased by a remarkable appearance of the holy cross, said to have been observed by several of the inhabitants on one of the towers of the fortress.

The same journal publishes a letter, dated, Vienna, 15th inst., which alludes also to the non-arrival of the Constantinople mail of the 28th ult., and states that the insurrection in Rumelia had extended to the country between Adrianople and Nassau. This letter adds, that "the last accounts from Servia throw no light upon the state of the upper provinces of Turkey since the victory obtained by the Turks at Alexinissa, which the Pasha of Nissa appears to have made the centre of his operations, in order to prevent communication with the insurgents of the other provinces. It was expected at Vienna that the next Turkisk mail, which it was supposed had taken the road through Buchorest, would put an end to the state of uncertainty with respect to recent events in the Turkish provinces, and which was becoming every day more alarming.

News of the Day.

From the New-Yorker.

WASHINGTON CORRESPONDENCE,

WASHINGTON, Thursday, June 10, 1841.

In the Senate, to-day, memorials for a Bankrupt Law were presented by Mr. EVANS, PRENTISS and YOUNG; also by Mr. BUCHANAN, for duties on Wines and Silks, and by Mr. BETTS, from the Legislature of Massachusetts, for a distribution of the proceeds of the sales of the Public Lands.

DISTRIBUTION.

Mr. CLAY, of Ky., according to previous notice, introduced a Bill for the Distribution of the proceeds of the sales of the Public Lands, which received its first reading and was laid over till to-morrow.

Mr. HENDERSON introduced a bill to establish an uniform system of Bankruptcy, which was read twice, referred to the Judiciary Committee, and ordered to be printed, after a debate of some length to the propriety of action on this subject at the present session.

Mr. RIVES introduced a resolution, previously noticed to refer to the Committee on Foreign Affairs the parts of the President's Message relative to that subject. Here a very interesting debate took place in relation to the McLeod case, to which Messrs. BUCHANAN and RIVES participated.

Mr. BUCHANAN opposed the course of Government towards the British in relation to this case, particularly the late correspondence of Mr. Webster with Mr. Fox, and also Mr. Webster's instructions to the Attorney General to attend his trial, &c. To this Mr. RIVES replied in his accustomed eloquent and able manner, defending the course pursued as worthy of a free nation, in magnanimity, justice, and desire of honorable peace with all nations of the earth. There has, as yet, been no action on the resolution.

A great speech is expected from Mr. Choate to-morrow on the same subject.

In the House, to-day, on motion of Mr. FILLMORE, Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, it was resolved, that the Report of the Secretary of the Treasury be referred to that Committee, except that part relating to a fiscal agent on which a select committee had been appointed.

Mr. HOLMES of S. C. presented a memorial of inhabitants of Charleston, recommending an appropriation of one years' salary to the family of the late President, WILLIAM HENRY HARRISON.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the testimony of the contested election of Mr. BANKS of Pa.: Referred to the Committee on Elections. Also, an account of the Treasurer of the United States, of the contingent expenditures for the service of the Post Office Department, for the year ending July 4, 1840, which was laid on the table and ordered to be printed.

The motion to reconsider the vote on the amendment dropping the 21st rule of last Congress was then taken up, and Mr. INGERSOLL resumed from yesterday his remarks, and entered into an elaborate examination of the subject, in opposition to the agitation of the subject of Abolition at present, and showing that the tendency of the measures of Abolitionists is to separate the Union. He was followed at some length by Mr. MARSHALL, of Ky., in opposition to the reconsideration. The question was then taken, and the House, by Yeas 110, Nays 116, refused to reconsider the vote.

Mr. WISE then called up the motion to reconsider, the vote adopting the rules of the last House, except the 21st, on which he gave notice that he intended to speak but gave way, and the House, at 6 o'clock adjourned. ARGUS.

WASHINGTON, June 11, 1841.

President Tyler has instructed Mr. Ewing to report a plan of a Fiscal Agent when called upon which shall not conflict with the Constitution. The President's plan you have had an inkling of—the details he leaves to his Secretary and to Congress.

The President gave his first diplomatic dinner on Tuesday. Most of the Foreign Ministers were present, and amongst the Senators there were Messrs. H. Clay and Rives.

Messrs. Webster and Tallmadge have dined together, and all pretended discord in that quarter is "harmony not understood."

Gales & Seaton were elected Printers to the House to-day by the following vote: Gales & Seaton 134; Blair & Rives 73; Peter Force 6.

Thomas Allen is agreed upon by the Whig Senators in caucus to be Printer to the Senate. The rate of compensation is reduced in both Houses 20 per cent. below the prices fixed by the resolution of 1819. This, I hope, is but the beginning of Retrenchment. Let the same rate of reduction be carried through all the branches of the service.

The Senate to-day had again under consideration the motion of Mr. Rives to refer to the Committee on Foreign Affairs that part of the President's Message on that subject.

Mr. Choate spoke about an hour and a half, defending the course taken by Mr. Webster in his correspondence with Mr. Fox, and replying in a masterly manner to Mr. Buchanan's remarks yesterday. He evinces talent worthy the successor of Webster.

Messrs. Calhoun and Henderson have also spoken on this subject to-day.

In the House, Mr. HUNT of N. Y. gave notice of a bill 'to repeal the act to postpone the fourth instalment of deposite with the States,' and farther providing for the deposite of said instalment.

The business before the House being on the motion to reconsider the vote by which the rules of the last house were adopted, except the 21st.

Mr. WISE addressed the House, entering into the general subject of Abolition. He deprecated the course pursued by his Northern brethren of the Whig party, in pressing the subject, of Abolition, to the exclusion of the important national business for which they have been convened, and gave notice of his intention to oppose to the last their measures on this subject. He had scarcely commenced his argument, when he was seized with a sudden fainting, and obliged to leave the Hall. The motion was then put over till tomorrow to enable him to conclude.

Mr. Waterson moved a reconsideration of the resolution to elect Printer, with a view of offerering a resolution to appoint a Select Committee on the subject of printing, and on separating the printing from presses. This failed by a vote of Yeas 72, Nays 122.

The usual resolution to supply the Members with the daily papers during the Session, passed.

Mr. Sergeant offered a resolution confirming the action of all the Standing Committees, except the Committee on Elections, Ways and Means, and Mileage, to the subject of the President's Message, and of a General Bankrupt Law, postponing memorials, &c. on other subjects, to the next regular session.

Motions were made to amend this, by excepting also the Committee on the District of Columbia and on Claims. No action was taken. ARGUS.

WASHINGTON, June 12, 1841.

Hon. W. W. PAYNE of Ala., a new Member, took his seat.

Mr. WISE being still ill, the further consideration of his motion to reconsider the Rules was again postponed.

Mr. GRAHAM of N. C. asked leave to introduce a bill to repeal the Sub-Treasury: Refused as needless—a bill to that effect having already come down from the Senate.

Mr. SERGEANT of Pa. asked the consideration of a Resolution confining the future action of the House at this Session to certain great measures specified. The motion was defeated: Nays 89; Yeas 122—(not two-thirds.)

A considerable number of petitions was now received; some from private claimants. &c.; one for Abolition, which was laid on the table by 155 to 25; some in favor of a General Bankrupt Law: these were referred to the Judiciary Committee, with instructions to inquire into the expediency of reporting a bill at this Session. These instructions were carried by a vote of 93 to 89.

The Committee on the Rules made a Report, accompanied by Resolutions prescribing that the business of the present Session should be confined to the subjects especially suggested in the President's Message, unless Congress shall decide to include the discussion of a General Bankrupt Law. They further prescribe that all petitions, memorials, &c. not relating to the subject be laid on the table on presentation, and no action had thereon at the presnt Session. After an irregular and protracted debate, these Resolutions were PASSED: Yeas 106; Nays 60. Adjourned.

In the Senate, a number of petitions for a Bankrupt Law were received, and referred to the Judiciary Committee.—Various resolutions of inquiry were moved by Opposition Senators. At length Mr. CLAY's resolution prescribing that any subject which may be under discussion when the Senate adjourns for the night shall be taken up directly after reading the journal the next morning was taken up. Messrs. BENTON, YOUNG, BUCHANAN, &c. objected to this as forcing business, cutting off reslutions of inquiry, &c. Mr. CLAY finally consented to modify it so as to allow one hour every morning to petitions, resolutions, &c. The resolution was then agreed to.

Mr. CLAY's bill providing for a Distribution of the Proceeds of the Public Lands was read a second time and referred.

Mr. MERRICK reported a bill to re-charter the Banks in the District of Columbia.

The Senate then elected Rev. SEPTIMUS TUSTIN Chaplain, and adjourned.

WASHINGTON, Monday, June 14, 1841.

In the Senate to-day, Mr. BERRIEN, Chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, reported against increasing at this session the salary of the United States District Judge in Louisiana.

Mr. DIXON called up the resolution to elect a Printer. It was, however, at the request of Mr. CLAY of Ala., postponed till to-morrow.

Mr. PRESTON spoke in his usually eloquent and felicitous manner, in continuation of the debate, on the McLeod correspondence, and in an able vindication of the Secretary of State.

Mr. BENTON followed, impeaching the ground taken in that correspondence by the Secretary, and insisting that McLeod should be held personally for murder and arson.

Mr. BUCHANAN has the floor for to-morrow.

In the House, Mr. WISE spoke for five hours and a half on the subject of Abolition and in favor of the 21st rule of the last House—The motion to reconsider the vote by which, with the exception of the 21st rule, the rules of last House were adopted. He commented at length on the opinion of Mr. ADAMS in opposition, and opposed the reception of any Abolition petitions,

The motion was carried by a bare majority of Yeas 106, Nays 104; and thus the House, having been convened in Extra Session for the transaction of important and pressing business, after having spent two weeks, and effected nothing but the discussion of Abolition, presents the strange anomaly of undoing what little has been accomplished, and placing themselves at this period without rules.

A resolution is now offered by Mr. RAYNOR to adopt the rules of the last House (inclusive of the 21st) excluding, however, action on all subjects for the present Session, not especially referred to in the President's Message. A dread scene of confusion and delay of public business may be expected, before the re-adoption of rules by the House. ARGUS.

TUESDAY June 15.

In the Senate, Thomas Allen, Editor of the Madisonian, was, elected Printer, having 27 votes. The Opposition declined voting. Mr. Buchanan made a speech on the McLeod question, in reprehension of the course of Mr. Webster. Mr. Clay replied. Mr. Allen of Ohio, made a violent speech against the course of Great Britain. He declared that if any British should set their foot in Ohio they would be slaughtered, as they deserved. He asserted that this controversy arose out of a finesse of Great Britain to compel the General Government to assume the State Debts! He declared that he should call upon the Committee on Foreign Affairs for an early Report on this subject, if they did not present it voluntarily. The subject was then referred.

A Report from the Secretary of the Treasury in answer to a string of Resolutions offered by Mr. Benton, was received, and then the Senate went into Executive Session.

In the House, the day was spent in violence and tumult. The question being upon the appointment of a Committee to report Rules for the Government of the House (once ordered, but since reconsidered) the Chairman decided that the Previous Question was still in force. Mr. Wise appealed, and the House reversed the decision of the Chair. For sustaining 105; Reversing 112.

Mr Raynor of N. C. now took the floor, and made a warm speech against Abolition. Mr. Morgan of N. Y. followed in favor of proceeding with the public business. Mr. Cushing of Mass. wished an opportunity for further debate on the general subject, in view of what had already been said upon it. He disclaimed some of the sentiments put forth by Mr. Adams on a former day. Mr. C. Brown of Pa. denounced the frequent call of the Previous Question as outrageous and tyrannical. Mr. Briggs of Mass. shewed him that his party resorted to it very freely when they were a majority on this floor. Mr. Adams of Mass. now obtained the floor, and dealt most savage blows at Messrs. Wise, Cost Johnson and others. whom he accused of attempting to smuggle through the Slavery Rule in his absence, and to shout him down when he attempted to speak.

Mr. Wise replied, disclaiming any personal ill will to Mr. Adams. On the contrary, his feelings were friendly. Mr. Adams—"Yes, the same as you entertained for Cilley!" Here a tremendous excitement broke out, and it was some time before the uproar could be stilled. Mr. J. G. Floyd of N. Y. opposed the call of the Previous Question, and Messrs. Winthrop of Mass. and Sergeant of Pa. defended it. Finally, the question was reached on the proposition of Mr. Morgan that the Rules and Orders of the last House be adopted for the present, and a select Committee appointed to reviso them. Negatived: Yeas 96; Nays 105. Mr. Rayner of N. C. proposed one of a similar import, which was likewise defeated; Yeas 104; Nays 107. The question now recurred on the adoption of the Rules (the XXIst being excluded) which the House had last night voted to reconsider; and this too was negatived; Yeas 106; Nays 110. So the House refused to agree to any thing, and at 8 o'clock adjourned, leaving every thing in a state of uncertainty and anarchy. ARGUS.

Death of Willis Gaylord Clark.—We have the melancholy duty of announcing the death of WILLIS GAYLORD CLARK, Editor of the Philadelphia Gazette. He died on Saturday evening at 10 o'clock. His disease was Consumption; his age 32 years. Mr. Clark was a Poet of no ordinary abilities, and as an essayist unsurpassed in this Country. His 'Ollapodiana' and other contributions to the Knickerbocker are among the very pleasantest specimens of magazine papers. Many of his fugitive Poems are among the most harmonious and beautiful in our language.

Mr. Clark had never recovered from the blow he received, some two or three years since in the death of a young and lovely wife to whom he was passionately attached. Their only child, a boy of some four summers, still lives to deplore the loss he can yet so faintly realize.

We have written coldly as we might of the death of one with whom our personal acquaintance was but casual and slight; yet we cannot so tamely resign him who was in truth among the most genial and kindly if not the very loftiest spirits of our time and country. Every line of Mr. Clark's varied writings evinced his profound, exclusive sympathy with the better feelings of our nature—the gentle, the lovely, the good. His was indeed a heart to 'rejoice with those who do rejoice, and weep with those who weep.' In reading his essays, one is moved to uncontrollable laughter, and in the next breath to burning tears—alike in perfect accordance with Truth, Simplicity, and Nature. In a sphere less lofty, yet hardly less attractive and delightful, Clark was the Jean Paul of American writers. But at an early age he has gone from among us, and the places that knew him shall know him no more. Be his the sunlight and the peace of a benignant Heaven!—New Yorker.

Upwards of five hundred persons have been added to the churches of Wiskonsan, by profession during the past year.

The average number of inhabitants to a square mile in Ireland is 275, in England 236, and China 230.

DR. WATERMAN'S

RHEUMATIC AND STRENGTHENING PLASTER.

The peculiarities of this compound are owing to the immediate effects produced on the animal fibre, it being carried by the absorbants to the seat of disease or pain, without producing disagreeable sensations. As an external application it is a powerful auxiliary, and will cure, in all curable cases; such as acute and chronic Rheumatisms, Scrofulous Affections, weakness of back, pain in the side, head and limbs, affections of the Spine, &c. &c. &c.

This Plaster is warranted to be by far the best ever offered to the public—much superior to "Jew David or Hebrew Plaster," and at less than half the price.

WINSLOW'S

BALSAM OF HOREHOUND.

An unparalleled remedy for common Colds, Coughs, Asthma, Influenza, Whooping Cough, Bronchitis, and all diseases of the Breast and Lungs, leading to Consumption; composed of the concentrated virtues of Horehound, Boneset, Blood Root, Liverwort, and several other vegetable substances. Prepared only by J. M. WINSLOW, Rochester, N. Y.

The innocence and universally admitted pectoral virtues of the Herbs from which the BALSAM OF HOREHOUND is made, are too generally known to require recommendation; it is therefore only necessary to observe that the Medicine contains the whole of their Medicinal properties, highly concentrated, and so happily combined with several other vegetable substances, as to render it the most speedy, mild, and certain remedy, now in use, for the complaints above mentioned.

Thousands of testimonials will be shown, if wanted, at any time, placing the above medicines beyond reproach.

In conclusion he would only say, that he will not be under-sold on any article which he offers for sale

POETRY.

From Blackwood's Magazine.

Home in the Skies.

When up to endless skies we gaze,
Where stars pursue their nightly ways,
We think we see, from earth's low cloud,
The wide and shining home of God.

But could we rise to moon or sun,
Or path where planets duly run,
Still heaven would spread above us far,
And earth remote would seem a star.

'Tis vain to dream those tracts of space,
With all their worlds approach his face;
One glory fills each wheeling ball—
One love has shaped and moved them all.

This earth, with all its dust and tears,
Is his no less than yonder spheres;
And rain-drops weak, and grains of sand,
Are stamped by his immediate hand.

The rock, the wave, the little flower
Are fed by living streams of living power
That spring from the Almighty will,
Whate'er his thoughts conceive, fulfil.

And is this all that man can claim!
Is this our longing's final aim?
To be like all things round—no more
Than pebbles cast on Time's grey shore.

Can man, no more than beast aspire
To know his being's awful Sire!
And, born and lost on Nature's breast,
No blessings seek but there to rest!

Not this our doom, thou God benign!
Whose rays on us unclouded shine;
Thy breath sustains yon fiery dome,
But man is most thy favored home.

We view those halls of painted air,
And own thy presence makes them fair;
But dearer still to thee, O Lord,
Is he whose thoughts to thine accord.

"THE ONE PRICE STORE."

Those who are conversant with the advertising world in and about Boston, may know the certain dry goods establishment has received the distinctive name of "the one price store." Whether this name is a correct index to its character we have never had occasion to ascertain, though we have no reason to suspect the contrary; but the repeated use of this significant appellation has given rise to a train of reflections which we have often wished to record for the special benefit of the mercantile fraternity of Boston, a great proportion of whom are young men.

Why should this title be adopted and published in connection with every new arrival of goods at this establishment? Evidently because it is an acknowledged fact, that the stores in Boston are not generally "one price stores." Because it has come to be believed that chaffering and higgling, setting one price and taking another is the rule, and the unwavering maintainance of "one price" is the exception. And if this distinctive epithet gives to an establishment any advantage, or popularity, it is on the supposition that the public are becoming wearied of this slippery way of doing business, and are beginning to think that strait forward honesty will at least save them a great deal of trouble.

But what a comment on the character of the young men of Boston, does such a state of things present! Need any one be told that the man who sets one price on his goods, and accepts another, is guilty of his honesty? Need I be told that if a trader sells me an article for a dollar less than his asking price, he intended to filch a dollar unjustly out of my pocket? can a merchant forget that when he falls sixpence for the sake of selling an article, that sixpence is just the price of his conscience? Does he not know that the character of that act in the sight of God, differs not in moral obliquy from that of the thief, who directly steals the amount?—Nay, more, it is not often true that the trader in order to steal with the consent of the purchaser, is obliged to add lying to his other sins? And is it not true that by this means he sometimes gets so accustomed to say any thing which may help the sale of his goods, that he prattles a stream of falsehoods by habit?

The fact is, mercantile life is full of temptations to swerve from the strict and simple principle of honesty. In the first place, the Bible rule, the only one which uncorrupted and unsophisticated conscience approves, is exchanged for professional morality. The simple honest-hearted young clerk, recently perhaps from the pure moral atmosphere of some country town, is laughed at for not knowing that such and such things, which to him appear dishonest, are the habits of "the trade." He is given to understand that his rustic notions about honesty are only so many proofs of dulness, which he must outgrow before he can be successful. He is told that certain practices are universal, and of course expected, and that there is no such thing as succeeding without them. Then there is the influence of associates, which it is always difficult to resist. Add to this the scramble which competition in mercantile life produces, the goading which is felt when paying a high rent, a heavy insurance, a large bill for clerk hire, taxes, interest money, repairs and risk, and all will allow that a firm and deeply rooted principle of integrity is requisite to keep any man perfectly upright and purely honest.

We are willing to allow these circumstances all proper weight, and yet we say, they afford no excuse for that lax morality in trade to which we have referred. Call a man an animal merely, and we can find some excuse for him—yes, make him an intellectual animal even, and the present system might not be greatly unsuited to him. But make him a moral being, accountable at the bar of his own conscience, and at the awful bar of an omniscient and just God, and how does this morality of trade appear then? How does the man appear who sells his soul by the yard, or by the gallon from day to day, and yet hides himself under the vain plea that others do so, or that he could not keep pace with the times unless he did so, or that his expenses were great, or that trade was difficult, and he must make the most of every opportunity?

Now it is certain that a man can be honest in every walk of life—he can mantain a conscience void of offence toward God and toward man. Our ever bountiful Father has created the world, and arranged all its affairs on the principles of honesty, yea of benevolence. He will sustain that man who always acts, not for his own advantage alone, but for that of his fellow men, and for the glory of God. For such a man of all things to do work together for good. If he cannot do it in his present situation, let him remove to another. There is a place on the footstool where he can, every night before he lies down to rest, thank God for the possession of a clear conscience, and a pure heart.

It will be recollected that we are penning these thoughts for business men—primarily for the businss men of Boston. We should do them injustice, however, did we leave for the inference that in point of moral integrity in trade, they are below the same class of men in any other place. Were we to institute comparisons, we should feel obliged to pay a high tribute to the business men of Boston, but this is not needed. Our object is neither to flatter nor reproach them, but to urge them to adopt and stand unwaveringly by, that standard of mercantile morality which conscience—rather, which heaven approves. For Christians no other standard can be thought of—for all no other will work well to the end.

In the first place, then, they need to cut from all conventional and professional morality. Can you afford to sell your soul for a few shillings because your neighbor does so? It may be worth no more than his, but can you afford to sell it so? Will the reproaches of conscience be less cutting, will the rotting fumes of self-reproach, aye will the gnawings of the worm that never dies be more tolerable, because your neighbor and compeer in dishonesty is suffering the same? Is a pure heart really less valuable because it sells so low in the market? is the present protection and the eternal favor of God of no value, because nine-tenths of the men about you esteem it so? And especially if you profess to be a Christian, you know, and the world knows, that you profess a morality which has an eternal basis, that the language of your conscience is, "I have set the Lord always before me."

And the other thing to be remembered is, that every business man should seek to promote the glory of God and the good of his fellow men in the choice, and in the manner of conducting his business. In choosing his business he should ask, Will this really promote the best interests of my fellow men? In other words, he should conduct his business on the principle of benevolence. What could be thought of the professed minister of the gospel who did not act on this principle? But is it less the duty of any and every other man to seek the good of his fellow men in all he does? Are you doing such a business, and in such a way as will promote the welfare of your fellow men? God will hold every business man accountable for an answer to this question. We are not turned loose into the world to plunder each other, even in the most polite and workmanlike manner possible.

Let the business men of Boston think of this subject in its true light, in view of their advantages and responsibilties to be models in this respect, and then instead of the 'one price store,' we should have no others but one price stores all over the city, and we are confident such a state of temporal prosperity would be enjoyed as has never yet been witnessed.

POISON FROM ANIMAL PUTRIDITY.

BY WILLIS GAYLORD.

It is well known to those who have paid attention to such subjects, that animal matter becoming putrid under certain circumstances, or suffering decomposition in certain conditions, becomes a most virulent poison, capable of destroying life when taken into the circulation by absorption, or applied to the stomach or to an abandoned surface.

The surgeon who frequents dissecting rooms is aware of the danger he runs, as scarcely a year passes in which the sacrifice of one or more valuable lives is not the result of such poisonous matter, communicated to the tissues of the system by some slight wound, a trifling sore, or perhaps a slight scratch. The terrible certainty with which such poison runs to a fatal termination, leaves but little hope to the sufferer; and is still less calculated, perhaps, to induce confidence in the remedial agents which are so potent in many other cases.

Another way in which putrid animal matter operates as poison, is shown in the effects of cheese when exposed to certain influences and changes, and taken into the stomach in that state. Perhaps there is not a year passes in which individuals, and sometimes whole families, are not poisoned with cheese; and this effect is usually if not always, attributed to some deleterious substance, either designedly or accidentally communicated to it while making. Examinations made with the utmost care, by skilful men, have been unable to detect any such substance, and the probability is, that the cause is to be sought in the putrid change which such cheese is found to be undergoing.

The following remarks by Professor Liebig, in his "Organic Chemistry, of Physiology and Agriculture," would seem to throw much light on the question of animal poisons from putridity; as also on the laws which govern the particles of matter, whether sound or defective, when wrought into contact with each other. The case adduced by him, is the celebrated Wurtemberg sausage, from the use of which several hundred deaths are known within a few years to have occurred, and which has in consequence become prominent in the class of putrid animal poisons. The Professor says:

"In Wurtemburg especially, these cases are very frequent, for there the sausages are prepared from very various materials. Blood, liver, bacon, brains, milk, meal, and bread, are mixed together with salt and spices; the mixture is then put into bladders or intestines, & after being boiled is smoked.

"When these sausages are well prepared they may be preserved for months, and furnish a nourishing savory food; but when the spices and salt are deficient, and particularly when they are smoked too late or not sufficiently, they undergo a peculiar kind of putrefaction, which begins at the centre of the sausage. Without any appreciable escape of gas taking place, they become paler in color, and more soft and greasy in those parts which have undergone putrefaction, and they are found to contain free lactic acid, or lactate of ammonia—products which are universally formed during the putrefaction of animal and vegetable matter.

"The cause of the poisonous nature of these sausages, was ascribed at first to hydrocyanic acid, and afterwads to sabaic acid, although neither of these substances had been detected in them. * * * The death which is the consequence of poisoning by putrefied sausages, succeeds very lingering and remarkable symptoms. There is a gradual wasting of muscular fibre, and of all the constituents of the body similarly composed; the patient becomes much emaciated, dries to a complete mummy, and finally dies. The carcass is stiff as if frozen, as it is not subject to putrefaction. During the progress of the disease, the saliva becomes viscous, and acquires an offensive smell."

A variety of experiments were instituted by Colin to ascertain the modus operandi of this class of poisons. He found when putrefying muscle or pus is placed on a fresh wound, it occasions disease, and not unfrequently ends in death. Boiling water, or alcohol, will destroy the poisonous quality of these putrefying substances and render them innoxious, but they seem only to produce this effect by arresting the progress of putrefaction. On the contrary, when these poisons of putridity come in contact with the stomach and are taken into the circulation, or are brought into the blood through wounds, as in the dissecting room, the vital energy is not sufficiently to arrest the progress of putrefaction in the matter so absorbed, but the poison retaining its active chemical properties, imports, more or less rapidly its peculiar action to the blood and through that to the muscular tissue.

It would seem that decomposing animal matter, however offensive it may become, rarely or never assumes the intensity of a deadly poison, unless the putrefaction is conducted in such a manner that the gases evolved during that process are not permitted to escape, but by being retained, are reabsorbed as it were, thus adding energy and intensity to the putrid substances already developed. In cheese, the putrefactive process commences in the interior; there is no escape of gas, but the decomposition goes gradually on, and while all is fair outside, the cheese, instead of curing, is putrefying within. So with the sausages of Professor Liebig. The membraneous covering prevents the escape of the gases formed, and they are retained, while the putrefaction still goes forward. In this country we have never known an instance of poisoning from such preparations as the German sausage, but the general use of meat in all its multiplied forms, renders such an occurrence not impossible; and those from the two other kinds of animal poison, (dissection and from cheese,) have been of sufficiently frequent occurrence to warrant the calling of the public attention to the subject, and if possible, its further investigation and elucidation.

Kingdom of Jerusalem.—The project of erecting Palestine into an independent State, to which the Jews might return with an assurance of protection and security, appears to be seriously entertained by some of the leading powers of Europe. A word from Prince Metternich and Lord Palmerston would, it is stated, settle the matter. The following extract from a letter received in this city from a gentleman of high standing in the literary and diplomatic circles of Berlin, dated, Feb. 15, serves to show that the subject has not been lost sight of, and is perhaps brought nearer to some important decision than the public has been aware of:—"The allies having obtained their end (in Syria) are somewhat at a loss how to dispose of their conquest. They are seriously thinking of setting up or reviving up or receiving a Christian kingdom at Jerusalem—a project which seems to be received with favor at Vienna.—But then what are they to do with the other christian population of Syria? This is one of the questions which France has asked them.—They are now very anxious to draw her from the insolated position which they have forced her; as they find after all that they cannot permanently and satisfactorily settle the East without her concurrence!"

Gentlemen who have paid particular attention to some of the remarkable prophecies of the Scriptures believe that they see in the leading political events of the day many indications of the near approach of the millenium, when all nations shall be brought to worship the true God. The return of the Jewish nation to Palestine, and the resumption of worship in the temple of Jerusalem, are regarded as among the events which must necessarily happen before that great purpose is accomplished. The political movement here spoken of, taken in connection with the efforts of missionaries, who have obtained a footing on almost every section of the globe, may serve to show that the millenel era is probably not as far distant as the thoughtless affect to believe. The subject is one that affords food for much reflection, and proceedings of the allied Powers in regard to the Holy Land, will therefore be watched with absorbing interest.—American Sentinel.

The Wonders of Astronomy.—Professor Dimitry lately pronounced a splendid lecture in Washington city, before the National Institution for the promotion of the arts and sciences. It was on astronomy, and speaking of the discoveries of Herschell he said that he discovered the double stars, the suns forming a system themselves; some exhausting forty and others sixty thousand years in describing the two-fold circle of their immense revolutions. There is frequently a contrast between the relative color of these suns—red and green sometimes, and at others yellow and blue! Thus the same plane is successively lighted up by a sun of ruby hue! Each day in these planets has its peculiar gorgeousness. Whole worlds are transformed under the witchery of these magic lights; and the richest poetry must fail to convey the richness of their moons. Ascend higher and higher; eternally ascend, dive with Herschel into those abysses of light and existence, and emerge with the conviction that all these stars wandering through space bear their animated and intelligent beings. Instinct with this promethean thought, Herschel argues that light does not emanate from a sun but floats in its atmosphere like clouds amidst our own. That there it is perpetually forming to radiate over all the worlds of space—not excepting the sun which it illuminates, and would have long consumed, but for the softening of its intenser power by means as yet unknown. From this he concluded that the phenomena of light exists in the sun as well as moon, tho' under different conditions and forms. The professor closed this eloquent lecture with this fine passage, in allusion to the idea that the stars are inhabited:—"All the luminous points of the atmosphere are vocal with aspirations and love; each planet, star, sun, and galaxy is a blazing altar that sends up the hymn of victory over the brute matter; and the congeries of all these the temple of the divinity, and these sublime choirs, echo from world to world the voice of a boundless creation are sounding amid the harmony of spheres, and through space, time, and eternity the endless praises of the only God."

Effects of Tobacco on Man.—In small doses, tobacco causes a sensation of heat in the throat, and sometimes a feeling of warmth at the stomach; these effects, however, are less obvious when the remedy is taken in the liquid form, and largely diluted. By repetition it usually operates as a diuretic, and less frequently as a laxative. In larger doses provokes nausea, vomiting and purging. Though it seldom gives rise to abdominal pain, it introduces a most distressing sensation of sinking at the pit of the stomach. It occasionally acts as an anodyne, or more rarely promotes sleep. But its most remarkable effects are languor, feebleness, relaxation of muscles, trembling of the limbs; great anxiety, and tendency to faint. Vision is frequently enfeebled—the idea confused—the pulse small and weak—the respiration is somewhat laborious—the surface cold and clammy, or bathed in a cold sweat—and in extreme cases convulsive movements are observed. In excessive doses the effects are the same kind, but more violent in degree.

Snuff. Lanzoni states that an indivdual fell into a state of somnolency, and died lethargic on the twelfth, in consequence of taking too much snuff. The habitual use of this substance blunts the sense of smell, and alters the tone of the voice; but I am unacquainted with any other well ascertained effects, though Cullen ascribes loss of appetite and dyspepsia to it. I have known several inveterate snuff-takers, who, after many years use of this substance, have, discontinued the use of it with impunity; but Dr. Cullen states that when the discharge of mucus is considerable, the ceasing or suppression of it by abstaining from snuff, is ready to occasion the very disorders of the head-ache, tooth-ache and opthalmia, which it had formerly relieved.

The smoking of tobacco, by those unaccustomed to, it gives rise to all the before described effects of large and excessive doses. A very interesting case which had almost terminated fatally, is related by Dr. Marshall Hall. It was that of a young man who for his first essay, smoked two pipes. Gmellin mentions two cases of death from smoking, in one of seventeen, in the other eighteen pipes at a sitting. In habitual smokers, the practice when employed moderately, provokes thirst, increases the secretion of saliva and buccal mucus, and produces a remarkably soothing and tranquilizing effect on the mind, which has made it so much admired and adopted by all classes of society, and by all nations civilized or barbarous. The practice of chewing tobacco is principally confined to sailors and is less frequently submitted to our observation, so that we are not so competent to speak of its effects, which probably are similar to those caused by smoking. The application of tobacco to abraded surfaces is a very dangerous practice, and has, in some instances, been attended with violent or even fatal results. Mr. Weston has related a case in which the express juice of tobacco was applied to the head of a boy, aged eight years, for the cure of tinea capitis. Death took place three hours and a half after the application.—Pierra's Materia Medica.

DR. NOTT'S ADVICE TO A PUPIL.

The following Letter written some years ago by the distinguished President of Union College to a graduate who passed under the immediate eye and Guardianship of Dr. Nott, as he was about to take his seat in the Legislature of this State, having fallen accidentally into our hands, we hope the writer and the friend to whom it was written will pardon us for giving a wider range to the golden rules conceived in abounding wisdom and expressed with such precision and compactness:—

Union College, 20th Jan., 1836.

Dear Sir—Since I did not find you in the other day when I called, the interest I feel in your success as a public man, will be my apology for troubling you with a few observations, the observance of which may be of some use.

Do not speak often, and only on important occasions. When you do speak be brief, pertinent, and stop when you have finished. Speak rather in the furtherance of your own objects than in defeating those of others. Endeavor to allay the prejudices which naturally exists between the city and country. Be courteous on all occasions, especially in debate and to your immediate antagonist. Never indulge in personalities, never lose your temper, nor make an enemy if you can avoid it. Conquests may be made by conciliation and persuasion as certainly as by ridicule and sarcasm, but in the one case the chains are silken and sit easy—in the other, iron and gall the bearer.

Though you point your arrows, never poison them; and if the club of Hercules must be raised, let it be the naked club, not entwined with serpents.

These are hints merely, but a word to the wise is sufficient. And with Legislators or others, a man needs to live one life to know how to live another, and since this cannot be done literally, we can only do it in effect, by availing ourselves of the experience of others.

Wishing you every success, I am, in haste, very sincerely yours,

ELIPHALET NOTT.

HYEMATION OF SWALLOWS.

Smellie, in his Philosophy of Natural History, mentions (if I mistake not) three theories respecting the hyemation or wintering of swallows. The first is, that they are known to penetrate into some cavity of the earth, or take up their abode beneath the waters of some secluded pond or forest lake, amid reeds and slime. The second, that they are known to remain from the first of November until the latter part of March in the hollows of fallen trees. The third, and last that it has been fully attested that they assemble at the approach of winter in numberless flocks and migrate southward.

Now I wish not to clash with any fine theory respecting these innocent little birds, neither do I desire entering into any minute disquisition as to the truth of the above mentioned theories; for one I am inclined to believe the second correct, at least in our own climate because I have carefully observed the following fact for years. Our dwelling is some few paces south of Linkland, a village 9 miles north of Cincinnati. Not quite 100 yards below the house is an ancient sycamore, hollow within. Its circumference at the base is about 20 feet, and height 80. Only a few limbs, and these branching from the top, are to be seen. A stream flows at the base though the earth is always swampy. The entrance to the cavity is situated between two large limbs. Near the close of October the swallows were seen entering this hole in prodigious numbers; they did so until cold weather came on. Since that they were never seen until about the middle of April. Every morning for upwards of ten days, have I sat, for many hours, watching the swallows coming out. Between three and five hundred have been seen at one time making their exit. During the day they went to different parts of the country, but immediately after sunset assembled, and in one unbroken line descended, until not a solitary bird was seen.

Grand Northern Railway Post-Office.—Passengers who make the journey for the first time by the mail train of the London and Birmingham railway, will be amused by observing a traveling post-office in the string of carriages. This "Grand Northern Railway Post-Office," as the inscription on its side denotes, is a carriage consisting of two small apartments, one of which is appropriated to the guard, whose duty it is to exchange the bags, and the other is fitted up with a table for sorting letters and holes round the wall for their reception. The maner in which the duties of the clerk and guard are performed in this post-office, is strikingly significant of the new order of things introduced by the railway system. Outside the vehicle a species of net is extended by a hoop, and into this the letter bags are dropped as the train sweeps onwards in its course, the bags which are to be left being at the same time tossed from the window by the guard. The fresh bag of letters being received, is speedily opened, its contents re-arranged and a new bag for the next town being made up, it is projected as before at the place of its destination. By this means, a letter may be written, sent through the post-office and delivered at the distance of twenty miles in the space of a single hour.—[Chambers' Journal.

The Praying Scholars.—A Sabbath School scholar, aged about seven years, was known for some time, after getting up in the morning, to go into a garret at the top of the house. His mother (who was a widow,) called him one day to come down to breakfast; her son not answering, she went softly up stairs, and when she got near the door of the garret, she heard her child fervently praying that God would pardon his sins, bless the Sabbath School, &c. When he came down, his mother asked him whether he had a book; he burst into tears, and said, "No, mother, but I go up and pray every morning."

NO. VI.—SAINTS THE WORKMANSHIP OF GOD.

Eph. ii. 10.—For we are his workmanship.

That Saints are the workmanship of God, is a truth which is often taught in the Bible; it is the prominent sentiment of the first and second chapters of Paul's epistle to the Ephesians, and it is explicitly declared by the words of the text. It is my present purpose to illustrate—

IN WHAT SENSE SAINTS ARE THE WORKMANSHIP OF GOD.

1. Not merely that they are constituent parts of his general Creation. In this sense, the sun, moon, and stars, the earth, the sea, rocks, plants, and rivers—are his workmanship.

2. Nor merely that he gave them existence as beings. In this sense irrational animals are his workmanship.

3. Nor merely that he made them rational beings, endowed with natural capacities for his service.

In this sense, the greatest enemies to Saints, and to God himself, are the workmanship of God. Saints are the workmanship of God, not merely as parts of his general creation, or as his beings, or as his rational beings—but as Saints.

4. Saints are God's workmanship, not merely in this sense, viz: that he assisted them to become Saints.

5. Nor are they his workmanship in any such sense as implies that while they were passive, God implanted within some taste, or relish, from which holy affections flow. Nor,

6. That they became saints through the potency of motive, or what is often called "moral suasion"—in any such sense as to render the agency of the Holy Spirit in accomplishing the work, less conspicuous than it is represented to be in the reply which I now subjoin:—

7. Saints ARE the workmanship of God in this sense, viz:—By the influences of his Spirit, accompanying the truth, GOD caused them to love Him supremely.

This sentiment is clearly exhibited by the context: After stating that the Ephesians were once dead in trespasses and sins, and were by nature the children of wrath, even as others, St. Paul adds, "But God, who is rich in mercy, for his great love wherewith he loved us, Even when we were dead in sins, hath quickened us together in Christ; (by grace are ye saved;) And hath raised us up together, and made us sit together in heavenly places in Christ Jesus; That in the ages to come he might shew the exceeding riches of his grace in his kindness toward us through Jesus Christ. For by grace are ye saved through faith; and that not of yourselves: it is the gift of God: Not of works, lest any man should boast. For we are his workmanship, created in Christ Jesus unto good works, which God hath before ordained that we should walk in them."

This faith through which we are saved, we know to be that "faith which works by love, and purifies the heart." That the source of faith, and all other christian graces, is love, cannot be more fully expressed than by Paul in the 5th chapter of his Epistle to the Romans:—"Therefore being justified by faith, we have peace with God, through our Lord Jesus Christ: By whom also we have access by faith into this grace wherein we stand, and rejoice in hope of the glory of God. And not only so, but we glory in tribulation also: knowing that tribulation worketh patience; And patience, experience; and experience, hope: And hope maketh not ashamed; because the love of God is shed abroad in our hearts by the Holy Ghost which is given unto us."

When the faith of this same holy Apostle, as one distinguished branch of his supreme love to God, was strongly manifested by his "earnestly desiring to be clothed upon" with his heavenly habitation—he declares, "Now he that hath wrought us for this self-same thing is God."

Persons who were "haters of God," by the agency of the Holy Spirit, have been caused to love God supremely; and in the exercise [illegible] this love they exhibit faith, submission, repe[illegible]nce, and all other Christian graces; and a[illegible] persons are therefore called Saints. [illegible]ing that I have succeeded in illustrating [illegible] what sense Saints are the workmanship of [illegible] INFERENCES will claim our attention. [illegible] 1. We infer,—Saints are God's pecu[illegible] workmanship. We have no evidence that God has any workmanship in the Universe like them. He has other holy beings, but he created them holy, and they have remained holy ever since they were created. Those who are now Saints were once unholy—the enemies of God—rebels against God—and God hath caused them to become holy; or, in other words, by the gospel he has caused them to begin to exercise love to Him. Saints are God's peculiarly glorious workmanship.

2. If Saints are the workmanship of God in the sense which we have explained, then he must have designed to cause them to love Him, before he accomplished the work.

To say he had no design to do it, would divest him of all his glory in performing the work. He did not create earth, sun, moon, and stars, without previously designing to create them; and he has never caused rebels to begin to love him, without previously designing to do so. We infer,

3. If he designed to cause them to love him before he did it, then he must have entertained this design from Eternity. Did he design to cause a rebel to love him, a month before he accomplished the work, and was the purpose new to him then? Vary this question, (if you please,) and insert the word year, century, age, or any designation of space of time which you prefer, instead of month, and you may be trusted to give the answer. It must be clear to every one whose heart the Lord hath prepared to receive this truth, that,

> "Thus the eternal counsel ran,
> Almighty Grace, arrest that man."

4. We infer, that the doctrine of ELECTION is in perfect harmony with the free moral agency of man.

If this doctrine were, that God hath determined to take certain persons to heaven, 'let them do what they will'—then we must oppose the doctrine, or relinquish our defense of free moral agency. But the simple statement of the doctrine is,—that God hath purposed from Eternity, to cause certain rebels to love Him. If there be nothing in the mode of performing the regenerating work of the Spirit, that militates against man's agency, (and this is never asserted by any believer in regeneration,) then how can the agency of man receive detriment from the fact, that the purpose of God to exert his regenerating grace in the hearts of certain individuals, existed from Eternity? If he performs the regenerating work at all, he must have purposed to perform it: the purpose of course existed prior to the performance of the work—and how can the agency of man be affected by the question, How long before the performance of the work did the purpose exist?

Perhaps my illustrations can be placed in a more simple form, by appealing to your own individual experience:—You think you are a Christian: if so, you are conscious that you became such by the regenerating agency of the Holy Spirit. Thus you are God's workmanship. Did God mean to cause you to become a Christian, or did he not mean to do it? If he did not mean to do it, then he acted in this, his great work, without any intention whatever! or he acted against his intentions!! If he did mean to do it, then how long did his purpose exist before the work was done? Do you feel that your agency has been impaired by the prior existence of this purpose?

5. If Saints are the workmanship of God, then it becomes them to live holy in this ungodly world.

Those who profess to be Saints, but give little or no evidence by their lives that they love God, bring great reproach upon the cause of the Redeemer.

When we were dead in sin, we walked in trespasses and sins; if we now trust we are Christians, let us walk in good works—or we shall give no evidence that 'we are God's workmanship,' "created in Christ Jesus unto good works."

6. We infer—That when we pray God to regenerate the hearts of sinners, we pray for the accomplishment of a great work. We pray that they may become Saints; that in this sense they may be God's workmanship. See what they are now; consider what we entreat God to do for them; how great the work! All sinners may love God this moment, if they will; but they never will, unless God cause them to do it. If God should cause them to love him, they will do it in accordance with the full exercise of the powers of their moral agency, and in the accomplishment of his own eternal purpose, and in answer to the prayers of his own people.

When in answer to prayer, God causes any impenitent sinner to become a devoted Saint—all who have prayed for his regeneration, and his neighbors, and all the inhabitants of heaven, in view of such divine workmanship, exclaim—"Great is the work!" God himself pronounces the work great; and the heart of the regenerated man, being filled with love to God, responds,

> "Great is the work!"
> "AND BE THE GLORY THINE!"

Reasons for not embracing the doctrine of the Trinity.

NO. IX.

MR. EDITOR.—My fifth and concluding reason for not embracing the doctrine of the Trinity, is, that it is not only unscriptural, but involves a plain and absolute contradiction.

The doctrine is, that there are three co-equal, co-eternal, and co-essential persons in one God. It maintains that the Father is Supreme God—the Son Supreme God, and the Holy Ghost Supreme God. And yet, that there are not three Supreme Gods; but one only. This I affirm to be a contradiction. If it be not, it is impossible for me to conceive of a contradiction. Either there is no proper personal distinction, or no division of agency in the Godhead, or else each person, distinct from the other, cannot be truly and perfectly God. Doctor Taylor very pertinently remarks, "that there can be no real distinction between the Father and the Son, unless they so differ from each other, that what is peculiar to the Father is wanting in the Son, and what is peculiar to the Son is wanting in the Father. Now that property which belongs exclusively to the Father, or the Son, must be numbered among the perfections of God; for in the Divine nature no imperfections can exist. It follows, then, that some perfection is lacking both in the Father and in the Son, so that neither is endowed with infinite perfection, which is essential to the Divine nature. It must be conceded, then, that the essence of the Father and the Son is not one and the same." Stewart's letters to Channing, page 49. This reasoning appears conclusive. It cannot be said with truth that each of the three persons possess all the perfections of the Godhead, and, yet, that there is but one God. If the first part of the proposition be true, it involves, inevitably, the doctrine of Tritheism, for aught I can possibly conceive to the contrary. Either there is no distinction of persons in one and the same God, or each of the three can be only one third part of God. Besides, I can see no real difference between a person and a being. To say that there are three persons in one God, appears tantamount to saying that there are three beings in one being, which every one will admit to be a glaring absurdity and contradiction.

The same absurdity and contradiction appear to me to belong to the doctrine of two whole and perfect natures in Christ. It seems tantamount to saying that he is two beings, and yet but one being. The divine nature must mean all the essential properties and attributes of God—in fact, the entire being of God, else he is not any God, as the notion implies. And the human nature must mean all the essential properties and attributes of a man, or, in fact, the entire being of a man. Therefore, to bring these two together so as to constitute but one person, or one complex person, or being, without confounding the natures, is manifestly making him consist of two distinct beings, and yet but of one being, which is directly contradictory and impossible. It is but saying that he is God, and yet not God—that he is infinite, and not infinite—and that he is what he is not, and is not what he is. I cannot, for my own part, clothe such contrary propositions in the garb of mystery, and so receive it as a part of the counsel of God.

I have now, as briefly as seemed practicable, given my reasons why, "as a conscientious believer in the proper unity of God, I cannot also embrace the doctrine of the Trinity." While I entertain a high respect for many brethren who strenuously advocate that doctrine, I feel solemnly bound to bear testimony against it. This testimony I have intended should be candid and respectful: and if any thing has dropped from my pen of the contrary description, I am willing my faults should be pointed out. And, I think I may further add, without giving offense, that it is my serious and deliberate belief that the doctrine I have opposed is one of three prominent errors introduced into the church about the same period, viz: the latter part of the third century, or the beginning of the fourth—the other two being infant baptism and a first-day Sabbath, or rather memorial. The Seventh-Day Baptists have very properly rejected the two last; but unhappily, as I think, have retained, as a body, the first. Now I am for giving up all the three. I have, by Divine assistance, openly renounced them all. And my desire is ardent that the brethren I am permitted, through the medium of the Register, to address, might also carry the work of reform through. And, then, what an important influence would their examples and labors have upon the great mass of Christian professors! What facilities would be thereby furnished for carrying the blessed gospel to the Jews! If they should go to that long neglected people, not only with the acknowledgment of the true Sabbath, but with the declaration of the anti-Trinitarian view of God with which their scriptures abound, and which they, as a nation, have ever embraced, and do still embrace, and should preach to them as Paul did, "that Jesus Christ is the Son of God," and prove it out of their own scriptures, what blessed effects might be expected to follow! Might we not hope that the gospel would have free course among them, again, as it did before the above errors were introduced?—And, not only this, but much would be likely to be done to remove the barriers which now exist in the way of Christian communion. I confess my heart expands with desire and hope. But I forbear to proceed further at present.

I thank you, Dear Sir, for your liberality and kindness in publishing the effusions of my pen, and will wait patiently for Br. Johnson's reply, intending to receive it in Christian candor, and to judge of it in the light of God's blessed word.

In the meantime, I am very respectfully yours in the Lord,

JABEZ CHADWICK.

ON PHILOLOGY.

BY NOAH WEBSTER.

In the great efforts now making to improve Education, much attention is given, and with good effect, to the construction of suitable buildings for schools, and to the manner of teaching. But the principle solicitude seems to be to learn how to teach, rather than what to teach. This observation is applicable chiefly to instruction in our vernacular language.

In consequence of the general neglect of English Philology in Great Britain for a century past, the knowledge of the origin of words and of their primary signification, is, to this day, very generally superficial. We have numerous books for teaching the language, but most of them containing new editions of old mistakes, or old usages now obsolete.

Several English Dictionaries of modern publication, compiled by men who have not dared to risk their popularity by deviating from Johnson, retain the old spelling, as in musick, publick, and in errour, superiour; a spelling which, for half a century past, has been corrected in almost every respectable publication, both in Great Britain and the United States. Upon the authority of these Dictionaries, several spelling books have been compiled with this orthography, and introduced into schools.—These books are used chiefly in the State of New York. It is not a little surprising that one-third of the children in that great State should be subjected to the necessity of learning an orthography, which they must certainly abandon in after life. That old spelling can never be generally revived.

The use of Walker's Dictionary, as a standard of pronunciation is less surprising, as the work was at first represented to be the standard in England. This was a mistake. No universal standard is admitted in England; the higher classes of society rarely consult a book to learn pronunciation, and still more rarely do they follow any particular books. Pronunciation is in England regulated almost wholly by the usage of the higher orders of men.

Most of the English Orthoepists incline to favor the pronunciation of stage-players, and of fashionable people who adopt it.—But there are some classes of words in which the nation do not follow the stage. Several writers on Orthoepy, more recent than Walker, utterly condemn his pronunciation of several classes of words.

From several months' residence in England, and from frequent intercourse with literary characters, and others in London and Cambridge, I found that, with few exceptions, the pronunciation of words in England is precisely the same as my own; and in accordance with that of educated men throughout New England. In some of the words, in which the English differ from us, the pronunciation in this country agrees better than the English with analogy and orthography; in other cases, there seems to be no good reason for preferring one mode to another, and either mode is considered as respectable.

In Etymology, there is no English Dictionary which is not extremely superficial, and defective; and in a multitude of words, erroneous. Dr. Johnson was cautious and judicious; he had never investigated the origin of English words, to any great extent; and he rarely ventured beyond his depth.

Very different has been the course pursued by Richardson. This author cites as authorities the "Elders of Lexicography," as he calls them; Junius, Skinner, Minshaw, Vossius and Wachter; but he has relied much on Horne Tooke. The "Elders" never ascended to the true sources of knowledge, on this subject; they were wholly unacquainted with the primary and most important principles on which languages are formed, and had no knowledge of several of the languages from which English words are derived. Horne Tooke unfolded some important facts in Etymology; but his researches were limited, and much of his Diversions of Purley consists of hasty conjectures. His work abounds with mistakes. Richardson has given us the opinions and vague conjectures of these authors; but many of his Etymologies are so erroneous as to be ridiculous. So numerous are the mistakes of the "Elders" which he has communicated, as to render the publication of them in this country an injury to our literature.

From these or other superficial authors, Salem Town seems to have borrowed many of his explanations of the prefixes and suffixes of English words, in his Analysis of Derivative Words. Many parts of this work are correct and valuable; some parts of it are superfluous and useless; other parts of it erroneous. Take the following examples:

The final letter y the author considers as giving three different senses; as in slavery, factory, and wealthy. But y in factory is from a source wholly distinct from y in wealthy.

The terminating syllables ly, ee, dom, ling, hood, some, full, less, the author tells us are from the German. He might with equal truth have said, that the German corresponding words are derived from the English. All the Teutonic languages are of one stock; all equally ancient; and no one is derived from the other. The terminating words and syllables above mentioned are all native words; all English and Saxon; and the author's mistakes ought not to enter our schools.

The author says the termination ment is from the French; but it is from the Latin, often but not always through the French.

Dom, says the author is from the German thum, implying a collection of things. This is all a mistake.

Able, the author tells us, Horne Tooke derives from the Gothic abal, strength.—This derivation is a gross mistake.

The author tells us that the terminations sion and tion are sometimes formed from Latin nouns by the addition of n to the nominative case, as in natio, nation. This is a mistake. The nominative case in this class of words, as in others, is contracted by the loss of n. The fact is directly the reverse of what the author supposes.

The author tells us that ght in English are the equivalent for the German cht. But these letters are neither prefix nor suffix, and have nothing to do with this subject.

Ling, the author says, is borrowed from the German, which is a mistake; and he says further, that it is commonly used as a diminutive. This is not correct: Firstling, darling, hireling, fatling, worldling, and others, are not diminutives.

There are other mistakes in this work, which I will omit.

The Grammars of the English Language are so incorrect, that in my view, it would be well not to use them in schools; but let children learn the language by reading good authors. In this way, their language would be generally, though not always correct; but they would not waste time and labor in learning what is not true.

It is a great fault in many of our schools, that pupils are hurried forward too fast, without being well drilled in the rudiments of the language. Another fault is, the imposition, upon the pupils, of too many studies at once. The proper course of instruction is, as Locke has observed, to teach one thing at a time. It is this practice of hurrying children forward in their studies, which has led to the attempts to teach them spelling and definition at the same time. This practice can succeed only in the explanation of familiar words; it can not be useful in defining abstract terms, in the first stages of learning. And the attempt to define words by their synonyms, to be useful, must be conducted by persons far more competent than teachers in general; or it will do more harm than good.

When I consider the low state of English Philology in Great Britain, as well as in this country; when I see the French controlleur, from contre and rolle, a counter register, converted by a blunder into comptroller, a computer of registers, and this nonsensical title given to an officer of the treasury, by congress and some of the states, and disfiguring the public laws and records; when I see that a mistake of the origin of the word fee has led the English nation to explain the feudal system on wrong principles; when I see such words as disannul, unloose, and handy work; two of which are nonsense, and the other a mistake, that perverts the scripture; such words, I say, continue in the common version of the Scriptures age after age; little hope can be entertained that our language can ever be purified from errors. It certainly can not be done, without more scholarship, and more good taste, than our literature now exhibits.

DESPOTISM OF FASHION.

God has made all the luxuries of life to be perishable; while the necessaries are more permanent. He knew that men would set their hearts on having beautiful coverings for the body, and, if in their power, multitudes would expend their lives and property in accumulating a rich wardrobe, to be handed down to posterity. He therefore created the little moth, and bade him go and stand at the door of the wardrobe, and consume what would else become a heavy curse upon man. This method of gratifying the heart has, therefore, been cut off—and the vainest man living has no desire to have it engraved upon his tomb-stone, that he left so many garments to his heirs.

But pride and vanity could not be driven away from superintending the dress, by the moth; and, instead of seeing how long they can keep a garment, the problem now is, to see how short a time it can remain, before it shall be too unfashionable to be seen. But as vanity never had a popular name, she stands behind the curtain, and her voice is denominated fashion; and this becomes as real a deity as was ever dreaded and worshiped. Her laws seem wholly capricious, but he would be called a despot indeed, who could hope to be obeyed half as implicitly.

The home, the temple, and the altar of fashion, is the great city. There she is sure to have votaries that are numerous—there are her richest offerings—there her priests and priestesses are warming over her shrine, and inspired and maddened by her breath. If opposition is made, Argument wields his club in vain; Reason raises his sober, manly voice in vain; Ridicule throws his arrows in vain; Satire snaps his lash in vain; for Fashion, when these are panting with their efforts to dethrone her, has but to raise her finger, and the crowd rush to do her bidding.

Multitudes live only to watch her nod; and the greatest fear which heaven, earth, or hell can cause, is the fear it should be supposed that they could be guilty of violating a single rule, or neglecting a single whisper of Fashion. Among all the tyrants that ever afflicted the human race, there never was one whose commands were so imperious—whose sceptre of iron was so heavy, whose frown was so awful, or whose look was so withering. I dare not call hard names, nor do I wish on this occasion to make war upon her, for he must be a hardy man indeed who would deliberately cross swords with her, even if he might stand in the pulpit to strike. But I say there is one arm that is stronger than Fashion. The gospel of Christ dares sometimes neglect, and even resist her commands. While thousands and thousands in the city are waiting around her shrine to see what she will next demand, and while ten times that number, in all the extended country, are waiting to follow in the train; and while nothing is so expensive, nothing so uncomfortable, nothing so hard to breathe in, as to cause a moment's hesitation about its adoption—the fear of God can deliver all these slaves from their cruel bondage.

Suppose now that for one year, the Spirit of God should be poured out on the capital of France, and should fully baptize that multitude with the Spirit of Jesus Christ. What would be the results? The fashions of the whole earth would be altered, reduced as to expense, and every way simplified. No arithmetic can tell the amount of money saved in a single year. One hundred millions a year would be a small calculation for what would be saved in this country alone.

It is almost incredible how much may, and does, depend upon the decision of one of the high priests of fashion there, when that decision is to determine whether half a yard of cloth, more or less, shall go into a garment, or whether the needle shall put another sprig into its curious productions. Millions of money depend upon every such decision.

But the time will come, when Holiness unto the Lord shall be written upon the bells of the horses, i. e., when all fashions shall be under the control of the religion of the Bible; and just so far as this religion does come into the great city, and take hold of the human heart, in that proportion is the soul delivered from the thraldom of fashion.

We speak not merely of the expense to which fashion puts individuals and families, but we speak of the time it takes to chase her shadows—we speak of the intellect that is frozen and benumbed, of the affections that are absorbed, and which she remorselessly consumes—we speak of that awful spell upon society by which home is made a strange place, and, indeed, nothing but a dressing place—which takes the mother's heart away, and puts the heart of the ostrich in its place—which can make God's image the cold temple of folly—which can make God's Bible, and God's Sabbath, the food for contempt and mockery—and which can shut the soul away from the appeals that come from the grave, and can substitute the mummeries of fashion even for the real want of sorrow over departed friends, and which can bar the soul from the calls of mercy, inviting her to heaven.

If there be yet one mercy to be received from the Bible, pertaining to this life, greater than all others yet bestowed, it will be given on that day, when the gospel of Jesus Christ shall go into the great city, and make Fashion leave her throne, and come and sit at the feet of Jesus. Then will men be free indeed, and then will the narrow pathway to the skies be crowded with pilgrims.—Rev. J. Todd.

THE REGISTER.

De Ruyter, July 2, 1841.

THOMAS E. BABCOCK is a traveling agent for this paper.

The Rich Church Member.

"I shall get Mr. ——— into the church as soon as possible, for he is worth $8,000." Such was the language of an accredited minister of the ——— denomination, living in B——. If dollars and cents are the constituent elements of Christ's church—if the rich only are worthy to be members of it, then this zeal of Mr. —— was laudable, and his labor, if he was successful, will doubtless have its reward. We should conclude that the soul was comparatively valueless, if nothing else than $8,000 would inspire a minister with such determined zeal to add another member to his church. And we think, too, the gospel must have been materially changed since the days of the Apostles, if the above is a true exhibition of its present characteristics.

But if the gospel has not changed—if souls are as valuable, as represented by Jesus Christ—if the gift of God cannot be purchased with money, then what must be the character of that man, sustaining the name of Christ's minister, who would sell indulgences for $8,000. Perhaps we should judge rashly if we should say, that he would compare well with him who sold his Lord for "30 pieces of silver."

This case is one, of many, that gives the fullest evidence of radical departure from the truth as it is in Jesus, by those who are ordained to declare the truths of the everlasting gospel. Adventitious circumstances connected with personal convenience, have thrown a mist before the eyes, so as to shut out in a measure the purity of the gospel. The pride of numbers and wealth have likewise contributed their aid, to lessen down the standard of gospel purity and gospel requirements, so as to make them conformable with the maxims of the world. In the pristine days of Christianity, the ministers of Jesus preached Christ and him crucified. Christ himself taught that it was easier for a camel to pass through the eye of a needle than for a rich man to enter the kingdom of heaven. And the fullest evidence is evinced repeatedly in the teachings of Christ and his disciples, that a renunciation of the world is necessary to discipleship. The history of primitive Christians is replete with testimonials that the members of Christ's church had renounced the world, and took the spoiling of their goods patiently. The spirit now extant, which is emulous of numbers rather than purity, is in perfect contrariety to the teachings of Christ and his disciples, and altogether unworthy of primitive christians.

Are not all souls alike valuable? If so, why do any heralds of salvation feel more in earnest to have the rich gathered into the kingdom than the poor? Did Christ labor for this special purpose? Christ returned word to John, that the poor have the gospel preached unto them. We seriously question whether he has not departed from the example of Christ, who shows respect to persons in his labor on account of their riches or other fortuitous circumstances.—All things dwindle into insignificance to him whose heart is right with God, when compared with the immortal soul. What are houses or lands, or richly hoarded treasures? What are kingdoms and thrones, and empires, or even worlds, in comparison with the soul that never dies? All combined are incapable of any manner of comparison. And yet, (Oh, let it never be told!) a professed minister of this glorious gospel that bringeth salvation MUST get Mr. —— into the church, not for the value of his soul, but for the sake of his $8,000.

Another picture of the same spirit is exhibited in covering up crime in the church of God. We are incapable of judging between that spirit that will bring men into the church for their money, or retain them for the same purpose. Both are alike inconsistent with the gospel. A small church, poor, yet rich in faith and good works, is more lovely in the sight of God, than one large in numbers, great in wealth, yet feeble in piety and virtue. Who has not seen the drunkard or debauchee retained in the church because he was a man of wealth or influence? while the poor are thrust out in haste? [illegible]

If we mistake not, it will not be asked to professors in the judgment day, were you a member of such a church? The principle on which rewards and punishments will be administered, will be obedience to the word of God. It will matter not there whether a man is possessed of much or little of earth's treasures. And it will not be of advantage to the Minister that he has added numbers to his flock without increasing obedience.

Another exhibition of an improper zeal is sometimes seen in special efforts for a revival. It is a matter of great astonishment that persons of sense and discernment will lose the exercise of their judgment, and resort to almost every expedient to raise an excitement; and it is a matter of equal astonishment that any will be gulled by things so discordant with the gospel. Jesus Christ and him crucified is not their theme, but the wild imaginings of a discordant brain, and newly invented expedients to excite, are thundered forth in its stead. While some are disgusted, others are excited with merriment, and others still are frightened with the wild vagaries, and made to believe when the excitement has subsided that they have been born of God. We have so often witnessed scenes of this character, that we are led thus to speak. Hundreds of souls are, doubtless, sealed over to perdition every year by such measures as these. Whereas, if Jesus Christ and him crucified—the depravity of the heart—and the necessity of regeneration had been properly set forth, they might have been gathered into the fold of Christ. We believe in special efforts for the salvation of souls. All that we ask, is, that these efforts be directed by the word and spirit of God, as they frequently are.

Annoyances.

All who have traveled much, whose stomachs have not been depraved, and their sense of decency destroyed, have doubtless frequently been annoyed by the fumes and profanities of Bar-rooms. We speak not of all Bar-rooms, for there are many honorable exceptions. We mean those where the fumes of tobacco and alcohol sometimes almost strangle the traveler as he enters the door, and when the above commodities form a sort of carpet, and the profane and licentious speech of a besotted crew greet his unwilling ears. Houses of such description are frequently to be met with by the traveler where he is sometimes compelled to spend a wretched hour, before he can again proceed on his journey. Against such places we speak. They seem to us like the porticoes of the pit; and we can appreciate the language of King James, in his counterblast on Tobacco, the fumes of which he represents as nearly resembling the smoke of the Stygian pit, which is bottomless.

Houses for accommodation and refreshment are needed, and we have been happy frequently to find a pleasant home for a season where every thing wore the aspect of decency. But we suggest that a groggery and smokery is not needed; and instead of being licensed, they ought to be regarded as public nuisances by the proper authorities, and treated as such. They are the nurseries of profanity and crime. They afford a quick passage to the gates of death.

Mr. CHADWICK has this week closed his arguments upon the subject of the Trinity. He has shown much ability, and made, at least, a plausible argument, and to his own mind, and perhaps to others, doubtless, an incontrovertible one. It is not our province or wish, at present, to give our opinion upon the question. Mr. Johnson will reply in a series of articles, the first of which will appear next week. When he has closed, our readers will be prepared to judge of the subject as presented by them. We trust that the subject will receive from our readers that attention which its importance demands, and, after all has been said, examine it in the light of the scriptures, and decide as they alone teach.

American Intelligencer,

A monthly newspaper, devoted to subjects, Moral, Political, and Politico-economical, has this week come to our table. The first number contains the familiar letters of Joseph John Gurney, addressed to Henry Clay, describing a winter in the West Indies. The paper depends entirely on voluntary contributions for its support. Those who wish it are requested to send their contributions, directed, "Editor of the American Intelligencer, care of J. Dobson, 106 Chesnut st., Philadelphia."

Shiawassee Argus and Clinton Advocate.

A very respectably appearing sheet bearing the above title hails us from the "Far West." It is published at Owosso, Shiawassee co., Mich., by EDWARD L. AMENT, and is neutral in politics, taking for its motto—"Equal justice to all."

Death of Major General Macomb.

We are pained to announce the demise of Major General ALEXANDER MACOMB, at Washington, a few days since. General Macomb was appointed Commanding General of the Army of the United States some twelve years since, which station he has ever filled in a manner that will strew laurels of praise over the tomb of a fallen hero.

Celebration of the 66th Anniversary of American Independence.

The Committee appointed for the purpose of arranging the order of the day, for the celebration of the 66th Anniversary of our National Independence, (to be held in this village on Monday, July 5th,) have adopted the following:—

ORDER OF THE DAY.

At sunrise, a National Salute of thirteen guns will be fired, accompanied with music, by the De Ruyter Band, from the tower of De Ruyter Institute.

At 10 o'clock, the people will assemble at the Seminary square, where Maj. Ira Gage Barnes, the Marshal of the Day; H. Coleman, Allen Sutton, and S. D. Dellay, Assistant Marshalls, will form the procession in the following order:—

1. De Ruyter Band.
2. The President, Dr. A. L. Saunders; Vice President, J. N. Elmore.
3. Revolutionary Soldiers.
4. Orator and Reader.
5. Clergymen.
6. Children.
7. Ladies.
8. Gentlemen Citizens and Strangers.

The Procession will march at the sound of music, from the Seminary square to the Presbyterian Church, where the following order of exercises will be observed:—

1. Vocal Music, accompanied with the organ.
2. Prayer, by the Rev. J. B. Pixley.
3. Reading the Declaration of Independence, by A. V. Bentley, Esq.
4. Vocal Music.
5. Oration, by S. N. Sweet, Esq.
6. Vocal Music.
7. Prayer, by Rev. J. R. Johnson.
8. Benediction, by Rev. James Bailey.

The Procession will then march again in the same order as before to the Seminary square, where refreshments and dinner will be taken; after which, remarks suited to the occasion may be made by those who may be disposed. The Band will also play appropriate airs.

The Band of Music will occupy the second Piazza of the Institution.

The President, Vice President, Revolutionary Soldiers, Orator, Reader, Clergymen, &c., will occupy the first Piazza.

Opportunity will be given to those friendly to the Celebration of our National Independence, to subscribe towards defraying the expenses of such Celebration, on the morning of the 5th, at the store of John N. Elmore, or sooner if they please.

FOREIGN NEWS.

From the New York Observer.

By the Steamer Columbia arrived at Boston we have news from Europe to the 4th inst.

The most important news by this arrival, is the capture of the Bogue Forts and the city of Canton by the British forces. The cause of the re-commencement of hostilities has been the Emperor's refusal to ratify the treaty entered into between Capt. Elliott and the Chinese Commissioner, Keshen. The Canton Press says, "that every thing wears the appearance of a protracted war."

This news from Canton advanced teas 2da3d per lb.

The general appearance of the crops in Europe indicated favorable harvests.

The Cotton market at Liverpool remained in a very dull state.

In the House of Commons, May 24th, Sir Robert Peel brought his resolution expressing a want of confidence in the Ministry on the part of the House, &c. The debate continued from day to day till third, without any question being taken.

The Liverpool Mercury of June 4th says:—We are still without any intelligence of the long-missing President. She sailed on the 10th of March so that 85 days have elapsed since she left New York; and though we are reluctant to abandon all hopes of her re-appearance, it is impossible not to entertain the most serious apprehensions as to her fate.

Accounts from Syria, to the 11th inst., represent the country to be in a highly excited state, and an outbreak was daily expected. The French had been distributing considerable quantities of money.

Accounts from Belgrade state, that the insurrection in Bulgaria had been suppressed.

CHINA.

Capture of Canton by the English.

From the Bombay Overland Courier, of May 1.

The intelligence received from China during the past month is of a highly interesting and important nature. Our latest news from Macao is to the 31st of March. Keshen's continued procastination having at length exhausted Captain Elliott's patience, the Nemesis steamer was despatched from Macao on the 14th of Feb. with a draft of a treaty for the approval and ratification of the imperial high commissioner. The commander of the steamer was ordered to wait at the Bogue for a reply until the 13th, and in the event of his not receiving one by that date, to return immediately to Macao.

This he accordingly did on the 19th, Keshen not having made his appearance. A circular was then published, stating that the squadron was moving towards the Bocca Tigris. On the following day, Capt. Elliott received a message from Keshen, in which the latter stated his willingness to sign the treaty, and excuses his delay in not coming to the Bogue when the steamer was there, by alleging that he had been detained by some piratical boats. This appears to have been a mere ruse to gain time. On the 24th of Feb. a notification of the renewal of hostilities was issued by her Britannic Majesty's subjects.

Towards the morning of the 25th of February, three howitsers and party of Sepoys were landed at South Wantong from the Nemesis and the boats of the squadron. The Chinese kept up a desultory fire while the darkness lasted. Before the dawn of day a battery had been erected with sand-bags, and the guns got into position. From these as soon as it was sufficiently light the British returned the fire of the Chinese. At 11 A. M., the tide served and the signal was made for the squadron to weigh. H. M. S. Callione, bearing the broad pendant of the Commodore, led the attack against the North Wantong, followed by the Samarange, Druid, Wellesley, Sulphur, and Modeste.

The Blenheim, and Melville, with the Queen steamer, opened their fire on the fort of Anunghoy. By noon the action had become general, and the firing constant and heavy on all sides. In the meantime the Nemesis and Madagascar steamers, with numerous boats in tow, ran in close to North Wantong, and landed the troops under the command of Major Pratt, Shortly after the whole of the forts were in possession of the British forces. Official notifications were issued in the course of the day; one by the Plenipotentiary intimating the capture of the forts, the other by the Commodore authorising merchant vessels to proceed to the Bogue.

The number of prisoners taken at Wantong is estimated at 1000, and the killed and wounded on the side of the Chinese are said to be very numerous.

It is evident that an attack on the Bogue forts should have been resorted to at the onset. The great loss of time and expenditures of public money which has occurred since the arrival of the squadron off Macao, would have been avoided, as also the mortality which has so dreadfully thinned the ranks of the unfortunate regiments that were quartered at Chusan.

That the island has been evacuated and delivered up to the Chinese, orders to that effect having been transmitted by Capt. Elliott when he was laboring under the unhappy delusion that the Chinese were inclined to fulfil their promises of indemnity. The British who were detained prisoners at Ningpoo were released as soon as the evacuation of Chusan was completed.—Capt. Anstruther, Lieut. Douglass, R. N., Mrs. Noble, and their companions in captivity, are now in safety under the British flag.

The whole of the European troops on leaving Chusan proceeded to Hongkong, and consequently have been available in the hostile operations that have been carried on since the date of the action at the Bogue. But no greater proof need to be adduced of the wretched management of Cept. Elliott and the utter incapacity to fulfil the responsible duties of the station which he holds, than the fact that three transports with several hundreds of the Bengal Volunteers were ordered to proceed direct from Chusan to Calcutta.

GREAT BRITAIN.

Steam Communication.

London, June 1.—We understand that the General Steam Navigation Company, whose number of vessels is 50, intend establishing a regular communication between London and New York. A vessel is to start every fortnight from London for New York, and another is to leave New York every fortnight for London. The Company are to employ six of their first class ships, being about 1,300 ton vessels, for this purpose. They are to carry the mails, and to limit their trade to the conveyance of passengers and light goods. The vessels are to call at Portsmouth and Southampton.

Effects of Penny Postage in the London District Post.

The revenue in this Post, (after deducting the receipts on General Post letters collected by this Department,) for the year 1838, the last year totally unaffected by the great reduction of rate, was £118,000; for the year 1840, about £104,000; so that an increase of 13 per cent. only is wanted to make the revenue of 1840 equal to that of 1838. But the present rate of increase is 14 per cent. per annum, so that assuming this rate of increase to continue, the lapse of another year is all that is required for the complete restoration of the gross revenue of this department.

Procession of Tee-totallers.

London, June 1.—The grand annual demonstration of the forces of the tee-totallers and members of various metropolitan temperance societies took place yesterday, and they afforded, by the respectability, neatness, and cleanliness of their appearance, a gratifying proof of the advantageous results of abstinence from intoxicating beverages. The processions were not confined to the male members, but their wives and children in many cases accompanied them. Some went down the river in steamboats, and others proceeded in covered vans to enjoy the fresh air of the country.

RUSSIA AND CIRCASSIA.

The Augsburg Gazette of the 22d ult. states that "letters from Russia announce the commencement of the campaign in Circassia. In one of the first affairs, which was of a most sanguinary character, the Russian Major General, Backvrin, was killed.

FRANCE.

The Regicides.

Darmes, the principal party in the attempt to take the life of King Louis Phillippe last fall, was on the 29th ult., condemned by the Court of Peers to the death of a parricide—that is, "to be conducted to the place of execution in his shirt, his feet bare, and his head covered with a black veil." The Court acquitted Considere and Duclos, but ordered the latter to be sent before the Court of Correctional Police for the illegal possession of arms and ammunition.

Paris, May 31.—The execution of Darmes took place this morning at 7 o'clock. At 5 o'clock all the avenues leading to the Barriere had been occupied by the military, all traffic interrupted, and the people, who had congregated near the scaffold, were driven back a considerable distance. After he had alighted from the carriage his sentence was again read to him. The clergymen then took leave of him, and he ascended the steps of the ladder with a steady pace, followed by the executioners aids. The executioner having placed him with his back to the guillotine, a dialogue appeared to pass between them; and from the negative shake of the head which Darmes occasionally gave, it was supposed that the executioner had held out to him a hope of salvation if he would make revelations. This conversation occupied between three and four minutes; the aids then seized him, and having placed him with his face towards the knife, removed the black veil from his eyes, and took off his shirt. The sight of the instrument of execution appeared to strike him with awe; he started, and feeling rather unsteady on his legs, he made a stride in order to maintain his equilibrium, and then looked on with calmness, surrendered himself into the hands of the executioner, and an instant before the knife dropped he was heard to exclaim—"Vive la France." The body and head were then placed in a basket, and conveyed to the cemetery of Mount Parnasse, where they were interred in the enclosure exclusively reserved for regicides.

Congressional News.

IN SENATE.

Removals from Office.

June 17.—Mr. Buchanan offered a resolution calling on the President for the names of all persons removed from office since the 4th of March last, in any department of the government, and the names of those appointed. The resolution was laid on the table and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Evans replied to the strictures of Mr. Woodbury on the report of the Secretary of the Treasury. In the first place, he maintained that there were no discrepancies in the statement of Mr. Ewing, as declared by the Senator from N. Hampshire; and he further contended that the deficit in the means of the Treasury for the year was plainly made out, and was of so urgent a character as to render the special meeting of Congress necessary. Mr. Evan's speech consisted of statements in which figures are the only essential part.

June 18.—The discussion of the Report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the Finance, was continued by Mr. Woodbury, Mr. Wright, and Mr. Evans—the point at issue being the extent of the deficit in the revenues of the present year.

Mr. Clay's Bank Project.

June 21.—Mr. Clay, from the committee on Currency, made a report, accompanied by a bill establishing a Bank of the United States.

The report was read and the bill made the special order of the day for Wednesday.

Report on the Finances.

The motion to print an extra number of Mr. Ewing's Report on the Finances, was again taken up, and Mr. Calhoun, who was entitled to the floor, spoke at length on the principles and propositions of that report.

National Bank.

June 22.—Mr. Allen, of Ohio, presented the proceedings and resolutions of a meeting in the State of Ohio, condemning the National Bank, and other measures, in strong terms.

Mr. Allen, in the course of his remarks on this memorial, said that, the people of his state would not permit a branch of the U. S. Bank to be located in that state.—They would oppose it by force—and to the last drop of their blood.

Mr. Clay remarked that, if the Whig party had been aware of the full extent of their hazard, in proposing a National Bank, they would not, perhaps, have brought it forward; but as they had done it, and as they considered such an institution absolutely necessary to the country, they must abide the issue

Some resolutions on various general subjects were presented from the Legislature of Connecticut. One of these resolutions is in favor of the one term principle.

Mr. Allen asked, if the resolution extended to the case of a person who was elected as Vice President, but became the President, by the death of a President?

The Senate spent most of the day in the discussion of the bill rechartering the District Banks, which was ordered to be engrossed.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Rules of the House.

June 16.—As soon as the Journal was read, Mr. Stuart of Va., obtained the floor, and offered a proposition intended as a compromise between the members from the slave-holding and non-slave-holding states, in regard to the reception of abolition petitions. He proposed that the Rules of the last House should be adopted for the present session, except so far as they are superceded by the rules now in force, i. e.—the rules which were reported, last Saturday, from the Committee on Rules, and adopted: and which are as follows:

"Upon the presentation of petitions and other papers on subjects not specially referred to the consideration of the House in the message of the President at the opening of the present extra session, objection to the reception shall be considered as made, and the question of reception shall be laid upon the table. This rule to be considered only in force during the present session. Petitions and other papers for or against a bankrupt law to be excepted from the operation of this rule.

The action of all committees on all subjects not specially referred to the consideration of the House in the Message of the President shall be suspended during the present session; this suspension not only to apply to business before the Committee of Elections, of Ways and Means, on Accounts, and on Mileage; nor, if the House shall so determine, to the subject of a general bankrupt law."

Mr. Charles Brown proposed,—

1st. That the rules of the last House be adopted for the government of this House, during the present Congress, with the exception of the 21st rule.

2d. That, in lieu of the 21st rule, the following be adopted as a rule; no petition for the abolition of slavery in the states or of the slave-trade between the states shall be received.

No petition for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia, or in any territory of the United States, shall be received, except from the residents of that territory; and such petitions shall be laid on the table, without reading or consideration.

Mr. Pickens opposed the adoption of any rules. He preferred to remain as we were, under the common parliamentary law, and he believed it would afford more security to the minority, and better promote the interests of the country than any system of rules. For the last four years, the proceedings of the House had been marked with confusion, violence, and disorder, and the defect was, as he believed, mainly in the rules. If either proposition should be adopted, he would prefer that of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. Brown,) because it was more protective of the rights of the South.

After much further debate, and a call of the House, the main question was taken on the proposition of Mr. Stuart, and it was adopted—yeas 119, nays 103.

Resolutions of Enquiry.

June 17.—Mr. John C. Clark offered a resolution for an inquiry, by a select committee, into the waste of stationery by the House, and the expediency of limiting the quantity of stationery used by each member; and also into the best mode of supplying the stationery for the House.

Mr Sergeant advocated this resolution. He said the abuse of the contingent fund of the House, especially in regard to the enormous expense of stationery, was a disgrace to the House. Some mode of limiting the expense ought to be devised,—by charging to the several members the quantity they order; or allowing them in lieu of it, or any other mode. He hoped, too, that the desks themselves, which were the cause of the use of so much stationery, would be removed at the next session. He was sure the public service would be promoted by the change.

Mr. Underwood said the expense of stationery for each member exceeded one hundred and twenty dollars a session. The newspapers had been filled with accounts of this abuse, and great discredit had been brought on the House thereby. The House ought, for the sake of its character and standing before the country, to reform this abuse. It had been alleged that the members not only waste this stationery here, but carry trunks full of it home to their families, and even sell it to grocers.

The resolution passed with various amendments embracing other inquiries.

Provision for General Harrison's Family

Mr. Adams, on the part of the select committee on the demise of President Harrison, moved that the House go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, upon the bill for the relief of Gen. Harrison's family. The motion prevailed, and the bill was taken up. It provides for granting a blank sum to Mrs. Harrison.

Mr. Adams moved to fill the blank with twenty-five thousand dollars. He said there was some difference of opinion in the committee as to the sum—many being for a larger sum. There were precedents for granting to the family of a deceased officer his salary to the end of the year.—General Harrison after a long career of public service, died poor,—a circumstance that afforded strong presumption that he lived pure. The expenses attending his position as a candidate for the highest public honor were necessarily very heavy, as were the expenses consequent upon his election, and removal to this city. The citizens of Charleston, and many other enlightened communities had petitioned Congress to make this provision, and the public press had warmly urged it upon us, as the general wish of the people. Under these circumstances, he trusted it would be unnecessary to dwell upon the subject.

Mr. Cooper, of Pennsylvania, supported the bill, and presented a memorial asking for a larger provision for the object, from a respectable body of citizens of Pennsylvania, of both political parties.

Mr. Snyder, of Pennsylvania, offered an amendment, providing for the payment of 2,000 dollars to the widow of Hon. Charles Ogle, deceased, late Member of Congress elect; and also the payment of 10[illegible] dollars to the widow of Christian Schroger, deceased, in compensation [illegible] a sum of money lost by said Schroger by the robbery of the United States Post Office. Mr. Snyder proceeded, amid cries of "order," to say that he had nothing to urge against the provision for Gen. Harrison's family. He wished to carry out the principles of the bill. No man living or dead, had so much influence in securing Gen. Harrison's election, as had Charles Ogle. If Gen. Harrison was to be allowed twenty-five thousand dollars for his services in the late election,—and that he understood the gentleman from Mass., (Mr. Adams.) was the principle of the bill —surely Charles Ogle was entitled to two thousand. Mr. S. went on to consider the case of Christian Schrogen, and the claims of his bereaved family to the justice and liberality of their country. But Mr. S. was with difficulty clamored down.

Mr. Ward, of New York, spoke in support of the bill. He said he was a member of the House when Gen. Jacob Brown, died. The House, without a dissenting voice, granted to the family of that gallant officer, a full year's pay, and the people approved of the act, as he had no doubt they would of this measure. He should cheerfully support the bill.

Mr. Dean, of Ohio, opposed the bill at length, and very zealously. He said the sympathy for General Harrison was all pretence, and the high estimation of his public services all affection. He did not choose to go into his military career, but he intimated that he would strip it of its plumes. The money, thus proposed to be taken from the Treasury, by the Whigs, at the very time when they had to call Congress to provide means for meeting the ordinary expenditures, was to be paid for partizan services. He said he believed that large sums of money were taken from the Treasury—spent in electioneering during the late election—[an uproar of laughter followed this remark from the Whigs.] It was a profligate federal measure, and would be condemned like all the other whig federal measures, by the people.

Mr. Lane, of Indiana, Mr. White, of Indiana, Mr. Pendleton, of Ohio, and others replied very eloquently to Mr. Dean, and supported the bill.

Mr. Briggs, of Mass., had a respect, he said, for the scruples of those who, on constitutional ground, might oppose this bill. But he could not conceive any proper objection to it on any other ground. There were precedents for the measure in the legislation of Congress, and he had no doubt it was called for by the general voice of the people.

Mr. Gilmer, of Va., said it was evident the debate could not be closed this evening, and as many wished to examine further into the principle of the case, before they voted, he would move that the Committee rise.

June 18.—After further debate, the blank in the bill was filled with $25,000, and the committee rose. The amendment was concurred in, yeas 119, nays 70, and the bill was ordered to be read a third time; was read accordingly, and passed, yeas 122, nays 66.

The Tariff.

June 19.—The House took up for consideration the petition heretofore represented by Mr. Fornance of Pa., praying Congress to revise the Tariff, at this session, with a view to the protection of American industry; and he had moved its reference to the Committee on Manufactures, with instructions to report a bill; in pursuance of the prayer of the petition.

After some conversation and various motions, the petition was laid on the table, yeas 180, nays 66—a certain sign that the House does not intend to go into the Tariff question, generally, at this session. Moreover it was decided by the Speaker, that a tariff for protection is not within the scope of the President's Message.

Resolutions of Inquiry.

Mr. Davis offered a resolution calling for information as to the imprisonment of any American citizens at Van Dieman's land, which was agreed to.

A resolution was offered calling for any further information in possession of the President as to the cases of search, seizure, and detention of American vessels by British cruisers, on the high seas, on pretence of suppressing the slave trade, which lies over.

A resolution was also offered for an inquiry into the proper means of preventing the revenue frauds complained of by the wool manufacturers, which also lies over.

The States were called for petitions, and a great number of Abolition petitions were presented by Mr. Adams, who briefly recited the contents of each petition. Mr. Wise was not present, and therefore little notice was taken of the matter. The petitions went to the table under the rule.

Some dozen or two of petitions for a National Bank were presented and referred to the Committee on the Currency.

Mr. Filmore, from the Committee on Ways and Means, reported a bill making ~~appropriations for the payment of the ex~~penses of Extra Session.

Sub-Treasury.

June 21.—The bill from the Senate repealing the Sub-Treasury act, was taken up for reference. Three motions were made; one for reference to the Committee of the Whole on the state of Union; another to the Committee on Ways and Means; and a third, to the Committee on the Currency. It was referred to the latter.

Bank Project.

The project, heretofore submitted to the House by Mr. Barnard, of N. Y., for a Bank of the United States, was called up by Mr. Hunt, of N. Y., who moved that it be printed for the information of the House. The House refused to print it, but it was referred to the select Committee on the Currency.

Abolition Petitions.

Mr. Adams came in with a band-box full of abolition petitions, which he presented, one by one, briefly reciting the contents. Some he presented, asking the House to rescind the 21st rule, and he added—I hope they will rescind it,—others, which he offered, prayed to be released from military duty in case of the insurrection of slaves, or a servile war. None of these petitions, under the rule, as construed by the Speaker, were received, but were returned to Mr. Adams.

The House was called for resolutions.—Many were adopted on different subjects.

Consul Trist.

A resolution calling for any further information in possession of the Government in relation to the seizure and search of American vessels by British cruisers on the high seas was taken up, and Mr. Adams offered an amendment, calling for the reason for the delay of the action of the Government in the case of Mr. Trist, consul at Havana.

Mr. Adams said, he understood that Mr. Alexander Everett, the agent who was sent to Havana to inquire into the allegations against Mr. Trist, had made a report unfavorable to that functionary; but still the Government had done nothing on the subject.

Mr. Dawson said, time was allowed by Mr. Trist to make his answer to Mr. Everett's report, and the new administration had not yet had time to turn their attention to the matter.

Mr. Adams said, he made no accusation against the present administration; but he hoped they would soon act on the subject. Mr. Trist ought to be recalled. He was still at Havana, and was doing infinite mischief there, as he believed.

Mr. Adam's amendment prevailed and the resolution was adopted.

Fiscal Agent.

Mr. Wise offered a resolution calling on the Secretary of the Treasury for his plan of a Fiscal agent, which, in his opinion, "will remove all scruples touching the question of constitutional power, and thus avoid the objections against those heretofore created by Congress."

Mr. Wise was now more anxious than ever, to obtain this plan, and he proposed to call for it, in the very words of the Secretary.

The resolution was adopted, and Mr. Ewing may perhaps reply to it by communicating to the House the plan of a "Fiscal Bank of the U. S." such as he has laid before the Senate, and which that body is likely to repudiate.

The House went into committee on the bill making appropriation for their own pay, and it was finally passed.

June 22*d* —The day was spent in a discussion to reconsider the reference of the bill from the Senate to repeal the Sub-Treasury.

News of the Day.

Canadian Parliament.—This body, in stormy debates, and disgraceful personalities, bids fair to rival our own Congress. The "British Whig," published at Kingston, bitterly complains of their doings.—Gov. Sydenham will hardly receive the "cordial co-operation" of Parliament, in carrying out his favorite measures. The truth is, that the sooner England casts off the Canadas, the better will it be for all parties concerned. The Whig says:—

"The Session of Parliament has commenced, and so far as the House of Assembly is concerned, a most stormy session it will prove. The most factious spirit inspires the opposition. Immediately after the speaker was chosen, the war commenced. Messrs. Alwin, Hincks and Co., seem to have no other feeling, no other wish, than to annoy the Government. All patriotism, real or affected, is lost in the sentiment, "I hate you and will annoy you." This is unblushingly displayed. Mr. Baldwin, the late Solicitor General, has recently joined the ranks of the opposition. We heartily hope the administration is sufficiently strong to carry out the views of the Governor General; but if the contrary should unfortunately prove the case, there is no other recourse than to dissolve the Parliament, amend the Union Act at home; and, while Canada continues a Colony, rule it by means of a Governor and Council.—It would be utterly useless to call fresh parliaments while a large portion of the people are determined to send thither none but men opposed to the Administration."—Alb. Eve. Journal.

Field Preaching.—The Protestant clergy of Baltimore, at a late meeting, passed the following resolution:

"That, as Protestant Evangelical Ministers of this city, we deem it our duty to make immediate and strenuous efforts to promote more effectually, the cause of vital Christianity, in our city, by preaching the Gospel in the streets, fields, and market places."

In accordance with this resolution, we notice in the Baltimore papers, notices for public meetings at twelve different places in that city on Sunday last, at 5 o'clock, P. M. Two clergymen were to officiate at each place.—Eve. Journal.

Respite.—Gov. Seward has granted a respite to James L. Davis, sentenced to be hung in Buffalo on the 22d inst., until the 20th of August, to enable his counsel to apply to the Supreme Court for a new trial. —Eve. Journal.

Mr. Seabury S. Tompkins, of Pawtucket, as we learn from the Providence Journal, was killed at Providence on Tuesday afternoon, in consequence of being thrown from a wagon, his horse having taken fright. His age was 52. He has left a wife and nine children.—Eve. Journal.

Death of M. Niemcewciz.—The Journal du Debats, of Paris, announces the death of this distinguished Pole, who was for many years a resident in this neighborhood, (at Elizabethtown, N. J., where he married,) and whose name is alike dear to Freedom and Literature in both hemispheres.

The Journal du Debats gives this sketch of his career: [illegible]

Poland has just lost one of its most illustrious and tried citizens in the person of Julien Ursin Niemcewciz, a venerable old man, 81 years of age. From his youth, continued the Debats, he was distinguished for his progress in literature. He was one of the most eminent nuncius of the great Constitutional Diet of 1791. Aid-de-Camp of Kosciusco, wounded and captured by his side, he suffered a long confinement in the dungeons of St. Petersburgh. Having been set at liberty at the accession of the Emperor Paul, he emigrated to America with Kosciusko, the old companion-in-arms of Washington, who granted those exiles an honorable hospitality. Though a cultivator and American citizen, he hastened in 1807 to serve his native country, for whom a new era had commenced, and whose vicissitudes from that period he constantly shared. As Secretary and member of the Senate, Member of the Council of Public Instruction, President of the Society of the Friends of the Sciences, and latterly appointed to a mission to England in 1831, he was incessantly devoted to his country. His literary works in prose and verse were a continual echo of the events which occurred in Poland, and in which he had performed so distinguished a part. The news of his death will cause a considerable sensation throughout Poland.—His numerous friends in France, Great Britain and America, will regret one whose amiable and generous disposition endeared him to all with whom he was acquainted.

Keokuk not Killed.—The Burlington, (Iowa,) Patriot says that this chief is alive, and was at his village last week. He took a white man's spree a few weeks on the Mississippi, and the report of his death may have grown out of that circumstance. It is said he has given himself up to intemperate habits, probable in consequence of so many of his tribe having forsaken him and joined the company of his rival, Hardfish.

The Bunker Hill Monument.—Mr. Savage, the contractor, commenced his operations on the Hill about the first of May, and has laid eight courses. Each course being two feet eight inches in depth, 18 feet 8 inches, have been added to the height, which is now somewhat more than a hundred feet. On an average, one week is consumed in laying a single course. The stones are hoisted by steam power; the engine being some distance from the base of the monument, and no part of the moving power being visible. This sublime monument, when finished, will extend to the altitude of 620 feet above the surface of the ground. The base 13 1-2 feet, is entirely below the surface. The room at the head of the stairs will have a ceiling of grained arches. On each side will be a window, furnished with an iron shutter so constructed, that when closed, there will be no perceptible difference between that and the solid granite. The two upper courses, forming the apex, will consist each of a single block of granite: the upper one will weigh between three and four tons.

THE CROPS.

The Germantown Telegraph says:—"Our farmers have begun in earnest their hay-making, though much of the grass appears, from the backwardness of the spring to be yet growing. The crop generally, is as good as in any ordinary season; and should the weather enable it to be housed without injury, the supply of this staple production, which it really is here, will be equal to the demand at the customary places."

The accounts from the western portion of Maryland are decidedly favorable to the growing crops. In Frederick they had refreshing rains last week. The last Uniontown (Pa.) Democrat, had a paragraph complaining of the drought, but its complaint was cut short by copious rains which commenced falling on Monday.

The Savannah Republican has intelligence from the interior of Georgia, that the promise of the coming corn crop, now considered as half secure, is good—the wheat in Upson county, where the harvest is commencing, is very good; the cotton crop rather poorly for the present.

The Crops of Florida.—The Floridian of the 5th, speaks of the cotton and corn crops of that State as very promising in appearance.—N. Y. Express.

The celebrated wall of China, said to have been erected in the year 213, B. C. is 714 German miles long, 14 feet thick, and 26 feet high; so that, with the same materials, a wall one foot in thickness, and 23 feet high, might be carried round the whole world.

THE MORMONS IN MORE TROUBLE.

Arrest of Joe Smith.—By letters from the Mormon city, it appears that the "Saints" have become involved in nearly as much difficulty with their new neighbors in Illinois, as they formerly encountered in Missouri, and that excitement against them is increasing very fast. It seems that by authority of a vision lately had by Joe Smith, they have squatted on a large tract of land on the opposite side of the Mississippi, and the proceeding is likely to lead to serious disturbance.

Joe has been arrested by the authorities of Illinois, on the requisition of the Governor of Missouri. Martin Harris, who was one of the witnesses to the Book of Mormon, but who has been for some time lecturing in Illinois against Mormonism, was found dead a couple of weeks since, having been shot through the head—doubtless murdered.

A few harmless Mormons, of Lafayette, La., while engaged in worship, at their house of meeting, were attacked by several men and ejected from their building. Every article of furniture, books, &c. were carried out and burnt in the street by the mob. This is the first act of injustice exhibited by Louisianians towards the Mormons, and smacks strongly of persecution.

There are wanting only two or three links to complete the long line of railroad from Maine to North Carolina—24 miles of which are between Hartford, Conn. and Springfield, Mass. and fifty miles from New Haven to the State line of New York, making one entire line from Buffalo on the west, and Portland on the east to the city of Washington in length of over 1000 miles! When this is completed, we shall have an iron line from the east to the west, north to south and southwest, of continued lines, (with the exception of about 50 miles from Washington to Fredericksburg, Va.,) of nearly 2,800 miles.—Boston Trans.

THE WHEAT AND GRAIN CROPS.

CANANDAIGUA, JUNE, 22, 1841.

I have now visited most of the grain growing sections of this State, and have heard by people with whom I am well acquainted, from those in which I have not been, and I assure you that the condition of the grain crop is truly alarming. The wheat crop cannot by any possibility come up to one half of a fair yearly average. There is no mistake upon the subject, for I have taken the greatest pains to arrive at the utmost certainty, and I believe it is hardly possible for me to be mistaken.

The wheat crop of 1839, as appears by the census, was almost eleven millions, and that was an unusually productive year and more than the usual quantity of land was in wheat. There is not as much land in wheat this year as there was in that, so that it is fair to assume that there will be a deficiency in the crop of 1841, in wheat alone of at least six millions of bushels, which will be fully equal to a loss to farming interest of as many dollars.

But the evil does not stop here. All the spring crops will be unusually light. Barley, Oats and Corn, will generally be almost a failure, and unless there is rain soon, the potato crop will hardly return the seed. The spring was so cold and backward that nothing like as much land has been put into grain as is usual. Grass is generally light, and promises but a small return in hay.

The situation of the country is gloomy, for with short crops always come hard times; money gets scarce, and all business gets deranged. We must now look to the Western States, for a supply sufficient to keep up the equilibrium. I fear I shall find the west as bad as our own State.

The United States Circuit Court commenced its session to-day, Judge Tompson presiding, assisted by Judge Conklin. The calender is not large, though there is six or seven criminal causes, to be disposed of at this time.

It will no doubt be hailed as good news by the traveling puplic, that the rail-road will be finished to Seneca Falls within a few days, leaving only 12 miles of land or mud route, from Albany to Batavia.

The weather is dry and warm.

Sincerely yours, P.

Case of a Slave at Newport R. I.—Our Newport Correspondent, under date of the 24th. says that the Brig Relief, Cherryfield, Strout, from Norfolk for St. Johns, N. B., put in to land a slave, who had secreted himself on board at Norfolk, in order to send him back to his owner. The name of the slave is Mansfield Jackson, and we are informed is owned by a widow lady—his guardian's name is Archibald Allen, Suffolk. We learn that Jackson had assisted in loading the brig, and that she had been at sea 7 days before he was discovered. he having provided himself with provisions and water. The brig arrived here late in the afternoon, too late to accomplish the Captain's object—he therefore tied the slave, and retired for the night; but the watch on deck having got asleep, the negro loosed his cords, stole the boat and landed on Goat Island, from thence was conveyed over to town by the person having charge of the fort. We learn that the blacks have taken him in charge, and have contributed money and clothes to his relief; and would convey him to New Bedford. Jackson says he has a wife in New York.

DR. WATERMAN'S

RHEUMATIC AND STRENGTHENING PLASTER.

The peculiarities of this compound are owing to the immediate effects produced on the animal fibre, it being carried by the absorbants to the seat of disease or pain, without producing disagreeable sensations. As an external application it is a powerful auxiliary, and will cure, in all curable cases; such as acute and chronic Rheumatisms, Scrofulous Affections, weakness of back, pain in the side, head and limbs, affections of the Spine, &c &c &c.

This Plaster is warranted to be by far the best ever offered to the public—much superior to "Jew David, or Hebrew Plaster," and at less than half the price.

WINSLOW'S

BALSAM OF HOREHOUND.

An unparalleled remedy for common Colds, Coughs, Asthma, Influenza, Whooping Cough, Bronchitis, and all diseases of the Breast and Lungs, leading to Consumption; composed of the concentrated virtues of Horehound, Boneset, Blood Root, Liverwort, and several other vegetable substances. Prepared only by J. M. WINSLOW, Rochester, N. Y.

The innocence and universally admitted pectoral virtues of the Herbs from which the BALSAM OF HOREHOUND is made, are too generally known to require recommendation; it is therefore only necessary to observe that the Medicine contains the whole of their Medicinal properties, highly concentrated, and so happily combined with several other vegetable substances, as to render it the most speedy, mild, and certain remedy, now in use, for the complaints above mentioned.

Thousands of testimonials will be shown, if wanted, at any time, placing the above medicines beyond reproach.

In conclusion he would only say, that he will not be under-sold on any article which he offers for sale.

THE LEGAL PROTECTION OF THE SENTIMENTS AND AFFECTIONS.

Extract of a Lecture delivered before the Mechanics' Institute of New-York, by E. P. Hurlbut, Esq.

Man is endowed with certain propensities which impel him to a prompt and vigorous defence of his person and his rights; and in the absence of a superior protection, he has always the right to defend himself. Laws for the protection of humanity emanate from man's superior nature, and therefore, whenever it is possible, they ought to furnish a full measure of protection, rather than leave any man to passionate and vindictive self-defence. The most perfect of human laws, and their most rigorous administration, will, however, always leave man exposed in society to aggression, which he may properly resist by force. The law cannot always shield his person from the ruffian's attack, although it might punish the aggressor after his mischiefs are perpetrated. It cannot secure his property from theft or embezzlement, although it may inflict penalties upon the offender. * * * * Taking into view the harmonious action of man's moral and intellectual, as well as his passionate nature, and giving the control to the former, man never could have had the right of vindictive self-redress.

Conscientiousness was ordained under the enlightenment of the intellectual faculties, to determine between the accuser and the accused—between him who demanded and him who withheld right. From his very constitution, as we have seen, man must exist in society—where he can always have an appeal for justice to his impartial fellow men; they immediately sympathize with the injured, and are impelled by their moral feelings to redress his wrongs. If in a moment of excitement, he exceed the limit of defence, and take vengeance, he offends against the moral feelings of his brethren, and wounds his own superior sentiments, so that he feels the agony of remorse, after they regain the just supremacy of his mind. Self-redress, then by way of taking vengeance upon the aggressor, is not a natural right—but a natural wrong; and man in society does but obey the future law of his nature when he looks to the social body for the redress of injuries. In the prevention of wrongs, then the animal powers of the individual may be properly exerted, while in the redress of them, the moral powers of the social body must have exclusive sway.

But benevolence, not less than justice, is all-pervading in human society, and dictates the benign sentiment of mercy and good will to all the sentive creation. It disposes man to desire the prevention of offences, as it shrinks from their punishment, and looks in mercy even upon the vilest offender. It infuses a spirit of philanthropy in the legal code, tempers justice with mercy, and sheds a tear for the victim of the offended laws. It would not, nevertheless, defeat justice, but would prevent the occasion for its exercise; and, under its blessed influences, the social body is stimulated to make provision for the prevention of wrong, and to inflict punishment only as one means of prevention.

But such is the nature of man, that an offence to any of his rights so disturbs the serenity of his mind, and its harmonious action, and produces such a mingled excitement of both his sentiments and his passions, that unless the laws afford him redress, he will take it upon himself to obtain it and he will oftentimes execute vengeance upon the offender; which is the product of conscientiousness, combativeness, and destructiveness, acting in combinaton. For in the act of self-redress, justice often arrays herself in a ruffian garb, and uses the assassin's weapons. Vengeance comes of enraged justice; and greater wrong may be done in the passionate redress of injuries, than in the perpetration by the first offender.–But this wrong proceeds from the disturbed and inharmonious activity of man's innate faculties; and laws emanating from, and adapted to the harmony of his mental forces, must provide for the exclusion of so great an evil in human society. How shall this be done? By a legal recognition of every human right, and guaranteeing to each, as far as possible, a full and complete measure of protection. Humanity will forever cry aloud for the protection of her rights, and for the redress of injuries. And when human law fails to mete out justice to man, be not astonished if he take vengeance. Society claims the right to punish, in order to deter from crime. When it fails to punish, the aggrieved party will be inclined to supply the omission; but if while smarting under a sense of injury, he act out this inclination, he will do that for which he himself will be punishable, and thus will he conceive himself to be the victim of his wrongs. The first comes from society, a wrong of omission in not protecting his infringed rights; the second, an actual wrong from the individual aggressor; and the third, the outrage of society, in punishing him for obtaining redress for himself, which it had failed to afford him. He will conceive himself to be the victim of society, and not unlikely he will be a perverse citizen ever after.

Let me illustrate this with a few examples. The law leaves the citizen perfectly unprotected from the rudest insult by simple speech. His truth, integrity, honor, or courage, may be called to naught; the honor of his wife or daughter may be openly impeached by the rudest assailant; and thus his self-esteem, approbativeness, and feelings of domestic attachment may be woundod in the highest degree—yet the law leaves him to take care of himself. Combativeness and destructiveness, however, do not desert him, but rush to the aid of these wounded feelings, and inflict instantaneous personal chastisement upon the offender. An assault and battery is committed, and Justice now removes the bandage from her eyes, and beholds this as the first wrong.—

She declares that no mere words can justify a battery, and that the man beaten has an action for his damages against him who smote him,—and moreover, that so much does the law abhor bodily strife and desire peace among men, that the battery is subject to further punishment as a misdemeanor, and that he who smote the rude and insolent, must pay a fine to the state, for the offence, and be imprisoned in a common jail for a period fixed by the same just law. How feels the prisoner now? He very naturally wants to inflict chastisement upon the blind goddess himself conceiving that she has done him far the greatest injury in the case.

But let us suppose a far more serious case of wrong; and of a husband injured in the most sacred of the marital rights. He detects the destroyer of his peace, and kills him on the spot. This killing is pronounced manslaughter, for which the injured husband is condemned to the state prison at hard labor for a term of years. But suppose that he refrains from killing at the instant, and challenges the author of his ruin to mortal combat. The coward and villain takes the challenge to the police, and the injured husband is arrested for merely sending the challenge, and condemned to prison as a felon. But suppose the wrong-doer to accept the challenge; they go to the field, and the husband speeds the bullet to his heart; he dies, and in the eye of the law he is a murdered man, and the broken-hearted husband is pronounced a wilful murderer, and expiates his offence upon the gallows! What ought he to have done? What only the law allowed him to do. He should left his house with great equanimity of mind, as soon as he discovered the damning deed which stung him with the agony; he should have abstained even from giving vent to his feelings by words, lest he should have used profane oaths—which the laws punished by a fine. He should have gone to a gentleman of the bar, coolly stated his case, and received for an answer, that as there was no witness to prove the wrong, the law could afford no redress—but in case of a witness then he could have his action and recover a COMPENSATION IN MONEY for his wrong! "Money!—a world's wealth—nay, an universe of worlds," would he not exclaim—"I'll have none of it—I'll murder him and die, for life has ceased to be a blessing now!" And yet, by our law, money atones for his deepest and darkest of domestic wrongs, and when the offender shall have paid the sum ordained, he may go about at noonday, serene and calm, as a gentleman and good citizen! Why mock the injured in such a case, by treating this wrong as one that can be atoned for by money. Retain this sort of redress, if you please, for that order of men who will stoop to receive it; but do not allow a wrong which destroys the happiness of a fellow being for life, to pass with lighter condemnation than the least offence to the right of property. Our laws punish certain injuries to the latter right as felonies. The stealing of property to the value of twenty-five dollars is an infamous crime and punishable by imprisonment in a State Prison for a term of years—and yet how highly is man's happiness affected by the injury thus redressed!

We have statutes for the protection of animals from cruel and inhuman treatment, making it a misdemeanor, punishable by fine and imprisonment; while human affections are left exposed to the deepest wounds, and the wrong-doer may walk abroad the companion and equal of judges and legislators—nay, may sit upon the bench himself, and be clothed with the holy ermine of justice, instead of being condemned to the cells of a prison, to wear a felon's garb.

The peace of families is also left entirely exposed to other acts of profligacy. The parent may find the honor of a daughter lost; and the law which took its origin in a barbarous age, and which recognized in this no other injury to the parent than the loss of his daughter's services, affords him a compensation in money for that loss—to which may now be added something more, if the jury please for the wounded feelings of the parent. Against the form of the remedy, the injured party first revolts, and next against the idea of a compensation in damages. Those wanting all proper appreciation of the wrong, may perhaps be content with damages; but those whose sense of the injury is the keenest, scorn your legal remedy, and go undressed by the law. In either event, the wrong-doer escapes all condemnation; and after having done a felon's wrong, walks forth a gentleman. If his deed were made a felony, he would not fall below his victim.

Mr. Chitty, in his learned and admirable work upon Medical Jurisprudence, notices a case of this character, where the defendant insultingly sent the £1,000 damages awarded by the jury to the injured father, by a livery servant, with his compliments, and that he would with pleasure pay him another £1,000, if he would send him his second daughter! If this wretch had been condemned as a felon, what servant would have worn his livery, or delivered his bitter taunts! And yet society consents to harbor such a man in her bosom, while she condemns the petty swindler to the dungeons of prison! Nay, more—if the injured father should take such vengeance upon him as his feelings should prompt, he would become a criminal himself, and forfeit his life, for yielding to the impulses of his nature, in vindicating his honor and his happiness, where the law had failed to protect them.

If the social body leave any man unprotected in any of his rights, as to those rights and their vindication, he must be left to his natural remedies. I do not contend that a man unprotected has the right to execute vengeance upon the wrong-doer; but I insist that it is a known fact, that a large portion of mankind will be prompted by their natural impulses to do so; and it becomes a grave question whether men in society, having neglected a due measure of protection, have acquired the right to punish the individual who resorts to self-redress. It seems to me, the social body can only punish him who redresses a wrong, by an act of vengeance, when they can point to the law, and say the offender, "here was your redress; had you appealed to our laws, your rights would have been fully vindicated—but having chosen vengeance when justice was within your reach, we condemn you." The taking of vengeance is a moral offence, in the absence of any human law for the protection of rights; but I apprehend it is not an offence of which the social body can take any cognizance, but it must be left to the Creator's law.

It would follow, then, that society, in order to acquire the right to punish an act of self-redress, must first have offered a due measure of legal protection to the right, whose infringement occasioned the act of vengeance.

* * * * *

Wherever the social body neglects to protect the human sentiments and affections, it must have the lacerated victim of another's wrongs to wreak his own vengeance upon the offender; and if assaults, duels, and assassinations cause no statute can properly denounce its penalties upon the vindicator of his rights; and all that the courts can inquire into is, whether there was such a provocation as ordinarily produces the consequences which happened; if so, and such provocation was not punishable by law, then the law shall take no notice of the consequences! This would produce a dreadful state of society, but not a state much more to be dreaded than one which allows the holiest sentiments and affections of man's nature to be wounded with impunity, the most flagrant wrongs to be unprevented and unpunished, and yet denounces the severest punishments upon the man who, smarting under the sense of the deepest injury, takes vengeance upon the wrong-doer.

I pray you not to misconstrue my meaning. I am not the advocate of either of these conditions in society, but most heartily condemn both as an entire departure from the true rule of social organization.

My appeal is for humanity. I demand for it full and perfect protection by the laws of society; and I demand that the human sentiments and affections shall have a measure of protection commensurate with their dignity and importance to man's happiness; and I have only designed to point out the injustice of society in neglecting a just and general protection to all the rights of man.

"Although it will be admitted," says Mr. Chitty, "the true object of law ought to be security to individuals of the full enjoyment of those endowments with which the Almighty has blessed mankind; yet the English law is singularly defective in the protection of the natural passions and feelings from injuries. It in general interferes only where there has been a visible bodily injury, inflicted by force or poison, while it leaves almost entirely unprotected the whole class of the most malignant mental injuries and sufferings, unless in a few cases, where by descending to fiction, it sordidly supposes some pecuniary loss, and sometimes under the mask, indirectly, and contrary to its own legal principle, affords compensation for wounded feelings. Thus a parent cannot in that character sue for an injury inflicted on his child, and on his own domestic happiness; nor can he punish the silent seducer of his daughter, occasioning his most agonizing mental sufferings, and her ruin, unless the facts will sustain the allegation that the daughter was a servant of the father, and that by reason of the seduction, he lost the benefit of her services. Nor is there punishment for many verbal slanders undermining the character of the person calumniated, the most dangerous illness, or even death."

* * * * *

"If," says Mr Chitty, "legislators had sufficiently considered the connection of mind with external objects, and that the miseries and sufferings of the mind may be infinitely greater than those of the body, adequate punishments would have been provided for many mental injuries, which can only be visited by the censure of mankind; or, at the most, by inadequate discretionary punishment, limited to fine and imprisonment."

The reflections of this profound jurist upon the British law, are equally applicable to our own. The same defects exists in our legal code; the most sacred rights of humanity cry out in vain for protection to either British or American laws. Nay, more; the legislature of both countries have hitherto treated with derision and contempt, the petitions which have been presented to them upon the subject of laws for the protection of human sentiments and affections. There were presented to the legislature of this state, at the last session, sundry petitions from ladies in one or more of the counties, praying that the grossest violation of the marital rights, and the vilest infringement of the sentiments and affections of domestic peace, might be punished as crimes. These grave legislators ill concealed their mirth at this outbreak of humanity. It was a capital joke, and made them merry for a season. If these ladies had presented a petition, praying for further protection of their wardrobes from theft, a bill for that purpose would have been passed by this gallant legislature. But as they sought for protection for domestic love and peace, for noble pride, and kind affections, for honor and happiness, these Solons derided the application. They could appreciate silks and laces, and yet derided the holiest sentiments of the being they adorned—"they could pity the plumage—and forget the dying bird."

Let us now examine more minutely some of the rights of man, arising from the sentiments and affections of his nature, with a view to the ascertainment of what is a proper measure of legal defence and vindication. And first—the marital rights. The sexes are born nearly equal in point of numbers, and this alone creates a natural necessity for the uniting in pairs. But it would go no farther; it would not determine the permanency of that union, but leave it to be dissolved at the mere option of either of the parties, upon the slightest occasion. The law of nature, however, has not only ordained the pairing of the sexes but the permanency and sacred inviolability of the union. It is true that the instincts which lie at the foundation of it, are shared by man in common with all the animal creation; but in man these instincts are strengthened and consecrated by high and noble sentiments, which are wanting in animals; and we have seen that the most sacred rights emanate from these sentiments, and among the chief of these are the marital rights. Offspring result from the marriage union. Mankind have a natural love of offspring—heightened by holy hope, and just pride, and benevolent affections. The parents have to deal also with sensitive, rational, and moral beings in their children, whose fate is so connected with their own, as that they are bound to preserve inviolate that union which has called them into being, and whose continuance alone can promote their happiness. Man is denied his animal freedom in his regard; it is subject to his moral and superior nature, and it is well that it is so. Moreover, such is the nature of human affection, that a judicious attachment is strengthened by indulgence and time, so that a separation by death, even, is among the severest trials of the afflicted. If so great distress come from the act of providence, to which man is disposed, by his reverence and awe, to submit with meek and pious endurance, what must he suffer, whose domestic affections are wounded by that worse deprivation, the moral death of the being whom only he loved? No sentiment of veneration and submission to the Creator's laws, and his wounded spirit; but his pride, his honor, and his sense of justice are rudely lacerated, and his entire moral nature revolts at the wrong. Marriage is an institution of nature. The sacred exclusiveness of domestic love is demanded by the laws of the human mind, and hence the right to its inviolability. The human legislator cannot plead that he instituted the married state, and may therefore notice, or disregard its claims, as he shall choose. He is bound to regard it as the institution of nature, and to vindicate its rights by appropriate laws.

Consider next the wounds inflicted upon parental feelings. Philoprogenitiveness and adhesiveness cling to the child. Benevolence showers blessings around it, and hope and pride look forward with exultation to its advancement and success in life. The object of so much attachment, and who promises so much, attains to womanhood—sweet, confiding, innocent and beautiful, but falls the victim of such vile art and falsehood, as was so foreign from her nature that she was not prepared for its encounter. The parent is stung with the deepest agony. Every sentiment and affection which before derived pleasure from her existence, is now a source of torment to him. He was before happy; he is now miserable; his rights, therefore, have been invaded, and he justly demands protection from the law.

We have seen that a sense of pride and love of approbation were innate in man; these may be wounded by malicious detraction and insult, and this will disturb the peace of the injured individual. He therefore demands, very properly, legal protection for these sentiments.

I cite these instances for the purpose of leading the way to a discussion of the species of redress which the law ought to afford for injuries to the sentiments and affections. The right of property is fully acknowledged by our laws, and in general is well protected. A man injured in this right has secured to him a civil action for redress, in which he recovers a compensation in money for the wrong done him; and in cases of injury by theft, embezzlement, and, in some cases, of fraud, and imposture, the law has made the offence criminal, and punished it as a felony. One would suppose that a right so sacredly guarded by the law, must have a higher importance to man's happiness than those rights which were entirely neglected. Whence, then, the origin of this right? It emanates from the instinct to acquire. Man has a natural desire to acquire and keep property. This instinct is possessed in a slight degree by some of the animal tribes, and it does not aspire to the dignity of a sentiment. It, however, calls the sentiment of self-esteem to its aid, and then says: "This is mine—and because it is mine, it is better than if it were thine—and I am better than thou art, because I have it and thou hast it not." Now if you deprive this man of this thing, you become a felon; but if you only take away his wife, or degrade his daughter, or destroy his character, you are still a gentleman in the eye of the law!

The person is also greatly favored in our jurisprudence. Not only its utility but its symmetrical beauty has met with a most favorable consideration. If you cut off a man's ear, or slit his nose, or otherwise maim him, you are regarded as a felon; but you may so lacerate his feelings as to destroy his reason, and escape without legal notice.—An ear or nose is more valuable, says the law, than the reasonable faculties. Nay, so jealous is the law of injury to the corporeal man, that you may not shake your feet at him within striking distance, though you touch him not, but forthwith you will be arrested and carried before a magistrate for the offence, and if he himself does not call you a coward, vagabond, and knave, he will be regarded as uncommonly civil and reserved upon the occasion!

Now, all human rights emanate from the natural sentiments and desires of the mind; they have, therefore, the same source, but it does not necessarily follow that they enjoy the same rank and dignity; some are more sacred and important than others to human happiness.

Every member of man's physical frame is of some degree of importance in the exercise of its corporeal functions: but he can bear the loss of one with less sacrifice than another, because it is not of equal importance to his bodily strength or activity. The loss of his finger is not equal to the deprivation of his hand, nor his arm to that of his leg. It becomes us then, to fix the grade of man's intellectual powers, and to determine the relative rank and dignity of the various faculties, dispositions, and sentiments of the human mind. The supremacy will be conceded to man's moral nature: his intellectual faculties are next in rank, but wholly subsequent to it, as are also the animal feelings.

Man's highest enjoyments consist in the gratification of his sentiments. His secondary pleasures arise from the indulgence of his animal feelings, under the restraint of the sentiments and the intellect. The source of his highest enjoyments, when disturbed or wounded, becomes the source of his most poignant suffering. He can bear pecuniary easier than domestic privation, an injury to his person with less sacrifice than an injury to his character. Fraud and deception offend him more than theft, and obtaining by false pretences more than robbery. He can endure hunger and want easier than the loss of his good name, and will sacrifice the peace of his body for his peace of mind. He will lay down life itself for freedom, truth, or justice, and enlist all the powers of his nature in the service of its benevolence. He will spend his fortune to satisfy his love of praise, and devote his life to gratify his pride and ambition. Nay, he will deny himself the entire gratification of the lower propensities, unless their indulgence can proceed under the sanction of his moral sentiments. If this be so, ought not the law to recognise these gradations of nature, and to award its protection according to their demands?

Injuries to the sentiments and affections then ought to be regarded as criminal offences, and be punishable according to their degree of moral turpitude; and the conviction of the offender in any of these cases should be a moral stigma upon his character. In the most enormous of these offences, such as those most deeply affecting the marital rights, and domestic love and peace, the law ought to pronounce them felonies, and punish them as such, as also those lacerations of the sentiments which result in the wreck of human reason. And it seems to me that all idea of pecuniary compensation for this class of injuries, ought to be banished from our mind. Slander and libel, which wound the sentiments only, and do not directly injure a man's pecuniary interest, ought also to be treated as criminal offences, and the civil action for pecuniary compensation ought to be abolished altogether. The rule which I contend for is this—when the injury is an offence to the moral feelings or affections, it should be treated as a crime, and as such only. The idea of bartering a man's moral nature for money, of enduring so much agony for so many dollars, is utterly degrading to humanity. Money is not the standard by which to estimate moral worth or human happiness. But where the offence is against the right of property, the extent of the injury can be measured by this standard, and a compensation be made in money. Such injury may also be a moral offence; and when so, should be treated as a crime.

This would abolish the civil action of adultery, the action for debauching a daughter, and the action for slander and libel, except where the words published occasioned a direct and immediate pecuniary injury. It would abolish the action of assault and battery, except where the bodily injury was such as to occasion a pecuniary loss, and it would substitute criminal punishment as the sole measure of protection and redress. All fraud and false pretences which injured another's right would be regarded as criminal, and if they produce pecuniary loss, the civil action would also be retained for redress in damages. The rule, in fine, would be, to treat all offences against the sentiments and affections of man's nature as moral wrongs, and to lay all atonement by money for injuries to human rights entirely out of view, except where the injury affected the right of property directly.

This would prevent and redress moral wrongs by moral means, and award for pecuniary wrongs their only appropriate remedy. What! shall a man's whole moral nature be grossly outraged and lacerated by the vilest wrong, and the law deal out a bait to a mere instinct by way of atonement and sanctification? Suppose self-esteem, approbativeness, adhesiveness, benevolence, and conscientiousness to be raging under offence and injury, and you soothe them by gratifying acquisitiveness? As well might you, when acquisitiveness itself was outraged by an injury to property, attempt to redress the wrong by gratifying the organs of music, and give solemn judgment in your courts that the defendant should play for the plaintiff some of his favorite tunes.

It may be objected that there is a vast disparity in the extent and seriousness of the various injuries to the sentiments and affections, according to the malignity of the offender, the sentiment or affection which should be wounded, and the organization and external condition of the aggrieved person, and that therefore it would be difficult, if not impossible, to frame a code of laws which should afford the required recognition and protection of these rights without endangering the rights and liberty of the accused. I answer, that the laws already recognize and afford protection to rights where the same difficulty exists; and what has been safely done in one case, can be done in another of the same nature.

The right of life itself is protected by our statutes, which declare that the destruction of human life may be either murder, punishable by death—or manslaughter, punishable by imprisonment in a state prison, for a long term of years—or manslaughter punishable by a shorter term of imprisonment; or the same offence, punishable by imprisonment in a county jail, or by a fine only. And cases are declared in which the taking of human life is either justifiable or excusable homicide, which, of course, are not punishable at all.

Now the punishment for the taking of human life is not regulated by the mere fact of the destruction of life, for, if it were, there would be but one offence, and one punishment; but the circumstances attending each case are considered, and the crime takes its character and meets its punishment from the degree of moral turpitude manifested in its perpetration. We have seen that every man has an innate love of life—and in one, this intuitive attachment to life is much stronger than in another, and yet the law does not attempt to measure the offence of man-killing by the amount of the instinctive attachment which was violated by the act of killing. The law recognizes the instinct and the right, and protects it whether it be strong or weak. The killing of a human being who should be so disgusted with life, as that he would have committed suicide, if he had not been murdered, is as much a crime in the eye of the law, as if the deceased had the most ardent attachment to life. So also the life of the humble is as sacredly protected as that of the great.

The same holds true of the right of property. The law regards the right alike, and its violation as the same offence, whether the owner was a miser or philanthropist, whether he had much or little. The offender who steals from a man with large acquisitiveness, commits no greater offence than when he steals from one with a small instinctive love of property. The offence is against the right, and the means of prevention and punishment are to be graduated according to the degree of moral turpitude manifested by the offender. Accordingly he who steals a loaf of bread is not punished to the same extent as he who takes hundreds of dollars. So also the law has already distinguished between various degrees of forgery, and created several distinct grades of this crime, and awarded various degrees of punishment. The same may be said of the crime of arson. I am not required to show that these gradations or any of them correct; but I cite these instances to show, not only by our law at present there are recognized several distinct crimes, from those meeting with capital punishment to the lesser sort, punishable by slight imprisonment—but moreover that offences against the same right are graduated, and meet with different degrees of punishment.

Suppose, then, the law should declare seduction to be a moral offence of which it would take cognizance; that if the victim of it was under a certain age, and it was effected by a pledge of marriage—it should be punished by imprisonment for a certain term of years; if of mature years, and the circumstances were less aggravating—with a less term—leaving the jury to find the degree of the crime as it should be defined by law, and leave the punishment for that degree fixed and certain. No greater difficulty could be encountered here than legislation has already overcome, in cases of homicide, arson, forgery, and theft.

This much the law could do at any rate; it could define what should be the first degree of any moral offence, and could fix its certain punishment, and it could declare that all other like offences should fall within either a second or third degree, in the discretion of a jury who should weigh the circumstances of each case; and the punishment for these degrees could also be graduated and fixed by law. This would take all arbitrary discretion from the courts, and leave the accused in the hands of a jury of the country, coming from the body of the people, and properly representing the just sentiment of an enlightened and virtuous community.

I perceive no insurmountable difficulty in the practical application of the principles of legislation, for which I have striven in this discourse. They, at least, invite careful investigation. Humanity pleads for their adoption; the noblest sentiments of our nature impel us to demand their consideration in the halls of legislation; and I have yet to be convinced, that He who ordained the pressing demands of the human sentiments and affections, and conferred upon man intellectual powers to subserve them, has been so sparing of the latter endowment, as that, how hard soever he shall strive, his reasoning powers will fail of securing an adequate measure of legal protection against the vilest wrongs which one human being can inflict upon another. —New World.

Gratitude.

Gratitude is the sensation which we feel towards beings who have conferred a benefit upon us. The force with which we feel it, generally depends on the value of the gift, and the regard we have for the benefactor, independent of the benefit. For instance, whenever one person saves the life of another, if he be naturally of a grateful disposition, he will feel bound to risk his own life for that of his preserver; but, if the favor be smaller, he will feel less obligated in proportion.

Now every person owes more or less gratitude to different individuals, whether he feels it or not. There are none of us, that have not been in some degree benefitted, even by those on whom we had no peculiar claims for favor. But we are all indebted to our parents for as much as we can ever repay, should we devote ourselves faithfully through life. Though it is the parent's duty to confer these obligations, and we are justifiable in expecting them; yet, it is probably our duty to make returns by such behavior as shall render their lives pleasant and happy.

How much, then, if we owe gratitude to our parents, who no more than discharge their duty to us, are we indebted to our heavenly Parent? He has not only given us existence, and preserved it; but even the food we eat, the clothes we wear, and every blessing we enjoy, should be considered as coming directly from his hand. All this has he done to bless us, and make us happy without expectation of reward. And when we, by disobeying God's injunction, became insulting rebels, and forfeited all right to his favor, and were justly liable to eternal destruction, his mercy interposed and provided a way, whereby we might still, by his grace, enjoy everlasting peace. And, moreover, though we are completely and at all times within his power, and can not draw a single breath beyond his divine permission; yet, when we resist his authority, and insult his Holy Spirit, he still spares us, and woos us to be reconciled to him. What an eternal and measureless debt of gratitude is here accumulating against us! Not a moment we live, or breath we breathe, but it is increased. And, have we any thing wherewith to discharge this debt? Nothing: we have received all from him, and all is his. This greatly enhances the obligation. Now, the exercise of gratitude gives rise to the most pleasing emotions; and these are augmented, in proportion as its object is worthy and elevated. What object can be more worthy than God?

Again, its exercise is profitable: it calls into more powerful action our noble sensibilities, and more amiable qualities; and, in like degree, brings into subjection our evil propensities. What supreme goodness does this display in our heavenly Parent! He has imposed upon us an infinite debt of gratitude, when the very sense of the obligation is productive of such exquisite delight, and such incalculable advantage.—And yet all we can do toward the discharge of this debt, is to acknowledge it.

Gratitude is almost universally considered among men, not only as a great duty, but also a great mark of excellence in those who exhibit it. To be grateful for benefits received, is an article in their code of honor; and, it would be a matter of congratulation, if wordly honor depended on nothing more objectionable than this. But, if gratitude be a great duty, must not ingratitude be a crime proportionably enormous? And, if the one be highly honorable, is not the other in like degree disgraceful? Every one will answer, yes!

Think of this, then, you who pride yourselves on your morality and freedom from crime. And reflect, also, you who boast so highly of your honor, and affect so much to detest a disgraceful act. Never more be guilty of the crime and infamous disgrace of ingratitude to that being who bestows upon you all you enjoy. And you, too, who profess so much gratitude to the Giver of all good, remember that it is best shown by corresponding exertions to promote his glory. P. M. V.

PERSONAL PIETY.

We are sensible there is a necessity for more prominently urging the cultivation of personal piety upon all christian professors. The standard of christian character must be elevated. The lines of separation between a professing and non-professing world must be more plainly exhibited in the conduct, sentiments, and feeling of christians. If we mistake not the present times, and the peculiar temptations of of this age strongly demand a large endowment of this grace.—And certainly, the claims of God upon us, our own enjoyment, and our duty to labor for the promotion of pure and undefiled religion, all urge the necessity of a more complete consecration to God. We proceed to speak more particularly of these several points.

1. The peculiar temptations of the age strongly urge increased attention to this subject. We live in a time when men run to and fro on the earth, and "knowledge puffeth up." This very increase of knowledge tends to pride, self-righteousness, and self-dependence. The abiding influence of a deep inwrought spirit of piety is necessary to counteract this natural consequence of the spirit of the age. This same boldness which has been displayed, and so commendably displayed too in many instances, in the investigation of physical laws, has not been content to operate in its proper sphere, but has ventured to obtrude into the sacred confines of revelation, and has undertaken to complete what divinity long since pronounced "finished." To this daring spirit, nothing but heartfelt and permanent piety can say, "Thus far shalt thou come, and no farther, and here shall thy proud waves be stayed." A utilitarian spirit, which looks at immediate effects,—which ploughs the surface merely, and seeks only the present crop, is also rife at the present day. There is also a desire for novelty, a rejecting of old ways because they are old, a propensity to embrace new doctrines because they are new, an uneasy restlessness which is visible in many movements of the age. To insure protection against these storms of error, is needed that humble fervent piety, willing to sit lowly at the feet of Christ, and learn of him, so essential to that faith which is "an anchor to the soul both sure and steadfast."

2. The claims of God upon us demands a great increase of piety in our midst. All the principles of natural obligation, all the commands of the Bible, require a more entire consecration than we now see exhibited in the majority of professing christians.—The sacredness of the vows taken in a profession must be more regarded. There is too much looseness on this point. Many pay not the attention to such vows that they do to their ordinary promises among their fellow beings. How many of us will at last find to our sorrow, that in this matter as well as in all others, "God will not be mocked."

3. Our own peace in this world requires this increase of piety. He who well knows the capabilities of the human mind, has said, "Ye cannot serve God and Mammon."—Every christian knows the diminution of peace and comfort which obtains in his own mind, when he undertakes to serve both the world and his God. The amount of christian enjoyment is greatly diminished, and in many cases almost annihilated, by subserviency to the interests of this life. What wonder is it that we hear so much complaining of deadness, and dullness, and darkness in spiritual life, when we examine the extent to which the large majority of christians are subject to the passions and powers of this world. How few attain to that peace which floweth like a river. The cares of this world must be more forgotten, its pleasures despised, and its temptations repelled. Let the church arouse from her slothfulness in this matter, and come up to that standard of piety which duty requires, and not only will individual comfort be increased, but through the whole length and breadth of the church there will be "peace within her palaces."

4. The duty we owe to aid in the promotion of Christ's cause throughout the earth strenuously demands a more general cultivation of personal piety. The church of God is destined to be a witnessing church. It is to bear witness of the excellency of religion before all the varieties of civil society. In the dark places of the earth which are full of the habitations of cruelty, that external morality which religion produces, would be a strong witness of its excellency. But civilization is making rapid progress in the world. Trough its influence alone many communities are raised up, exhibiting a noble specimen of external morality. How is the church to be a witness against such a community except in the piety of its members? How else than by the manifestation of a spirit within which is not of earth, can she bear witness of the purifying effects of real religion?

As God's plan, in fitting a soul for the holiness of a heavenly state, is to place it in such circumstances as will develope its qualities and ripen it for glory, so it is doubtless his plan with the church universal on earth, to so deal with it as to draw forth its capabilities for action, its faculties for exhibiting the glories of its Master, and the various ways in which these qualities shall overcome the powers of darkness, and thus show their divine origin. In conformity with this plan, we see the different times, it has been called to present to a sinful race. At one time, it has been called to show with what peace its subjects could meet a most cruel death, and its Martyrs have walked with a smile to the stake. At another time it has been called to exhibit the elevating tendency of its principles, and it has gone forth, and engrafted civilization on the heathen world. Again it has been called to show its anxiety for the full developement of the human faculties, and it has studded the land with schools and colleges. But it has never yet drawn the burnished weapon, never yet made a full exhibition of her strength in the melting, all-subduing influence of a universal personal piety in all her members. This mighty instrumentality, we believe, will next be called into operation, and powerful will be its effects, both on the church, and on the world. The one may be diminished like Gideon's army, but the other will surely be overthrown like the camp of the Assyrians.

It is not sufficient that elevated piety be possessed by ministers alone. It must pervade the length and breadth of the church, and dwell in the heart of every member.—Until this is done, it will never be sought generally by the ministers. There is an axiom in political economy, that the supply is equal to the demand. This may not be strictly true when applied to the ministry, but still, their discourses will br graduated by the feelings of their congregations.—Hence, when church members are negligent in cultivating deep and abiding piety in their own minds, they clip the wings of their minister. Higher attainments in piety must be sought for by all. Let the young strive for it; it will prove the dew of their youth. Let the middle aged attain to it; it forms the vigor of their strength. Let the old possess it; it gives dignity to age.—Thus will the church of God become ripe for millennium glory.

LIFE WILL SOON BE PAST.

DEATH IS AT THE DOOR.

Mr. Editor.—This is true with regard to the present generation of men—with those who are prepared to bid adieu to time and meet the king of terrors, and equally true with regard to such as have no God, and no hope in Christ. It is a solemn thing to die; an appalling thought to be taken, a cold corpse, from our dwellings, from our families and our friends, and deposited in the cold, dark, and damp grave, no more to see the light of day—to see the face of man no more! to hear the sound of voices on earth no more! to greet beloved friends, children, and families, no more! no more to see the dawn of Sabbath days, and hear the sweet news of heaven—to mingle our voices with the melodies of God's house no more! to hear the moving voice of fervent prayer, and thrilling accents of redeeming mercy from the lips of the man of God no more!—no more to mingle our sympathies, and our tears, and our sorrows, with fellow-beings on earth. Who can contemplate all these solemn truths, and not be moved? Who can remember, with even something of a realizing sense, the tremendous fact, that in a very short time, he will be mingling anthems of praise in glory, with the army of the skies, or mingling groans with the lost in damnation, without an indescribable sensation stealing through the inmost soul?—These very realities await Adam's family, the young, the old, the beautiful, the gay, the thoughtless, the serious, the rich, the poor, the wise, the foolish. Time must soon close. Death now stands at the door. One step, and that short, from the cradle to the grave.

> "Then, O my soul, arouse, awake,
> And an impartial survey take."

Soon thou must give an account of thy stewardship.

1. My soul, what hast thou been doing? Important inquiry—such as will meet us at the judgment bar of God. Must not many who call themselves by the name of Christ, in honesty answer, we have done little for Christ, much against him. What can such say, who are eager to engage in the light frivolities of life—to spend their time in a round of idle chit-chat and company-keeping; adapted to the same senseless employment—such, as seldom speak of Christ, of duty, of holiness, who are never or seem never so miserable as when in pious company—such, as seldom read their Bibles; seldom visit their closets; are better pleased to listen to flattering lips, the adulations of worms, in self-praise, than to mercy's voice and gospel instruction, and then in the presence of gay and thoughtless companions, who have no confidence in their piety, on a communion-day, creep to the Lord's table to save appearances? Alas! such disgrace themselves, dishonor Christ, belie religion, and destroy their own souls.

2. As my probation will soon end, it becomes me as an intelligent and accountable creature, to examine my hope for eternity, and the foundation on which it rests.—There is but one sure, whilst there are many false foundations. Some rest solely on past experience—what they once felt, &c. But this is not scriptural; "Forgetting," says Paul, "the things that are behind," &c. Some are resting merely on good resolutions. These are only as a sandy foundation; will do in fair weather, but give way to the storm, and the force of Jordan's stream—it wont do to die by. I want something to die by, that will bear my head up above death's cold flood. Then I must get on the Rock of Ages, that foundation which was laid in the counsels of infinite wisdom—laying aside all my own materials, renouncing all my own works and righteousness, faith, hope, strength, my all and in all. If here I stand—the storms of life, the stream of death can not move me. If here I stand, my feet may slide, but never can they be swept from the foundation. "Because I live, ye shall live also," is the Master's unchangeable promise.

3. But as time will soon be past, and death is at the door, what evidences have I that I am a child of God—that I am one now? If I am a child of God, there are many things for me to love, and which I do love and delight in; many things for me to hate, and which I do hate. Holiness, the saint always loves and desires holiness, as holiness. Sin—the saint always hates sin, as sin. Christ's church, the saint always loves, and loves it as Christ's church, and for his sake. Satan's kingdom the saint hates, and always hates and opposes; prays and labors for its downfall, while he prays and labors for the building up of Christ's kingdom. Those things which support Christ's kingdom, the Lord's real disciple always loves. He follows the missionary as he crosses the Atlantic, with his prayers, sympathies and contributions. He follows him in the same spirit as he climbs and crosses the Rocky Mountains, and as he breaks the bread of life to the dying thousands in his own land. He who loves Christ loves his written word, the holy scriptures; and, therefore, he will pray for the success of the Bible cause, send his prayer, give his money, not by constraint, but of a liberal Christian heart and mind. So he feels towards every other kindred institution. He will and does avail himself of such sources of information and instruction as come within his reach—and if they are at a little distance he will make a vigorous effort to reach them. The true saint desires the salvation of sinners, prays for it, strives after it. He who neglects these things, or enters into these duties by constraint, barely to save appearances is far from the kingdom of heaven.

4. But still, I know I must die soon; but how soon I cannot tell. The very thought makes me feel solemn, and I seem to wish to get clear of it—but it will come up. Has such a creature any time to throw away; any labor to bestow upon that which satisfieth not. Can I with safety spend a night at the gay party amidst the merry dance—at the theatre—at the card party? May I visit my friends on the holy Sabbath? May I wait to be rich before I do my duty as to the soul and eternity? May I, in the hurry of business, neglect family worship, the house of God, the social prayer meeting? Then may I not die; may not my time to die come, whilst at some of these synagogues of Satan, or whilst attending to Mammon's call? Yes it may; for many have died and gone into the presence of God from these places. I have read of the corpse going to the ball. I have heard of the corpse lying under the table at the card party, &c. O then, let me always live as I would wish to die! "And whatsoever my hand findeth to do, to do it with my might, for there is no work, nor device, nor wisdom, nor knowledge in the grave to which I hasten."

THE THEATRE.

BY ROWLAND HILL.

More than twenty years ago, the late eccentric, but excellent Rev. Rowland Hill, at the close of a sermon at Surrey chapel, addressed his audience to the following effect:—

"A few days since, I heard with grief and disgust, that some of my Surrey chapel congregation are not ashamed to be seen in that synagogue of Satan, that temple of obscenity and blasphemy, the play-house. The friend who communicated to me this very agreeable intelligence, said he has been just remonstrating with one of these worthies upon this abominable inconsistency; and what do you think was his reply? Whether he blushed while making his monstrous defence, I really don't know; but I do know, that, in repeating it to you, I blush for him. Now, pray listen to it. 'Why, sir,' said he, 'that I do occasionally go to the play, is certainly true; but that I do so as often as has been reported, is as certainly false: indeed I should consider very frequent visits to the theatre, inconsistent with my Christian profession. That I constantly attend Surrey chapel on Sunday mornings and evenings, and generally on Tuesday evenings and Friday mornings, you know; and very much do I enjoy those opportunities I assure you; yet, notwithstanding all that, now and then, by way of a treat, but mark me, sir, only by way of a treat, I do indulge myself with going to see a good comedy or tragedy.' 'Now,' exclaimed the reverend gentleman, Now Mr. Christian, play-goer, suppose you were to call upon me to-morrow morning, and say,' 'Mr. Hill, I am very sorry to hear that you very frequently eat all sorts of filth;' what would you think of me if I were to reply, O, sir! I hope you do not believe I devour so much filth as has been reported; no, indeed; for if I did I should consider myself a very nasty creature; but to prove to you that I am by no means a man of filthy propensities, let me tell you, that, on Sundays, and Mondays, Tuesdays and Fridays, I invariably sit down to most excellent dinners of fish, flesh, and fowl, and very much indeed do I enjoy those dainties I assure you, yet, notwithstanding all that, now and then, by way of a treat, but mark me, sir, only by way of a treat, I confess, I do indulge in a delicious meal of carrion? Hear, O heavens, and be astonished, O earth! a professor of Christianity unblushingly avows that he visits the temples of obscenity and blasphemy, by way of a treat!"

How to Resist the Devil.—Satan is the Christian's unwearied foe; he is the enemy of all righteousnes, and aims at our destruction. He is especially the enemy of our faith—comfort—prosperity—and usefulness. He is our enemy before God, and he gets access to our hearts; he excites to sin, accuses of sin, and terrifies for sin. We are called upon to resist him, steadfastly believing God's word, faithfulness and love. Steadfastly believing what Christ is to us, as Satan's grand opponent. Is Satan a deadly serpent? Jesus is the brazen serpent which heals. Is Satan a roaring lion? Jesus is the lion of the tribe of Judah who prevails. Is Satan a destroyer? Jesus is a Savior. Is Satan an adversary? Jesus is a friend. Is Satan a wolf? Jesus is the good shepherd. Is Satan a tempter? Jesus is a deliverer. Is Satan a deceiver and a liar? Jesus is the truth. Is Satan an accuser? Jesus is an advocate. Is Satan the prince of darkness? Jesus is the light of life. Is Satan a murderer? Jesus is the resurrection. Is Satan god of this world? Jesus is God of all. Resist the devil in the faith of this.—Pastor's Morning Visit.

JOY IN GRIEF.

Christian resignation is very different from that stoical stubbornness, which is most easily practised by those unamiable characters whose regards centre wholly in self; nor could we in a proper manner exercise submission to the will of God under our trials, if we did not feel them; he who knows our frame is pleased to allow that afflictions for the present are not joyous, but grievious. But to them that fear him, he is near at hand to support their spirits, to moderate their grief, and in the issue to sanctify it; so that they shall come out of the furnace refined and more humble and spiritual. There is a part however, assigned us,—we are to pray for the help in need, and we are not willing to give way to the impression of overwhelming sorrow. We are to endeavor to turn our thoughts to such considerations as are suited to alleviate it; our deserts as sinners; the many mercies we are still indulged with; the still greater afflictions which many of our fellow-creatures endure, and above all, the sufferings of Jesus, that Man of Sorrows, who made himself intimately acquainted with grief for our sakes. When the will of the Lord is manifested to us by the event, we are to look to him for grace and strength, and be still and know that he is God; that he has a right to dispose of us and ours as he pleases, and that in the exercise of this right he is most certainly good and wise. We often complain of losses; but the expression is rather improper. Strictly speaking, we can loose nothing, because we have no real property in anything. Our earthly comforts are lent us, and when recalled we ought to return and resign them with thankfulness to him who has let them remain so long in our hands.

There is something facinating in grief, painful as it is, we are prone to indulge it and to brood over the thoughts and circumstances which are suited, like fuel to fire to heighten and prolong it. When the Lord afflicts, it is his design that we should grieve; but in this as in all other things, there is a certain moderation which becomes a Christian, and which only grace can teach; and grace teaches us not by books or by hearsay, but by experimental lessons; all beyond this should be avoided and guarded against as sinful and hurtful.—Newton.

What is Happiness.—Let a man have all the world can give him, he is still miserable if he has a grovelling, undevout mind. Let him have his gardens, his fields, his woods, his lawns, for grandeur, plenty, ornament and gratification; while at the same time God is not in all his thoughts. And let him only look at nature with an enlightened mind—a mind which can see and adore the Creator in all his works,—can consider them as demonstration of his power, his wisdom, his goodness, and his truth, —this man is greater, as well as happier, in his poverty, than the other in his riches. —The one a little higher than a beast—the other a little lower than an angel.

CASABIANCA.

There was a little boy about thirteen years old, whose name was Casabianca.—His father was commander of a ship of war called the Orient. The little boy accompanied his father to the seas. His ship was once engaged in a terrible battle upon the river Nile. In the midst of the thunders of the battle, while the shot were flying thickly around, and strewing the decks with blood, this brave boy stood by the side of his father, faithfully discharging the duties which were assigned to him. At last his father placed him in a particular part of the ship, to be performing some service, and told him to remain at his post till he should call him away. As the father went to some distant part of the ship to notice the progress of the battle, a ball from the enemy's vessel laid him dead upon the deck. But the son, unconscious of his father's death, and faithful to the trust reposed in him, remained at his post waiting for his father's orders. The battle raged dreadfully around him. The blood of the slain flowed at his feet. The ship took fire, and the threatening flames drew nearer and nearer. Still this noble-hearted boy would not disobey his father. In the face of blood, and balls, and fire, he stood firm and obedient. The sailors began to desert the burning and sinking ship, and the boy cried out, "Father, may I go?" But no voice of permission could come from the mangled body of his lifeless father. And the boy, not knowing that he was dead, would rather die than disobey. And there, that boy stood at his post, till every man had deserted the ship; and he stood and perished in the flames. Oh what a boy was that! Every body who ever heard of him, thinks that he was one of the noblest boys that ever was born. Rather than disobey his father, he would perish in the flames. This account has been written in poetry; and as the children who read this paper may like to see it, I will present it to them here:

> The boy stood on the burning deck,
> Whence all but him had fled,
> The flame that lit the battle's wreck,
> Shone round him o'er the dead.
>
> Yet beautiful and bright he stood,
> As born to rule the storm;
> A creature of heroic blood,
> A proud, though childlike form.
>
> The flames rolled on; he would not go
> Without his father's word;
> That father, faint in death below,
> His voice no longer heard.
>
> He called aloud, "Say, father, say
> If yet my task be done."
> He knew not that the chieftain lay
> Unconscious of his son.
>
> "Speak, father," once again he cried,
> "If I may yet be gone."
> And—but the booming shots replied,
> And fast the flames rolled on.
>
> Upon his brow he felt their breath,
> And in his waving hair;
> And looked from that lone post of death,
> In still, yet brave despair;
>
> And shouted but once more aloud,
> "My father, must I stay?"
> While o'er him fast through sail and shroud,
> The wreathing fires made way.
>
> They wrapped the ship in splendor wild,
> They caught the flag on high,
> And streamed above the gallant child,
> Like banners in the sky.
>
> Then came a burst of thunder sound—
> The boy—oh! where was he?
> Ask of the winds that far around
> With fragments strewed the sea.
> With mast, and helm, and pennon fair,
> That well have borne their part,
> But the noblest thing that perished there,
> Was that young faithful heart.

ADDRESS TO SUNDAY SCHOOL CHILDREN.

DUTY OF CHILDREN TO THEIR PARENTS.

"Children obey your parents in the Lord; for that is right. Honor thy father and mother—which is the first commandment with promise—that it may be well with thee."—Eph. vi. 1—3.

It is necessary, children, to exhort you to love your father and mother? Who is there that does not most highly esteem them from whom they derive their life?—You were very feeble and small at your birth, and would soon have died, if your father and mother had not compassioned you, and if your mother had not nourished and taken all care of you. How many cares they had on your account! How often did your pains and tears deprive them of sleep! How many times did they wait upon you in sickness, and have saved you from the stroke of death! Even now they give you food, clothing, a residence, and instruction, with every other comfort that is good. Is there any thing upon earth for which you should feel equal love, consideration, respect and gratitude as to your parents?

How unjust, therefore, is it to offend your kind parents by improper language, and by disobedience, or wilfully to disturb them by your rude behavior. They deserve very different from you. If any person made you a present, however small, you would thank him for it; but how many presents do your parents give you every day! All your food and drink are a donation from them. What great acknowledgment and thankfulness you owe to them. Would you be pleased, if a poor child to whom you had shown every kindness you could, instead of being sensible of your benefits, should be ill-tempered, morose, and proud towards you? Would you continue your kindness to a child of such a bad disposition? Therefore, take care that by such bad conduct you do not render yourself unworthy of the benefits which your parents shall continue to grant you. An ungrateful person is the worst of all creatures. He is not deserving of the smallest kindness. On the contrary, fathers and mothers, and every body, without exception, will do good to a child who is obliging and dutiful. Good is hoped and sought for him. Friends love him. He is the joy of his parents.—O, how delightful is it to a child to be the comfort of his parents, and to prove himself worthy of their smiles and tenderness!

Remember, also, children, that God has promised very particularly to bless obedient children who fulfil their duty. Therefore, children who respect their father and mother, who love them, and who by their obedience and other good qualities, please their parents, certainly shall be blessed.—God will not deceive you; for he has always fulfilled his promise towards wise and virtuous children. He has blessed them with temporal goodness, health, a good reputation, comfort, competence of riches, and a peaceful old age. What a delight it is thus to be able to look for the precious favors of God! What a consolation to hope for the blessing of our parents when they are called to leave the world. Therefore, children, obey your parents, which is right; and honor your father and mother, that it may be well with you; and that, like the "holy child Jesus," you may increase in wisdom, as you do in stature, "and in favor with God and man." The Lord grant you that mercy for Christ's sake! Amen. —Christian Intelligencer.

"Saints the Workmanship of God."

None can doubt that saints are the workmanship of God. It may, however, be questioned in what sense they are such. If they are his workmanship by the exercise of his arbitrary, irresistible power, then is their moral agency destroyed, and with it, their accountability; and saints are nought but slaves, doing unwilling service. This idea we conceive to be in opposition to the teachings of the sacred scriptures. Were it otherwise, we should conclude that the Bible abounded with mockeries, and that preaching salvation was intended to aggravate the children of men, by offering them an infinitely rich and glorious inheritance, which it is impossible for them to secure. It would be cruelty in the extreme to chain a starving child in the presence of food, and exhort him to eat, and punish him if he did not. The fabled doom of thirsty Tantalus is not worse. It would be a species of cruelty on the part of God of which he is incapable, to offer salvation to men, and yet so constitute them, or the system, as to render them incapable of obtaining it. The language of the Savior, "ask, and it shall be given you; seek, and ye shall find; knock, and it shall be opened unto you; for every one that asketh, receiveth; and he that seeketh, findeth; and to him that knocketh, it shall be opened," presupposes the freedom of the will, as do frequent passages of like import.

That they are the workmanship of God, otherwise than by their voluntary choice, we conceive to be contrary to the word of God. If this proposition be not correct, then they are saints in opposition to their own will, and Christ must force unwilling subjects into his kingdom. Whereas, we are assured that the desire of the saints is, to inquire what the will of God concerning them is, not by constraint, but voluntarily. If God had designed from eternity, or any other time, to make a certain number his saints, then it were folly for him to institute a series of means, with the express instruction that the use of those means would be rewarded with salvation, and the neglect of them with damnation; for this would be in direct opposition to the determination which he had previously made. The determination of God to save men, and the moral agency of the creature can be reconciled only by the fact that the choice of man, fixes the determination of God.

Christ has prepared a way by which all who hear of this may become saints. And there is no respect of persons with God; consequently, all who choose to come to Christ, and make use of the means ordained for that purpose, God determines to make his saints.

Saints are the workmanship of God so far as the act of regeneration is concerned. It is as much impossible for a man to regenerate his own heart, as to direct his natural birth. And it is also impossible, (morally,) for the Holy Spirit to regenerate the heart that is determinedly hostile to its influences and strives against it. There must first be a sense of helplessness on the part of the creature, and a state of feeling similar to that exhibited by Peter, when he exclaimed, "save, Lord, or I perish," and a disposition to rely on the merits of Christ's atonement alone. So far as this, the creature must feel, and act. When this is accomplished, the Holy Spirit takes possession of the heart, and the sinner becomes a new man in Christ Jesus. A variety of means are used for bringing the sinner to this state of feeling, such as the strivings of the Holy Spirit—the preaching of the "Word," &c.; but none of these means are irresistible, as the scriptures abundantly show in language most explicit. Consequently, the choice of the creature to comply with the condition of saintship, fixes the determination to make him a saint.

Perfectionism.

The "Modern Perfectionism" mentioned by our correspondent, X. Y. Z., we conceive to be one of the wild superstitions of the age. It can be little less than blasphemy for one to assert that he is as holy as JEHOVAH, or that he is incapable of sin.—Such, we understand, are the pretensions of the "Perfectionists" of this village. This is getting wise above what is written. It is assuming more than the scriptures will warrant. We have not yet met with the person that we thought was incapable of sin. And we very much question whether man in this life will arrive at a state of sinless perfection. There are too many unholy influences surrounding him. There are too many temptations assailing him, for him to hope to secure this while he has no assurance that his whole nature is sanctified.—The very assumption of holiness is a sin of no small magnitude, when there is not the fullest evidence that in all respects the whole conduct is governed by the law of the Lord.

Some of the prominent characteristics of this sect are most palpable violations of what God has left on record for man, beside being contrary to the economy of nature.—For instance, the denial of the sacredness of the MARRIAGE RITE. We are assured that efforts have been made to break up this sacred covenant; and the blasphemously-styled "Jehovah" of this village is acknowledged the spiritual, if not CARNAL husband of more than either the laws of God or man admit.

Again, we question whether it is evidence of holiness to consider all property as the Lord's, and make use of it regardless of the rights of men. We are at a loss, also, to determine how holiness is reconcileable with the worship of Mr. ——, or any other sinful mortal. We care not how much or often his feet are kissed by his followers, if they do not blasphemously give this the name of religious worship. There can be no necessity for us to caution sober-minded men of such fanaticism. To every rational mind the pretensions above enumerated evince a gross defection of intellect, or extreme depravity of heart. Finally, we are not sure but we have given them an unmerited prominency in mentioning them this much; if so, our readers will pardon us.

The Celebration.

The celebration of the last Anniversary of our Nation's birth-day was witnessed in this village by, it is estimated, over two thousand people. Notwithstanding the unfavorable aspect of the skies in the morning, it ultimately cleared off, and the people gathered in greater numbers than had even been anticipated by the most sanguine friends of the project. It was a beautiful, a glorious day, and will long live in the memories of those who witnessed its festivities.

After the shower had partially subsided in the morning, a salute of thirteen guns were fired, accompanied with the appropriate cheers and Music by the De Ruyter Band from the Tower of the Institute. At 10 o'clock the people came together in crowds in Seminary Square. The President of the Day, Doct. A. L. SAUNDERS, then announced that the Marshal would proceed to form the procession according to the printed "Order of the Day." The Marshal, Maj. IRA GAGE BARNES, in connection with Messrs. H. Coleman, Allen Sutton, and S. D. Dellay, Assistant Marshals, then proceeded to perform the duties assigned them on horseback, and conducted the procession to the Presbyterian Church, which, though spacious, could not contain one half of the vast procession in train. Soon, however, the order was announced that the procession would again form in order, and march to Seminary Square. The exercises were then opened by some very pertinent remarks from the President of the Day, upon the important occasion which had called the vast assemblage together. The exercises for the church were then listened to, the Orator, Reader, Clergy, and Officers of the Day occupying the first piazza, and the vocalists the third piazza of the Institution. The choir, under the direction of J. O. HUTCHINSON, performed the following National Airs in a manner highly creditable to themselves, and peculiarly interesting to the audience generally—"Day of Glory," "Hail Columbia," and "My Country 'tis of thee."

The parts assigned the Clergy, Orator, Reader, Officers of the Day, &c., were attended to in an appropriate manner, and gave, we believe, very general satisfaction.

The Refreshments provided for the occasion were ample, and were partaken with a degree of harmony and pleasure realized by none save those who witnessed it.

The De Ruyter Band led the procession, and performed the duties assigned them in a style that did themselves honor, and elicited the applause of an interested audience, and very properly received the compliments of the Committee of Arrangements through their President.

Finally, it was a gala-day of uncommon interest, heightened by the presence of a few relics of the noble Band who fought and gained our liberties, with heads frosted with age, lingering among us, just on the verge of the grave.

Accident.—Mr. WM. HANCOCK, of Otselic, Chenango co., was killed while engaged in removing a barn on the 5th inst. It was occasioned by the slipping of a lever, which struck him on the head. He survived the accident only about six hours.

He was 31 years of age, and was formerly of Suffield, Conn.

Mails.

The alteration in the mails may occasion us some inconvenience. Instead of a daily Northern and Western, we have a tri-weekly mail. This alteration very seriously affects business on the route from Utica to Ithaca, and we ardently hope that the numerous petitions which have been forwarded for a daily mail, will yet be granted. We will make the best arrangement under the circumstances that we can, and trust our subscribers will consider us for the present, if they should not get their papers as usual. We shall spare no efforts to be punctual in sending out the latest news.

Modern "Perfectionism."

It is not strange that, at the present day at least, there should be those who, ever fond of variety and consequently catching at every "new doctrine" that may be presented, should be so far led astray by the wily and delusive snares of the devil as to become frenzied in their minds, and palm it off upon the more weak and credulous as the spirit of GOD. But, were we to consider the infinite misery and desolation such unprincipled fanatics are working upon community—the tenderest ties of affection broken—the parent's heart gored to the center, and all the domestic relations sundered through the caprices of a ruthless fanatic,—then it is, if reason occupies her throne in the human mind, that every friend of order—every philanthropist—every child of the true and living God should be on the alert, and thwart the enemy in his utmost fastnesses.

A more unprincipled class of human beings, perhaps, ever found lodgment in any community than the "Perfectionists," or "New-Lights," which now inhabit this village. The midnight assassin, as he prowls through the country, only takes the life of his victim and plunders him of some of this world's goods; but the right out Perfectionist—the "JEHOVAH" of Perfectionism, (as he is profanely called) robs society of valuable members—steels the heart of the wife against the partner of her bosom—tears from the parental embrace kind and affectionate offspring—and plants thorns of hatred, malice, envy, and all the baser passions of the soul deep in the hearts of those who ever watched over their infantile years with feelings of the deepest solicitude. Oh, Eternity! drop the veil which hangs between such and their eternal ruin, and let them read their doom ere it shall be too late to retrace their giddy steps. Yet, say the "Perfectionists," it is the spirit of God that sunders very friends—that separates man from his companion, and rears the most bitter persecution against the church of God. Yes, this is Modern "Perfectionism"—this is "Perfectionism" as it exists in De Ruyter—this is "Perfectionism" as it abounds in the vicinity wherever the self-styled "Jehovah" of this miserable faction has any influence. They claim to be as holy as was Jesus Christ! Strange infatuation! And even those who once occupied stations in respectable society, and walked in the higher circles of life, debase themselves to kiss the feet of their great "Jehovah!" and adore him as the "very Christ!" This is a picture of "Perfectionism" drawn to the life. Instead of claiming perfection in holiness, they might rather claim "perfection" in blasphemy—"perfection" in infidelity—"perfection" in licentiousness—"perfection" in all that degrades a human being to the level of a brute.

Doubtless there are those who have been gulled into the doctrine of "Perfectionism" who are honest, candid, and judicious in their sentiments; but the "chief priest"—the "ring-leader" of this fanaticism knows better. He is fully aware of the deceptive game he is playing, and proudly boasts of it. He knows it to be rotten to the core, and as baseless as fancy's visions. Perhaps a more fitting representation of this "apostle of Perfectionism" could be given, than by adopting the language of POLLOCK:

——He was a man
Who stole the livery of the court of heaven,
To serve the devil in; in virtue's guise,
Devoured the widow's house and orphan's bread;
In holy phrase, transacted villainies
That common sinners durst not meddle with.
At sacred feast, he sat among the saints,
And with his guilty hands touched holiest things:
And none of sin lamented more, or sighed
More deeply, or with graver countenance,
Or longer prayer, wept o'er the dying man,
Whose infant children, at the moment, he Planned how to rob. In sermon style he bought,
And sold, and lied; and salutations made
In Scripture terms. * * * * *
* * * * Seest thou the man!
A serpent with an angel's voice! a grave
With flowers bestrewed! and yet few were deceived.
His virtues being over-done, his face
Too grave, his speech
Larded too frequently and out of time
With serious phraseology,—were rents
That in his garments opened in spite of him,
Through which the well accustomed eye could see
The rottenness of his heart.

Community should be on their guard, and watch over the members of the domestic circle with the utmost diligence, lest they fall into the wiles of the adversary.

There are two distinct classes of "Perfectionists" in the town of De Ruyter, who no more agree in their tenets than light agrees with darkness. X. Y. Z.

THE TRINITY.—NO I.

THE DOCTRINE OF THE TRINITY STATED AND PROVED.

Statement of the Doctrine.

What do we mean by the Doctrine of the Trinity?

Two answers from the Assembly's Catechism will aid to furnish a concise reply:—

Q. "Are there more Gods than one?

A. There is but one only, the living and true God.

Q. How many persons are there in the Godhead?

A. There are three persons in the Godhead, the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost; and those three are one true, eternal God, the same in substance, equal in power and glory: although distinguished by their personal properties."

If any addition to this explanation is needed, it must be a definition of the word person, when applied to Deity. This shall be given in the language of the late Rev. NATHANIEL EMMONS, D. D. of Franklin, Mass.:—"The only living and true God exists in such a manner, that there is a foundation in his nature to speak of himself in the first, second, and third person, and say, I, Thou, and He, meaning only himself."

By the doctrine of the Trinity, therefore, we mean to maintain that,—

"The FATHER, SON, and HOLY GHOST, are THREE in respect to their personality, and but ONE in respect to their nature and essence." (Dr. Emmons.)

What proof have we of the Doctrine of the Trinity?

It is abundant. To select and arrange the prominent points of this proof, and to defend them against the assaults of those who reject the doctrine of the Trinity, is the work to which this series of articles is devoted.

A concise statement of the doctrine is now before the reader. The outline of proof now demands his attention; while furnishing this, no notice will be taken of any objector's construction of these proof-texts, or of his arguments against the genuineness of any of them. To this work of defense against attack, the writer will endeavor to assign an appropriate place.

Proof of the Doctrine.

The Old Testament intimations of the Trinity are not few:—God said let us make man. So God created man in his own image. Behold the man is become as one of us. Let us go down now.

I heard the voice of the Lord, saying, Whom shall I send, and who shall go for us"?

Other intimations from the Old Testament are of the following class:—"I am a FATHER to Israel. But unto the SON he saith, Thy throne, O GOD. They grieved and vexed his HOLY SPIRIT."

All those passages, (whether found in the Old Testament, or New,) which prove the Deity of the Son, and those also which prove the personality and Deity of the Holy Spirit—concur in sustaining the doctrine of the Trinity.

The Baptism Commission

Is a distinct source of proof.

"Baptizing them into the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost."

DR. DWIGHT says, (Theol. vol. 4th, p. 229,) "The command to baptize in, or into the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost, is a plain, unanswerable exhibition of the Doctrine of the TRINITY."

MATTHEW HENRY regarded this commission as "a full proof of the doctrine."

DR. SCOTT esteemed it "a most irrefragable proof." Examine next,

The Apostolic Benediction.

The grace of the LORD JESUS CHRIST, the love of GOD, and the communion of the HOLY GHOST, be with you all."

How would it have appeared, if Paul had written—'The grace of Paul, and the love of God'? Or, 'The grace of Gabriel'? Place the name of any mere creature there, and we are shocked at the change.

But now, the only living and true God, Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, is clearly manifested in the bestowment of his Benediction on all who love our Lord Jesus Christ in sincerity—and the transaction appears gloriously harmonious.

To these specimens of scripture testimony for sustaining the doctrine of the Trinity, I shall, next week, (if the Lord will,) add others selected from the same inexhaustible "well of truth."

JOSEPH R. JOHNSON.

De Ruyter, July 1st, 1841.

Congressional News.

From the New-Yorker.

WASHINGTON CORRESPONDENCE,

Washington June 23, 1841.

In Senate, Mr Wright presented memorials from New York City for a Bankrupt Law; also, from New York and Utica remonstrating against it.

The bill to revive the charters of the Banks of the District of Columbia, was taken up for a third reading. (It was erroneously stated yesterday that it passed.)

Mr. Morehead moved to re-commit the bill, with instructions to strike out the amendment yesterday adopted, prohibiting the Banks from receiving or paying out the paper of suspended Banks. This was debated at some length, and the bill re-committed.

Mr. Clay's bill to charter the Fiscal Bank of the United States was reached at a late hour, but no action was taken, and the Senate adjourned.

Thus it will claim attention to-morrow, and no doubt form the interesting theme of debate for some time. If the Senate agree on and pass a bill for a Bank, it must of necessity be discussed for a long time before it will receive the concurrence of the House—a body where prompt and speedy action is impossible. The repeal of the Sub-Treasury will be attended with a long debate, preliminary to the establishment of another fiscal agent on its ruins.

The House have to-day been occupied in the reception of resolutions, many of which, being resolutions of inquiry, and giving rise to debate, were laid over.

On motion of Mr. Adams, so much of the President's Message as relates to the Foreign Slave Trade was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, "with instructions to report such measures as the highest consideration of public honor and the strongest promptings of humanity require, for the suppression of the trade."

Mr. Floyd offered a resolution which was laid over one day, requesting the President to communicate to the House whether any officer of the Army since the 6th of March last, had been directed to visit New-York, for any purpose connected with the imprisonment or trial of Alexander M'Leod; and if so, for copies of instruction to and report from such officers.

Thursday June 24.

In the House to-day, Mr. Fillmore, Chairman of the committee of Ways and Means, reported from that Committee a bill authorizing a loan of twelve millions of dollars for the relief of the Treasury, redeemable at any time after the 1st of Jan. A. D. 1850.

Which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the State of the Union, and ordered printed.

The resolution offered yesterday by Mr Cushing, directing the Secretary to communicate to the House, at the commencement of the next Session of Congress, the progress which has been made in the survey of the coast of the United States—the amount of money expended since the commencement of the Survey—the number of persons employed, and the salaries—the probable length of time and amount of money required to complete it, with suggestions whether a better mode might not be adopted, was, after a debate by Messrs. Cushing, Everett, Holmes and others, adopted.

Mr. Wm. Cost Johnson, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported a bill "to appropriate the proceeds of the sales of the public lands, and granting pre-emption rights," which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the State of the Union, and ordered printed.

The resolution of Mr. Winthrop, offered yesterday, was adopted, directing the Committee on the Library of Congress to take measures to procure two or more copies of all Reports or Documents on Commercial, Judicial and other subjects of interest that may be published by the British Parliament, or other Governments.

The resolution yesterday offered by Mr. Roosevelt, was taken up, directing the committee on the Judiciary to inquire into the constitutionality and expediency of the passage of a Uniform Bankrupt Law, applicable to monied corporations, and whether it would not be most efficient in restoring and regulating the Currency, and preventing the suspension of specie payments by the Banks, and keeping them within proper limits.

Mr. Roosevelt, in a few very brief and pertinent remarks advocated the resolution.

Mr. Barnard imputed, as the cause of his colleague's offering the resolution, his desire of making a speech, and now that this was gratified, he hoped his colleague would withdraw the resolution, as it was needless, the subject already being before the Committee. He concluded by moving to lay this resolution on the table—(which he, however, subsequently withdrew.)

After some further remarks by Messrs. Barnard and Roosevelt, which assumed a personal character, the resolution was adopted.

The resolution offered yesterday by Mr. Floyd requesting the President to communicate to the House whether any officer of the U States has, since the 4th of March last, been directed to visit the State of New-York for any purpose connected with the imprisonment or trial of Alexander McLeod, and if so, requesting him to communicate copies of instructions to, and reports from such officers, was taken up.

Mr. Floyd briefly advocated the resolution, giving a short history of the case.

Mr. Ingersoll entered at length into the history, from the insurrection of the Canadian Patriots, and the circumstances connected with the burning of the Caroline, the arrest of McLeod, and in which the case now stands. He attacked the course taken by Mr. Webster in his correspondence with Mr. Fox, condemning it in every particular, as calculated, from the mistakes into which he had fallen, to plunge the country into a disastrous war—a bare possibility still remaining that the House, by proper action, might prevent it.

He was followed by Messrs. Cushing and Alford, of Geo., in an able defense of the course of Mr. Webster—the latter gentleman defending him particularly on the ground of States' rights—that he had preserved inviolate, and protected the sovereignty of the State of New-York.

No action was taken on this.

The cause assigned for the debate during the day was that no business was before the House—the Loan bill reported this morning having been sent to be printed. This may be expected to be taken up to-morrow, and will furnish ample business, for a short time, at least.

In the Senate, the resolution, offered some days since by Mr. Buchanan, calling for information from the President for a list of removals from offices, and the causes of which, &c., was taken up.

Mr. Buchanan addressed the Senate at some length in support of the resolution, opposing the course pursued by the present Administration in regard to removals, and contrasting it with what he deemed the liberal course of the late Administration.

The resolution was laid over without action, the morning hour having arrived, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of the bill reported by Mr. Clay, for the establishment of a Fiscal Bank.

Mr. Clay spoke for about an hour, in an able argument in support of this measure.

Mr. Calhoun has the floor to-morrow.

The bill for the relief of Mrs. Harrison was taken up and debated by various Senators to a late hour.

Friday, June 25.

In the Senate, Mr. Berrien, of Ga., from the Judiciary Committee, reported the bill establishing a Uniform System of Bankruptcy, with one amendment. Several petitions praying the enactment of such a law were received.

Mr. Woodbury moved a call upon the Secretary of the Treasury for an account of all advances made to distributing offices since March 4th.

The bill to create a Fiscal Bank of the United States now came up in order. Mr. Calhoun, who was to open in opposition, made a few remarks tending to show that public opinion in North Carolina was averse to a Bank, despite the results of the recent Elections. He was answered by Messrs. Mangum and Graham. Mr. C. rejoined.

Mr. Benton now called for the third reading of the bill for the relief of Mrs. Harrison. The passage of the bill was opposed by Messrs. Pierce of N. Hampshire, Young of Ill., Sevier of Ark., Benton of Mo., King of Ala., Wright of N. Y., on grounds of constitutionality and justice. Messrs. Miller of N. J. and Smith of Ind., replied, showing that Messrs. Wright and King had voted for bills involving the same principle; the first in behalf of the family of Gen. Brown; the second for the benefit of the family of Stephen Haight, Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate, who died last session. Mr. Pierce took ground against all Pensions whatever. Finally the vote was taken, and the bill passed as follows: Ayes 28, Noes 18.

On motion of Mr. Mangum, the Senate now resumed the consideration of the Bank bill. Mr. Buchanan gave notice that the opponents of the bill would offer no amendments until its friends had fixed it to suit them.

Mr. Huntington of Conn. moved to strike out the provision restricting the issues of the Bank to bills of Ten Dollars and over. Mr. Clay had no objection. The motion was negatived. [Yeas 21, Whig; Nays 20 Opposition and Messrs. Bayard, Choate, Clayton, Graham, Henderson, and Rives—26.] The bill was then laid over, and the Senate resolved to unite with the House to-morrow in paying the last honors to the Remains of Gen. Harrison, appointed a Committee for that purpose, and adjourned over to Monday.

In the House, on motion of Mr. Adams, it was resolved, that to-morrow be devoted to paying the last tribute of respect to the remains of the late President, and that the House with that view, will hold no session on that day.

Mr. Floyd's resolution of enquiry into the action of the Executive on the McLeod case was taken up, and Mr. Cushing of Mass., made a brilliant and convincing defense of the course of Mr. Webster. Mr. Wise spoke brief but with great clearness, and force on the same side. Mr. Tillinghast of R. I. rose on the same side; but gave way to a motion that, as the morning hour had elapsed, the House do pass to the orders of the day—which prevailed.

The bill to Distribute among the States of the Union the Proceeds of the Public Lands, and to grant Pre-emption rights to actual settlers on the same, was taken up and Mr. Wm. Cost Johnson spoke for an hour with great power and cogency in favor of its passage. Becoming physically exhausted, he gave way without concluding, and the House resumed the McLeod discussion. Mr. Tillinghast showed that a proper reading of the passage in Vattel's Law of Nations which had been quoted against Mr. Webster, sustains his position.

Mr. Holmes, of S. C., argued that Congress ought to let this matter alone, until the negotiations on the subject were terminated.

Mr. Gordon, of N. Y., contended that the Executive had done wrong in interfering in the matter of McLeod at all. If the case should be carried up to the U. S. Court, and the President should request the Attorney General to discharge McLeod without a trial, great indignity and wrong would be done to the State of New York.

Mr. Wise moved that the whole subject do lie on the table, which, after some conversation was negatived: Yeas 51, Nays

105. Mr. Hunt, of N. Y., then took the floor, but the hour of adjournment having nearly arrived, he gave way to a motion to continue the present order, (meeting at 10, and adjourning at 3,) on another week, which prevailed; and the House adjourned over to Monday.

Monday, June 28.

In the House of Representatives, Hon. Henry Black, Representative elect from the District of Pennsylvania of the late Charles Ogle, appeared and was qualified.

Mr. Dawson, of Geo., Chairman of the Committee on the Militia, announced to the House the death of Major General Alexander Macomb, the distinguished leader in the glorious battle at Plattsburgh in the last war, and offered resolutions expressive of their deep regret at this event, and that the Senate concurring, they would attend the Funeral of General Macomb at 10 o'clock to-day; and also appointing a Committee of three Members to make arrangements with such Committee of the Senate as might be appointed, to make arrangements for the attendance of the two Houses at the Funeral. The resolutions were unanimously adopted, and Messrs. John Miller, of Missouri, William O. Butler, of Kentucky, and Aaron Ward, of New York, were appointed on the part of the House to constitute said Committee.

A Message was received that the Senate had concurred in the above resolutions, and that Messrs. Morehead and Pierce were appointed the Committee on the part of that body.

Both Houses adjourned at about half past 10 o'clocd—no other business being transacted.

The Funeral took place at ten. The procession was large and consisted of several Military Companies. The Washington Guards, the United States Marines, a fine company of U. S. Flying Artillery from Fort Henry, with other companies.

The body was conveyed on a hearse, drawn by four grey horses, after which came the relatives of the deceased, the officers of the Army and Navy, in carriages; then the President and the Secretaries of State, Navy and the Treasury, the Attorney General; then the Members of the two Houses of Congress, and many others in carriages—the whole forming a procession about three-quarters of a mile in length. The body was placed in the vault, where General Macomb himself had so late seen deposited the remains of the lamented Harrison—he having acted as one of the officers of that day—and, three rounds of musketry by the United States Marines having been discharged, the scene was closed.

Nothing having been done by either House for the last three days, they will now undoubtedly proceed with expedition to their business, which is now fairly before them, being the Distribution and Preemption bill before the House, and the U. S. Bank bill before the Senate. It is said that the Whigs, not intending to be unreasonably delayed in the discussion of these subjects, intend, after a fair examination, to employ the strength of their majority and bring them to a decision, and comply with the wishes and demands of their constituents, in the hasty accomplishment of the necessary business.

Tuesday, June 29.

In the House, to-day, Mr. Adams presented a plan from Mr. Hamilton, of New York, to organize and establish an exchequer of issues, as a Fiscal Agent of the people of the United States. He moved that it be laid on the table, which was carried; and, also, he moved its printing, which motion was negatived.

Mr. Calhoun, from the Committee on the Navy, reported "a bill to provide for the payment of Navy Pensions," which was twice read and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the State of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

Several petitions were received for a General Bankrupt Law.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, on the Distribution and Preemption bill.

Mr. William Cost Johnson resumed his remarks and ably advocated the bill for about three hours. He was followed by Mr. Clifford in opposition to the bill, who spoke to the hour of adjournment.

In the Senate, several petitions were offered against a Bankrupt Law.

The morning was occupied by Mr. McRoberts on the resolution offered some days since by Mr. Buchanan, relative to removals from office.

The Fiscal Bank bill was taken up, and occupied the time of the Senate the remainder of the day. Various amendments were considered, among which, one providing that the increase of the capital to the extent of twenty millions by the Government should not take place till after the expiration of ten years, was adopted.

The Senate sat till 3 o'clock, and then went into Executive Session. ARGUS.

News of the Day.

Solemn Caution to Parents.—Three children of Mr. Lester Lewis, of Waterford, (Great Neck,) were left at a neighbor's house on Sunday last, while the family attended meeting. The eldest child, a girl 8 years old, was sent home to feed the silk worms, and, as she did not return as expected some person was sent in search of her, who found the ill-fated little girl suspended by the neck from a window quite dead; her death having evidently been occasioned by the dropping of the window upon her neck. It appeared that, finding the door fastened, she succeeded in getting into the house through a window which was open, but not fastened up. Having procured a basket to gather leaves, she attempted to get out, and had nearly succeeded, when the window dropped and produced the sudden and mournful result described.—The People's (Ct.) Advocate.

The American Prisoners at Van Dieman's Land.—We are glad to see so much interest manifested in behalf of these unfortunate men, by the press and people generally of all parties. We believe that the unfortunate men, debarred from their country, homes and families, at the other extremity of the world almost, have paid in full the penalty of their delusion. It would, it seems to us, better become a great nation to set the prisoners free than to continue their servitude. At least, our Government owes it to itself to interfere peaceably for the amelioration of the condition of the prisoners.

Influx of Foreigners.—The number of emigrants who have arrived during the present season, from foreign ports, exceeds 21,000. A late Quebec paper states the arrivals in Canada at over 15,000. Total 36,000. It is expected that during the months of July and August, at least 40,000 more will arrive at New York and Quebec.

Remains of Gen. Harrison.—The committee from Cincinnati, having in charge the remains of Gen. Harrison, accompanied by several military corps from Baltimore, were met on the route to York by a deputation from that borough; and when the cars arrived at York, the military and other associations of the town, turned out in great strength, as a testimonial of respect for the remains of the "good President." A procession of imposing array and number was formed, and marched through the town. The Editor of the Baltimore Patriot says, that the whole ceremonial and disposition there, were of a character to become the place and the occasion. The reception and entertainment at Columbia were appropriate. And leaving the Cincinnati committee, with its honored charge, at that point, the Baltimore escort took the homeward route the same afternoon.

Temperance Cause at Pittsburg.—Harris' Intelligencer says—"Upwards of 2,000 have joined the Washington Temperance Society of Pittsburgh and Allegany since Messrs. Small, Vickers, and Williams, the Missionaries from Baltimore, have been with us to tell their simple story in the horrors of drunkenness; and the Catholic Temperance Society numbers upwards of 2,000—making 4,000, and the work seems only beginning.

Arrest of a Villain.—Constable Clapp, of Boston, last week arrested a scoundrel, named Levi Barker, who has been for a long time in the habit of swindling the merchants of Boston, by dressing in the style of a servant, and ordering "those goods which his mistress looked at yesterday," sent to her house. He had already procured a large quantity of valuable goods in this way, but on Wednesday, greatly to his chagrin, he found himself suddenly staring in the face of several Police officers, who were inclined to ask sundry impertinent questions. The answers not being eminently satisfactory, he was remanded for trial.—Times.

South Trade.—A highly respectable shoe manufacturer, in Lynn, informed us the other day, that a careful investigation had been made in regard to the losses of that place, by Southern and Western trade, during the last fifteen years. The result is that Lynn is minus, principal and interest, the sum of 3,000,000, from the just reward of its industry, during that time. This loss is chiefly in its trade with the South. The losses on the Western trade, however, are in a great measure to be charged to the South, for the Western merchant is often rendered unable to pay, by losses on produce sent to the Southern market, and not paid for. Lynn manufacturers and their merchant agents, our informant thought, would not trust slave-holders any more.—Free American.

Horrible Affair in the Missouri Penitentiary.—The St. Louis New Era, gives an account of a murder in the Penitentiary at Jefferson City, and the escape of eight convicts. On the morning of the 14th inst. some fifteen or twenty of the convicts were taken from the Penitentiary to be employed in digging the foundation of a house some where in the city. They were placed in charge of the guard, and by this arrangement only one man was left to guard the fifty or more convicts remaining in the penitentiary. While pacing his round on the top of the house, at about 2 o'clock, three convicts employed in the saddler's shop, sent for Mr. William Bullard, one of the overseers, under pretence of desiring instructions as to their work. He went to the shop, and was instantly murdered by blows inflicted with their hammers. The wretches took from his belt a brace of pistols, armed themselves with axes, and taking from his pocket the key of the prison, made their escape. The solitary guard fired at them as they passed, but without effect. The convicts employed in digging the cellar, were aware of the intended murder, for as soon as the alarm bell sounded, one of them exclaimed, "Bullard is a dead man." Gov. Reynold's immediately offered a reward of $100 each for the eight who escaped.

A Check to Lynching.—Four individuals recently in Chicot county, Arkansas, who took upon themselves to chastise one Solomon Crosby, were tried for assault and battery, and the jury returned a verdict of $12,000. A few verdicts like this, will put a stop, we think, to Lynch law.

There are 600,000 habitual drunkards in England, 157 of whom die daily. Three-fourths of the crimes committed there, are perpetrated under the excitement of liquor. What stronger picture can be drawn?

Lead from the West.—The Madison arrived at Buffalo on the 27th ultimo., bringing 475 pigs of lead, which were smelted from ore obtained from a mine near Milwaukie, of which, but sixty days since nothing was known. The mine is some sixty miles south west of that place, and is said to yield an immense per centage of pure metal—more so, indeed, than any yet discovered in that territory. A scientific individual discovered the treasure, bought up the land, and is now in a fair way of reaping a rich harvest. The Buffalo Commercial says, that part of the lead sold at points between that port and the place of shipment, at $65 per ton.

The venerable James Abercrombie, D. D. of the Protestant Episcopal church, died at Philadelphia on Saturday evening the 26th ult.

From the Lyons Whig.

Inquest.—I was called on the 7th inst., to hold an inquest on the body of an unknown person, who came to his death on that day by throwing himself headlong from a canal bridge about two miles west of Clyde.—His head came in contact with the timbers of the abutments, receiving thereby a large gash on the left side, causing so violent a concussion of the brain as to produce death in two hours. He had been seen in the vicinity a short time previous, in a state of mental derangement. He was apparently about 30 or 35 years of age, five feet ten inches in height, with dark hair and a sound set of teeth. No artificial marks were discovered, except on his left thumb, where the nail had been bruised off, and had not perfectly grown on again. His dress consisted of an olive brown broadcloth frock coat, black pantaloons and vest; a black stock, calf-skin boots, and a black fur hat, manufactured by J. Bronson, Brockport, N. Y. He had on a striped cotton shirt. From marks on his clothing it is conjectured he was a blacksmith. His remains were decently interred, on the following day, in the grave-yard at Lockberlin. His clothes are in my possession, where they can be examined at any time.

T. T. ROMEYN, Coroner.

Galen, June 11, 1841.

Terrible Misery.—One of the police officers of Philadelphia, on the 24th ult., visited a house in that city, for the purpose of arresting a man named Kelley. On entering his house he beheld a most sickening sight. It appears that three of Kelley's children had for some time been afflicted with the small pox, one of whom had just died, and the other two, still in the most loathsome and deplorable condition, were lying upon rags on the floor. To add still more to the heart-rending spectacle, the mother of the children lay on the floor intoxicated, and unable to afford them any assistance. Kelley, the father, is a worthless creature, and had deserted them. This account of degradation and misery, fairly rivals those that come to us across the Atlantic; but, fortunately, the suffering in this case is chargeable to far other causes than in similar instances in the old world.

Treason in Arkansas.—One of the grossest and most outrageous violations of law, in open defiance of the State authorities, ever known in this country, occurred in Phillips Co., Arkansas, a few weeks since. At the regular May term of the Circuit Court, a large amount of property was advertised to be sold, and a petition signed by above 200 names was presented to the Judge, praying him not to hold the Court. Disregarding this, however, in the manly discharge of duty, Judge Baker, proceeded to the Court, when he found the Hall of Justice in the possession of about 20 armed men, who had barricaded the door, refused admission to any one, and threatened the Sheriff with death if he showed resistance. The Sheriff made a requisition on the Colonel of the county, for an armed force to suppress the rebellion. He then resigned his office, and the power to appoint a successor devolving on one who was himself among the insurgents, the holding the Court was wholly prevented, and treason was triumphant in Arkansas.

Runaway Slaves.—The brig Relief, from Norfolk, for St. John, N. B., put into Newport, R. I., on Thursday, the 25th ult., to land a slave, who had secreted himself on board the ship at Norfolk, in order to send him back to his owner. He had assisted in loading the brig at Norfolk, and had been at sea seven days before he was discovered to be on board. During the night after the Captain's arrival, the negro loosed his cords, stole the boat, and landed on Goat Island, whence he was conveyed back to the town. It is said that the blacks of that place have taken him in charge and are going to convey him to New-Bedford. His name is Jackson, and he says he has a wife in this city.

Rescue of a Slave.—We noticed a few days since the rescue of a slave from the hands of the officers in Lancaster Co., Pa. We learn that he is now safe in Canada. It seems that no one was injured in the affray, nor were the officers resisted forcibly in making the arrest. Moses Whitson, the Quaker, with whom the slave was found, merely asked their authority, and when shown it, said it was insufficient, as the warrant was taken in Lancaster Co., and the arrest made in Chester. It is said a suit will be brought against the officers for unlawful seizure.—Tribune.

Among the persons arrested by the London Police last year, were 29 lawyers, 72 medical men, 69 musicians, 1111 painters, and 599 printers.

There was a refreshing shower throughout the western part of this State on the 23rd ult., which has brightened the face of nature, and the prospect for the coming harvest most gratefully. It rained three hours at Rochester, and nearly as long at Buffalo, also at Fredonia.

Most Brutal.—Dr. Buffington, who has taken charge of one of the Dispensaries in Phila., a few days since, deliberately burned with lunar caustic, the form of a cross in the forehead of a little girl under his care, to punish her for singing in the morning! The scar will probably never be removed. The heartless Doctor was held to bail in the sum of $500 to answer for the offense.

There are in the city of New-York nearly 1,500 grog-shops open every Sunday, and there are five grog-shops in that city with a population of 325,000, to one in London, where there are 2,000,000 of souls.

A large bear was killed on the 27th ult., in Franklin township, Lycoming Co., Pa., by the wife of Mr. Joseph Whitmore. Her only weapon was a broad hoe.

The Washington Temperance Society at Hartford, has been established but about three weeks, and already numbers 140 members, mainly those who have been habitual drunkards, or at least tiplers, but who now abjure all that can intoxicate.

A man in Rochester had his coat stolen a few days since. Shortly after, he saw it lying on the deck of a canal-boat, and without ceremony picked it up and walked off. On examining the pockets, he found there a fair lot of cash, of which there was an entire deficiency when the coat was stolen.

It is said that the British Queen will not come out again this season, in consequence of the great excitement caused in England by the non-appearance of the President.

The General Government have sent large orders to Pottsville, Pa., for cannon balls to be cast from anthracite manufactured iron.

The completion of the rail-road from Seneca Falls to Rochester is expected by the 4th of July.

The New Era says, that St. Louis, as at present incorporated, contains almost thirty thousand inhabitants.

The value of the annual agricultural products of the United States, fairly estimated, is seven hundred millions of dollars! The whole amount of bank debts is about five hundred millions of dollars; and the whole amount of paper money in circulation, is about one hundred millions.

Seven deserters from the British army were drowned last week, while attempting to swim across the river at Buffalo.

New Temperance Papers.—The firm hold which the principles of temperance are gaining upon the popular mind, is indicated by the numerous papers devoted to their enforcement, and which are springing up in all parts of the Union, and which show by their vigor and enterprise, the evidences of being held in favor.

In addition to those already in existence, another paper the "Olive Plant," has been started in this city, by L. D. Johnson, and is to be composed entirely of articles written by females. The first No. contains interesting contributions from Mrs. Steele, the popular and and talented author of the "Heroines of Sacred History," and from the well-known pen of Mrs. Stedman. It ought to be better printed.

A new and vigorous paper has been started in North Carolina, the first of the kind in the State.

A daily temperance paper, called the "Morning Star," has been commenced at Boston, by James Burns, Esq. a reformed drunkard. It is so far well sustained.

The "Washingtonian" is also edited and published by a society of reformed drunkards, at Augusta, Me.

The "Magnolia" is another of the same kind, recently commenced at Cambridge, Mass.

"The Total Abstinent" is published by the young men of Norwich, Ct. These are cheering indications, and give promise of better times.

"The Work Goes Bravely On."—We surely live in an age of wonders. The recent impulse given to the cause of temperance by the movement among the drunkards, promises results almost as important and astonishing as those which have transpired in Ireland. At Pittsburgh, we are informed, since the arrival of the delegates of the Baltimore Washington Temperance Society, twelve hundred citizens of that place have joined the ranks of total abstinence. The effects of all these operations will not be long in developing.

Influx of Foreigners.—The number of emigrants who have arrived during the present season from foreign ports exceeds 21,000. A late Quebec paper states the arrival in Canada at over 14,000. Total 35,000. It is expected that during the months of July and August at least 40,000 more will arrive at New-York and Quebec.

Last of the Famous Darg Case.—It has been said that Tom Hughes, late the slave of John P. Darg, preferred going to the South as a slave, to remaining in the North a free man. It appears that Tom accompanied Darg as far as Baltimore, under a promise that he should be free, and live with his wife; that after he arrived there he discovered that he had been deceived, and that it was not the intention of Darg to comply with his engagement. He therefore embraced the first opportunity that offered and made his escape, and is now out of the reach of his kind benefactor.

This is precisely the result always expected by those acquainted with the facts.—A. S. Standard.

The Crops.—The editor of the Rochester Democrat has recently made a tour through the surrounding counties, and says he has never known the prospects less flattering. The severe and long continued drought has injuriously affected fall and spring crops, as well as grass. In some of the neighboring towns there has been no rain since the last of April. In most of the others there was more or less on the 10th, 11th, 17th and 18th ults., but not enough for the wants of vegetation. Many pieces of spring crops and grass will not pay for harvesting. Wheat is generally thin and light; the crops will probably yield fifty per cent. less than usual. The prospect now is that there will not be more than half a crop of wheat, and still less of spring crops, (if we except corn,) unless the land is soon visited with rain. In the towns in the immediate vicinity of Rochester there have been a few refreshing showers within the few past weeks, and crops are consequently more promising.

Gentleman direct from Michigan and the northern part of Ohio states that the prospects in those States is more flattering than in Western New-York. The season there has been remarkably dry. On the prairie lands of Michigan, vegetation appears to have been visited by fire. On the timbered lands, however, wheat looks as well as could have been expected for the season.

The Clinton (Ohio) Gazette says the wheat crops will prove a failure thereabouts. Canandaigua (N. Y.) papers make the same statements in regard to that section. Canada papers of May 28th report the prospects for crops very favorable. The accounts from the western portion of Maryland are decidedly in favor of the growing crops.—New-Yorker.

The accounts received since the above, are far more encouraging; and the prospect is that an abundant harvest will crown the efforts of the husbandman, and attest the unfailing goodness of Providence.

"The Way of the Transgressor is Hard."—A young man who had stolen a horse, in endeavoring to cross the river at Berkshire, Vt. to evade pursuit from the sheriff, was drowned. A large sum of counterfeit money was found on his person.

POETRY.

My Native Land.

My native land, how dear the theme,
How endless her rich blessings seem,
Where liberty's proud flag unfurled,
Beckoned a standard to the world!
When false profession, sovereign might,
Where substitute for sacred right,
When martial pride and kingly frown,
Would rudely trample justice down,
Thy true born sons at once agreed
[illegible] and for truth to bleed—
The true of heart how quickly plighted!
Who on her sacred altar lighted
A purer and enduring flame
For freedom's self—not freedom's name—
Then for thy cause how brightly shone
Thine own immortal Washington!
Dear Native Land! with freedom blest,
In gayer smiles thy fields are drest;
Each hill and plain and every teeming glade
By hands of freemen, are more fertile made;
No longer let the oppressed and burdened roam,
But find in thee a refuge and a home.
"Of many one" the motto of thy scroll,
So let it be while time shall onward roll:
Union shall weep what union proudly won,
Our fathers planned, great Washington begun,
Home of the brave and cradle of the free,
Thy clustering blessings all around I see!
Among them dearest to the freeman's heart.
[illegible] freely to the young impart
Blessings as those so richly showered here,
To make each other blessing doubly dear.
Let lofty temples and the gorgeous dome
Give lifeless glory to imperial Rome,
While here each hamlet, every village, town,
Found lasting glory and unstained renown.
Where education like the light of Heaven
To free born sons is just as freely given,
And those who love the Holy book of truth
Pour forth its precepts to untutored youth,
And to the blest of freedom's chartered scroll,
Proclaims the better freedom of the soul:
My Native Land! such is thy proudest boast,
The firmest safeguard to thy far-stretched coast;
The surest pledge of Union to the free,
Pledge too of peace and of prosperity.
Offspring of Heaven! Benignest Sunday School,
How flees before it darkness and misrule,
Parthenon's dome ne'er looked so brightly fair,
'Tis an Acropolis none can safely dare,
Here is thy hidden brave Palladium band,
And here thy citadel, my Native Land!
Who then the patriot, virtuous and pure,
Such certain blessings firmly to secure,
But these whose patient toil and watchful care,
The humblest part in such a work will share,
For such our warmest prayers we fondly breathe,
Who fadeless laurels for Columbia wreathe.
Blest by the smiles of Providence on high
This purer patriotism shall never die,
—To unborn ages shall such blessings be,
My Native Land, thou art forever free!

A MORAL SKETCH OF THE AMERICAN REVOLUTION.

"To live uprightly then is sure the best,
To save ourselves and not to damn the rest."
DRYDEN.

"Slave to no sect, who takes no private road,
But looks through nature up to nature's God."
POPE.

'In the year 17—, when the American army lay encamped, (the reader will please excuse me for not mentioning where,) the commander of the British forces in America, (Lord Cornwallis,) being in the neighborhood and desiring some correspondence with the American Commander-in-Chief, despatched one of his officers, (Major Brock,) with a letter for that individual.—Major Brock was a young officer, who had been in the service of the British army for about two years, and by his bravery, manly bearing and virtuous actions, had gained the love of his inferiors, and, indeed, even of his haughty commander; and his love of justice and regard for the laws of humanity, had insured for him the esteem and admiration of his enemies.—And although he had suffered much, as he naturally would, from the influence of education, his ambition was not to be gratified by the attainment of an object through unjust means, no matter how great the advancement of individual interest. He always looked to the justness of the cause in which he had enlisted, and it was by no means in unison with his feelings, or in accordance with the dictates of his heart, that he had embarked to cross the ocean and assist in putting down the "rebels."

It was on a bright autumnal morning, and the sun had just risen and sipped the frost from the dying leaves, when Major Brock mounted his fiery charger and bounded forth for the American camp. A few minutes brought him within sight of where the American army lay, and riding swiftly along a pathway which led through a strip of woods adjacent to the camp, his attention was attracted by the soft low sound of a human voice. He halted, and turning to one side, was almost ready to doubt the reality of what he saw. It was General Washington praying! In a bower formed by the vines of the wild grape, he was kneeled, and humbly, and ardently engaged in his morning prayer. Brock gazed upon this imposing scene, till yielding to the impulse of his heart, he dismounted, and kneeling upon the ground, poured out with Washington, the pure and unshaded sentiments of his soul. It brought home to him the unjustness of his cause, the fact that he was engaged in a war against the innocent. When Washington arose, Brock advanced and took him by the hand. For a moment his feelings had so overcome him, that he was unable to give utterance to his thoughts; but on recovering a little, he pressed the hand of Washington firmly within his, and looking him full in the face, said, "No more will I war for the ungodly—no more will I battle in the armies of the unjust!"

There was an expression in his eye, and a simplicity in his speech, which told well the sincerity of his heart. Virtue and nobleness of feeling beamed from his countenance, and as he spoke the tears rolled down his cheeks, and they flowed not less freely from the eyes of Washington.

The General led him to his tent, and after having attended to the letter of Cornwallis, and prepared an answer, Brock bid him adieu and departed for his own camp. And as he rode leisurely along, he thought much concerning the manner in which he should bring about the desire of his heart, how he should carry out the design which he had now resolved upon—to quit the British army. He knew that to attempt a desertion would be dangerous; and too, he scorned the idea of leaving behind him the name of a deserter. He therefore resolved to ask of his commander a release, although he well knew the character of Cornwallis, and had good reason to suspect the answer with which his question would be met.

However, Cornwallis soon discovered that there was something wrong with Brock; he was not that cheerful, witty, and pleasant person which he had been, but was just the reverse. He began to get uneasy; he knew how deeply and how sensibly he should feel the loss of Brock—that the brightest feather would be plucked from his plume. And one evening as he walked out to take a view of his camp, he saw Brock seated upon the trunk of a fallen tree, far separate from any one else; his hands were up to his face, and his eyes rested upon the ground. Cornwallis approached and thus addressed him:

"Major, what is the matter? what has come over you within the last few days that has made you so down-hearted? You are just the reverse of what you were heretofore."

"Ah, my lord," replied Brock, "there is something which weighs heavily upon my mind, and although it is within your power, I fear you will not relieve me of the burthen."

"Why, Brock, you know I have always been friendly towards you, and would certainly be very happy to do for you at present, whatever is in my power," continued Cornwallis, in rather a condescending tone.

"It is very true," said Brock—"you have acted as a friend towards me; but at present, I fear—I know, I shall be detected."

"Brock," demanded Cornwallis, assuming his usual haughty air, "explain this mystery; you have excited my curiosity. Is it any thing of importance you are thus brooding over."

"Of vast importance to me, sir," said Brock, "and as you demand to know what it is, I throw myself upon your friendship, and humbly pray a release."

"A release? why, what means this? are you joking me? or are you insane?" said Cornwallis, in a haughty, threatening voice.

"I am neither, sir," replied Brock; "I mean what I say."

"Then, sir, explain immediately, why you demand a release; I wish to know the meaning of this," said the haughty commander.

"Well, my lord, as you express so strong a desire to know, I will tell you. As I was going to the American camp with your letter, I found Gen. Washington kneeling upon the ground in the forest, praying; and"

"And he turned you traitor?" interrupted Cornwallis.

"Traitor! Taunt me not, I pray you, sir, with such an expression," said Brock, in a clear, manly voice; and the indignation of his soul flashed from his eye. "I was going to say," continued he, "that my feelings were so aroused by his piety that I there swore never more to war against that good man, who is engaged in a righteous cause, and trusts for success to the arbiter of nations!"

"Remember, sir," said Cornwallis, "the words which you now speak, if adhered to may be the cause of your death. But did you never see a man pray before—is it any thing uncommon?"

"Yes, sir," replied Brock, "it was uncommon. I have seen men pray, but I never before saw the commander of a mighty army seek out a place of secrecy, and there pray for his enemies as well as for himself. Had Gen. Washington," continued Brock, "prayed alone for himself, or for his own cause, my feelings towards him at present, would be different from what they are; but he prayed, too, for us—for our army—for our government—yes, my lord, he prayed for you."

The feelings of Cornwallis were somewhat subdued by the simplicity and earnestness of Brock's manner, but on second thought he resumed his threatening.

"Major Brock," said he, "tell me now, without jesting, whether or not you have spoken your mind, and intend practising what you have professed."

"I do, my lord! I do!" replied Brock, and there was something in his expression which gave double assurance to his words. Cornwallis knew him too well to believe that he would ever abandon a purpose which he had so solemnly formed, and for the maintenance of which he had pledged his honor.

"Brock," resumed Cornwallis, "I leave you—to-morrow morning at 9 o'clock I must see you again, and if your intention be then as it is now, a Court Martial will settle your fate."

The morning came, and at 9 o'clock, Brock was at the tent of his commander; and on the question being put to him—"Do you intend maintaining the purpose which you last evening avowed," he calmly and earnestly replied—

"I do, sir, and ever will. What I swear to is not to be forgotten in a day."

This answer was full and explicit; it settled business with him and put an end to questioning. A Court Martial was called—Cornwallis presided over the deliberations, which was solemn and lasted long. It was, indeed a hard task to condemn Brock to death, but what were they to do? He had sworn never more to bear arms in their cause. Some were in favor of releasing him, but this was opposed by others, who maintained that he dare not go home to his own country, and would therefore espouse the cause of the "rebels." The views of the latter were sustained, and Brock was condemned to death for "mutiny."

The day was appointed, the hour was fixed, and the sentence conveyed to the convict, who received it with calmness and apparent satisfaction, as though he had anticipated as much. But Cornwallis would scarce permit himself to believe that they would be put to the disagreeable necessity of carrying out the injunctions of their decree. He still entertained a faint hope that Brock would change his mind before the day of execution should arrive. And it was that hope, with a view to ascertain the degree to which it might be exercised, that prompted him to put the following question to Brock, a day or two after his sentence had reached him, and to condescend to that familiar manner, and honied expression, by which he expected to play the orator and effect his object.

"Brock," said he, laying his hand upon his shoulder," are you going to permit yourself to be borne to the grave amid the outpourings of condemnation and disgrace, and leave behind you the name of a traitor? an enemy to the land that gave you birth?

"An enemy to my country?" replied Brock. "Truth and a knowledge of me will not dictate such an assertion." I have not been an enemy to my country; God forbid that I ever should. I have stood by her in times of need; I have defied her foes; I have offered myself as a sacrifice for her benefit—I never fought for worldly honor—I never fought for carnal glory.—The good of my country and the salvation of justice has been my aim. My country is now in the wrong, she is engaged in an unjust war against a portion of her own subjects. It will cast an indelible stain upon her character, and I cannot assist to thus degrade her—if I should, I would then be an enemy to my country. You appear to think my mind has been all this time unsettled; but to satisfy you, sir, all I have to say is this, I would much sooner die a martyr to my conscience than live the tool of a tyrant; and as to condemnation and sneers of an ignorant multitude, I wholly disregard them—they are so stupid—so blinded by ignorance and superstition, that they see not their own degraded situation."

Cornwallis left him; and was now perfectly satisfied that Brock meant to die; it increased much his uneasiness, but the friendly feelings which Brock's former conduct had excited in his bosom, seemed now to change into hatred, and he appeared anxiously to await the hour which was to blot out the existence of Brock.

However, it soon arrived, and Cornwallis mounted his horse and started with his officers and a guard appointed for the purpose, to where the prisoner was confined. They released his chains, and had proceeded to where the gallows was erected, when Cornwallis suddenly halting, exclaimed, Hark! Hark!! The sentinels fire!

Directly, the cry, "The enemy—they come," rang round, and confusion reigned throughout the camp. Cornwallis flew to his tent and cried, "to arms;" the soldiers to their ranks, and Brock was left alone.—It was now that Cornwallis experienced the loss of Brock, there was none who could fill the place he had vacated; there was none upon whom he could rely with that confidence—there was none to lend him that prudent counsel.

Brock, from where he stood, had a fair view of both armies; and turning towards the Americans, he discovered Washington in the thickest of the fight, and in the excitement of the moment, he made a desperate effort to burst asunder the shackles which bound together his arms; but it was in vain he attempted, and fearing lest he should see the General fall, he buried his face in his hands. He could hear above the clash of arms, Washington urging on his men to victory; and they answered the sound of his voice with huzzas that made the welkin ring, and the very earth tremble beneath them. The dead and dying were becoming thick around Cornwallis; and directly Brock heard a murmur among the British troops, as if unable and unwilling to withstand longer the galling fire of the Americans, and uncovering his eyes he saw the ranks falling back in confusion; he stretched himself up to his highest, and waving his hand above his head, cried at the top of his voice, "Victory! Victory!! and the rights of man forever," and fell senseless upon the ground, overpowered with patriotic joy.

The strife of battle ceased, and its echoes died away; but it ever lived in the memory of Cornwallis, and Brock hailed it as the anniversary of a great blessing from God. By the engagement, Washington gained a decisive victory, and an officer who stood by his side in the perils of many a battle, and he who ever remembered with grateful feelings and a warm heart.

West Chester, May 10, 1841.

EARLY RISING.

A single dew-drop, however small, furnishes in turn gems of all imaginable colors. In one light it is a sapphire; shifting the eye a little, it becomes an emerald; then a ruby; and lastly, when viewed so as to reflect the light without refracting it, it has all the splendor of a diamond. But to obtain this beautiful display of natural colors, it is necessary to take advantage of the morning, when the beams of the newly-risen sun are nearly level with the surface of the earth; and this is the time when the morning birds are in their finest song, when the air and the earth are in their greatest freshness, and when all nature mingles in one common morning song of gratitude.—There is something peculiarly arousing and strengthening both to the body and mind in this early time of the morning; and were we always wise enough to avail ourselves of it, it is almost incredible with what ease and pleasure the labors of the most diligent life might be performed. There is an awakening of the morning, which cannot be obtained at any other time of the day; and they who miss this, go heavily about their employment, and an hour of their drawling day is not equal to half an hour of the energetic day of one who sees the sun rise. When, too, we take the day by the beginning, we can regulate the length of it according to our necessities; and whatever may be our professional avocations, we have time to perform them, to cultivate our minds, add to worship our Maker, without the one duty in the least interfering with the other.

PIGEON EXPRESSES,

The modern system of pigeon expresses possesses an extraordinary interest, as well on account of its rapid means of communicating the most important events, as of the curious and laborious modes by which it is set in motion. The birds by far the most valuable for this purpose are of the Antwerp breed, although it is not uncommon to train the English pigeons, called dragons, to carry expresses. They are trained when very young, or, as they are technically called, 'squeakers,' to fly between different towns and villages, commencing first at a space of only a few hundred yards, and so on, gradually increasing until they accomplished the desired distance. They are usually trained to fly to intermediate stations between Dover and London, at which they are succeeded by other relays, but fly, in many instances, the whole distance from other places. The number lost in training is immense. The trade is principally in the hands of the Jews, and the emoluments arising therefrom are very considerable. There are a few instances in which capitalists and others having extensive moneyed and mercantile operations throughout Europe, maintain an establishment of their own, among whom is the Baron Rothschild, who, at Dover, rears and trains his own flight of pigeon expresses, with connecting branches throughout Germany and other parts of the Continent. The establishment at Dover consists of about 400 birds, with a keeper, whose wages are 35s. a week. The expense of feeding the birds is considerable—as much as 25s. a week being consumed at Dover in beans alone, while the entire collection is supposed to have cost at least £2,000. The express is sometimes tied to the middle feather of the tail, by passing a thread with a needle attached to the leg, immediately above the spur. The rapidity of these important expresses may be estimated by the following information obtained from a trainer and proprietor. His pigeons have arrived in London with the news of the winner of the Ascot Cup in fifteen minutes; from the Newmarket in sixty minutes; and from Chichester, bringing the winner of the Goodwin Cup, in one hour and fifteen minutes. At Ascot Races last year, her majesty having expressed a wish to see one of these beautiful birds, a carrier pigeon was flown in her majesty's presence, from the royal stand, and to the great delight of the spectators, after indulging in sundry gyrations, darted onwards, with its winged intelligence to the metropolis.

MICHIGAN WOOL.—The Wollen Manufactory in this city is now engaged in working up the first, or nearly the first lot of wool ever exported from the peninsular State. From some experience in both wool and wheat growing, we are confident that the labor and capital employed in producing wool in Michigan, obtain a much larger profit than is acquired in the production of wheat. Both the soil and climate of Michigan are admirably adapted to the keeping of sheep and the growth of fine wool. The soil is generally rich, warm and loose, and peculiarly fitted to yield the largest crops of roots, and red and white clover. A thousand sheep can now, or after shearing, be purchased in Ohio for $750; and a thousand acres of good land to keep them on, can be had in Michigan at government price, making the first cost of such a plantation, stocked with a thousand sheep to begin with only $2.000. A flock of the largest sheep we ever saw was raised on White Pigeon prairie in Michigan. A large portion of the forests are so thinly timbered grass can be cultivated very successfully without disturbing any of trees, and they will serve the double purpose of protecting sheep from the burning sun of summer and the cold winds of winter The danger from wolves is vastly overrated. Far more sheep are destroyed in this State by dogs than are killed by wolves in an open new country. Wild animals are soon driven away from the abode of civilized man. It costs from two-fifths to one-half the value of a barrel of flour to transport it from the interior of Michigan to New York; while the expence of transporting wool does not exceed 4 per cent., on its value.—Buffalo Adv.

EDUCATION.—It was at least a century after the discovery of the art of printing, before any other marks of punctuation than the colon, or period was used. About that time a particular stroke like a parenthesis without its curves, was introduced to designate the pause of a comma. Law books were formerly printed, as law documents are now written, without stops, which rendered it somewhat difficult to understand the meaning, and hence arose the well known phrase "the glorious uncertainty of the law."

An unparalleled remedy for common Colds, Coughs, Asthma, Influenza, Whooping Cough, Bronchitis, and all diseases of the Breast and Lungs, leading to Consumption; composed of the concentrated virtues of Horehound, Boneset, Blood Root, Liverwort, and several other vegetable substances Prepared only by J. M. WINSLOW, Rochester, N. Y.

The innocence and universally admitted pectoral virtues of the Herbs from which the BALSAM OF HOREHOUND is made, are too generally known to require recommendation; it is therefore only necessary to observe that the Medicine contains the whole of their Medicinal properties, highly concentrated, and so happily combined with several other vegetable substances, as to render it the most speedy, mild, and certain remedy, now in use, for the complaints above mentioned.

Thousands of testimonials will be shown, if wanted, at any time, placing the above medicines beyond reproach.

In conclusion he would only say, that he will not be under-sold on any article which he offers for sale.

For the Register.

The keeping of a Seventh part of time merely is not a fulfillment of the Law of the Sabbath.

MR. EDITOR—I am always gratified in finding articles in the Register, tending to enlighten the public upon the important subject of the Sabbath; and it was with interest that I read your reply to "A Proposition from the West," in No. 16, of this Vol. I think it was pertinent, and amply sufficient to expose the absurdity of the plan proposed for bringing seventh-day Baptists and first-day Baptists to unite in observing the first, instead of the seventh day of the week. Nevertheless, there appears to be one idea couched in the extract, or, at least, alluded to, and one which I have often heard expressed, which may require a further examination, viz: that the impracticability of observing the same identical hours in every part of the earth on account of its globular form and diurnal revolutions, evinces that the particular day of the week to be observed as a Sabbath is not material, but that the essential duty required is the keeping of a seventh part of time holy to God; and that whether this be the seventh or the first, or any other day in the week, the command is fulfilled, and the true intent of the Sabbath answered, and a clear conscience maintained. On this notion, I feel disposed to offer a few remarks.

The fact that time would be gained by going eastward, and lost by going westward round the globe, cannot be reasonably supposed to render it immaterial what particular day is kept as the Sabbath, because there is the same distinction in the order of time in every part of the world, and the precept for the Sabbath was designed and calculated for every part of it. When God blessed and sanctified the seventh day, after six days work in creating, and assigned as a reason, that "in it he rested from all his work," it presupposes that man in every part of the world can distinguish this from every other day, else the command would be impracticable, which would not consist with the righteousness of his government. The command is adapted to the condition and circumstances which his subjects would be in. Because the sun rises just 12 hours earlier to the antipodes than it does to us, so that we and they cannot, from the difference in our location, observe the same identical portion of time, we are not to conclude that no particular importance is to be attached to the day of the week set apart for a Sabbath: For this difference as to the commencement of the day, unavoidably occasioned by the earth's revolving upon its axis, does not affect the order of time either to us or them. This circumstance has no more effect upon the subject than the commencement of the day in the planet of Jupiter. The command respects the day as it passes with us in our longitude and our sphere of life and action, and not as it passes with those whose location and circumstances, from the earth's form and motion, are necessarily different from ours. The question is not, when does the day commence with the antipodes, or with those living three-quarters of the way round the earth; but when does it commence with us? What is the due order of time in our longitude? This can be determined just as well from the actual circumstances of the case, as it could be, if the earth was one vast motionless plain, and the sun should revolve around it, according to the ancient hypothesis, and rise at the same moment upon every part of it. Hence, the weekly division of time established by God, and the mention of the successive days in each week, and the designation of the seventh in the order of time for religious rest, necessarily implies that one day can be distinguished from another, and the time of each day's commencement determined, in conformity to the position and circumstances of the earth's inhabitants. The seventh day of the week can be distinguished from the others, and the time of its commencement fixed, as well as the first or any other. And, hence, when we find this day actually designated for the Sabbath without any subsequent repeal or amendment, and a reason assigned for its sanctification which will not apply to any other day in the week, we must necessarily infer that an importance is attached to the day; and that merely observing a seventh part of time, say the first, or the sixth day in each week, is not fulfilling the commandment, nor answering, in all respects, the end of the institution. It is not obeying the word of the Lord, which says, "The seventh day is the Sabbath"—not a seventh part of time merely; but the seventh day of the week. Would a first-day Baptist, or Christian, believing that a special reason is assigned for observing the first day, viz: the resurrection of Christ thereon, be consistent in allowing that the second, or the sixth is equally appropriate, when this special reason would not be applicable to either? Truly, this cannot be admitted, although the ground taken as above leads to such a consequence. Suppose a general council of the churches in connection with the state governments, should decree that the second day of the week should be henceforth observed, as the Sabbath instead of the first, ought this to satisfy conscientious first day people?—Should it be considered tantamount to observing the first, and actually a fulfillment of the fourth commandment, when neither the reason therein assigned for keeping the seventh, nor the reason supposed to be assigned for keeping the first would apply to it?—Must we not say no? and supposing a subsequent general council of church and state should fix upon the fourth day instead of the second, how should it be viewed by those who had brought their consciences quietly to acquiesce in the observance of the second? Should they not, and would they not, regard it as making void the law itself, and as "turning things upside down?" Further, what if a portion of the church, or a certain number of individuals, should fix upon different days for the Sabbath, some upon the second, some upon the fourth, and some upon the sixth, should all be considered as right? And how long would any Sabbath survive such a difference of views, and the taking of such a liberty with an admitted institution of heaven? And what if the same individuals, or churches, to suit their convenience, or caprice, should observe different days, at different times, (taking care to keep a seventh part of time) should this be considered as a fulfilment of the law? Upon the principle contended for by the objector, it must be so considered. And yet the supposition involves a palpable absurdity.—Besides, such a course would tend directly to destroy a weekly Sabbath altogether.

I therefore solemnly protest against the idea that the sanctification of a seventh part of time, merely without regard to the day answers the Sabbatic law, and affirm, on the broad principle of Divine designation and appointment, that

The seventh day of the week is the only true and authorized Sabbath.

Yours, truly,
JABEZ CHADWICK.

THE ACCURACY OF THE SACRED WRITERS.

After having shown that, from the nature of the case, the language of the Scriptures in relation to the phenomena of nature, must be accommodated to that which mankind in all ages have commonly used: and after having shown how inconvenient and incomprehensible sometimes, even to the genius of a Newton, the Bible must have been if it had always spoken of the operations of nature, not as science has even yet ascertained them, but as they really are, Professor Gaussen proceeds to lay down his first position in relation to this subject, which is, that there is not one physical error in the Word of God. This point he discusses with singular felicity. From this part of his work we are tempted to give an extract of considerable length, which will well reward the reader for a careful perusal. After having, in the course of several pages, indicated the errors of both ancient and modern philosophers, on several points in Physics and Astronomy, as well as some of the ridiculous decisions of some of the Roman Pontiffs, such as Pope Zachariah, and the Holy Office (by which Galileo was condemned,) he proceeds:

"But now open the Bible: study its fifty sacred authors, from that admirable Moses who held the pen in the wilderness, four hundred years before the war of Troy, to that fisherman, son of Zebedee, who wrote fifteen hundred years later at Ephesus and in Patmos, under the reign of Domitian; open the Bible, and see, if you will find there any thing like this. No; none of those mistakes which the science of each succeeding age discovers in the books of the preceding; above all, none of those absurdities which modern astronomy indicates, in such great numbers, in the writings of the ancients,—in their sacred codes, in their philosophies, and even in the finest pages of the Fathers of the church,—not one of these errors is to be found in any of our sacred books. Nothing there will ever contradict that which, after so many ages, the investigations of the learned world have been able to reveal to us on the state of our globe, or on that of the heavens. Peruse, with care, our Scriptures, from one end to the other, to find there such spots. And whilst you apply yourselves to this examination, remember, that it is a book which speaks of every thing, which describes nature, which recounts its grandeur, which relates the story of its creation, which tell us of the formation of the heavens, of the light, of the water, of the atmosphere, of the mountains, of the animals and of the plants. It is a book which teaches us the first revolutions of the world, and which also foretells its last; it recounts them in the circumstantial language of history, it extols them in the sublimest strains of poetry, and it chants them in the charms of glowing song. It is a book which is full of oriental rapture, elevation, variety and boldness. It is a book which speaks of the heavenly and invisible world; whilst it also speaks of the earth and things visible. It is a book which nearly fifty writers, of every degree of cultivation, of every state, of every condition, and living through the course of fifteen hundred years, have concurred to make. It is a book which was written in the centre of Asia, in the sands of Arabia, and the deserts of Judah, in the courts of the temple of the Jews in the rustic schools of the prophets of Bethel and of Jericho, in the sumptuous palaces of Babylon, and on the idolatrous banks of Chebar; and finally, in the centre of the western civilization, in the midst of the Jews and of their ignorance, in the midst of polytheism and its idols, as also in the bosom of pantheism and its sad philosophy. It is a book whose first writer had been forty years a pupil of the magicians of Egypt, in whose opinion the sun, the stars and the elements were endowed with intelligence, reacted on the elements, and governed the world by a perpetual effluvium. It is a book whose first writer preceded, by more than nine hundred years, the most ancient philosophers of ancient Greece and Asia, the Thaleses and the Pythagorases, the Zaleucuses, the Zenophons and Confuciuses. It is a book which carries its narrations even to the plains of the invisible world, even to the hierarchies of angels, even to the most distant epochs of the future, and the glorious scenes of the last day. Well; search among its 50 authors, search among its 66 books, its 1,189 chapters and its 31,173 verses, search for only one of these thousand errors which the ancients and the moderns commit when they speak of the heavens or of the earth; of their revolutions or of their elements; search,—but you will find none.

Its language is without constraint and without reserve. It speaks of every thing and in all tones. It is the prototype,—it has been the unrivalled model, and the inspirer of all that is most elevated in poetry. Ask Milton ask the Racines, ask Young, ask Klopstock. They will tell you, that this divine poetry is, after all, the most lyrical the boldest and the most sublime. It mounts on the wings of a seraph, it expatiates on those of the wind And yet this book never does violence either to the facts or to the principles of a sound philosophy of nature. You never find it in opposition, even in one sentence, to the just notions which science has conveyed to us on the form of our globe, on its size and its geology; on the void and on the space; on the inert and passive materiality of the stars; on the planets, on their masses, on their courses, on their dimensions or on their influences; on the stars which inhabit the profundities of space, on their number, on their nature, on their immensity. In like manner when speaking of the invisible world and of the subject—so new, so unknown, so delicate—of the angels, this book will not present you one of its writers, in the course of the 1,560 years, which were employed in writing it, who has differed from the others in the character which he gives of the love, of the humility, of the fervor, and of the purity which belongs to those mysterious beings. In like manner, in speaking of the relations of the heavenly world to God never has one of these fifty writers, either in the Old Testament or the New, uttered a single word favorable to the perpetual pantheism of the heathen philosophy. Neither do you find one of the authors of the Bible who, in speaking of the visible world, has suffered to escape from his pen one of those sentences which in other books contradict the reality of facts; not one which makes of the heavens a firmament, as do the Septuagint, St. Jerome and all the Fathers of the church [as the authors of our authorized English version have also done]; no one who makes the world to be an intelligent animal, as Plato does; no one who reduces all things here below, to the four physical elements of the ancients; no one who thinks with the Jews, with the Greeks and the Romans, with the best geniuses of antiquity,—with the great Tacitus among the ancients, and the great De Thou among the moderns,—with the sceptical Montaigne, "that the stars have rule and power, not only over our lives, and the conditions of our fortune, but even our inclinations, our discourse, our wills; that they rule them, impel and agitate them at the mercy of their influences; and that (as far as our reason teaches and discovers) the entire of this lower world is moved at the least shaking of the least of the heavenly movements. Facta etenim et vitas hominum suspendit ab astris." No one who speaks of the mountains as Mohammed does; of the cosmogony as Buffon; of the antipodes as Lucretius, as Plutarch, as Pliny, as Lactantius, as St. Augustine, as Pope Zachariah. Certainly, if only one of these errors which abound in the writings of philosophers, both ancient and modern could be found in the Bible, our faith in the plenary inspiration of the Scriptures would be more than compromised; it would be necessary to acknowledge that there are errors in the Word of God, and that these false sentences belong to a fallible writer and not to the Holy Spirit; for God is not man that he should lie; in him there is no variableness, nor shadow of falsehood; and He to whom "lying lips are an abomination," cannot contradict himself, nor dictate that which is false.

"There is, then, no physical error in the Scriptures, and this great fact, which becomes the more wonderful in proportion as it is viewed from a position near at hand, is a striking proof of the inspiration which dictated them, even in the choice of their least expressions."

CREATION.—For what purpose did the infinite Creator give existence to this majestic monument of his mighty power? For what purpose did he create the earth and the heavens, with their unnumbered hosts? Was it not evidently that he might communicate happiness; and does not his design appear conspicuous on the open face of nature? What is the plain unequivocal indication of those marks of infinite wisdom and skillful contrivance, in the general dispositions, and in all the parts of surrounding nature? Is it not, that the Creator of all things is infinitely good? Is there not a display of infinite goodness in the regular harmonious disposition of the Heavenly orbs? Instead of this benignant harmony of the spheres, why was there not a perpetual jar, and the most disastrous conclusion?

Is there not a display of infinite goodness in the grandeur and beauty of the creation—so favorably adapted to elevate, to inspire with admiration, and to fill with the purest pleasure, the devout and contemplative mind? Why was not the whole creation so formed as only to excite amazement, terror, and despair? Is there not a display of infinite goodness in the beautiful scenery of our globe—so agreeably diversified with continents and seas, islands and lakes, mountains and plains, hills and valleys, adapted to various beneficial purposes, and abounding with productions, in endless variety, for the convenience, the support, and the happiness of its diversified inhabitants? Why was not the whole earth like the burning sands of Lybia, or the rugged and frozen mountains of Zembla? Why was it not one wild, dreary waste, producing only briers and thorns, and poisonous and bitter fruits?

Is there not a display of infinite goodness in the vicissitudes of the season; each bearing upon his bosom its peculiar delights; the spring arrayed in the most beautiful verdure, decorated with flowers; the summer abounding with delightful prospects, and beaming with luxuriance; autumn loaded with golden harvests, and the richest variety of fruits; and even winter, supplying in social enjoyments, and the noble pleasure of study and contemplation, what it lacks in external charms? Why was not the whole year, one continued scene of dull uniformity, or so irregular in its changes, as utterly to baffle all the calculations and arrangements and pursuits of life? Why was not every sight a spectacle of horror, every sound a shriek of distress, every sweet a most pungent bitter, every gale a blast of pestilence? Is it not because the Creator and Preserver of the world is a being of infinite goodness.

Is it not strange, that we do not constantly perceive the glory of God, which the heavens declare and gratefully recognize his goodness, so richly spread abroad through all his works? Happy, happy, were it for us, did nature constantly appear to us as it really is, animated and enlivened by the presence of its glorious author. When the sun rises or sets in the heavens, when spring adorns the earth, when summer shines in its glory, when winter returns in its awful forms, happy were it for us, did we constantly view the great Creator and Preserver of all, continually manifesting himself in his various works? Happy, did we meet his presence in the smiling fields, feel his influence in the cheering beams, hear his voice even in the whispering breeze, and taste his goodness in every gift of nature and providence. Happy, did we feel ourselves everywhere surrounded with the glory of that universal Spirit, who fills, pervades, and enlivens all; and did we live in the world, as in a great and august temple, where the presence of the Divinity who inhabits it, fills the mind with awe, and inspires the heart with devotion.—Dr. Worcester.

TIME AND ETERNITY.—Is it not strange, that the only things we do not prepare for, while those things, which, besides that they are of inferior importance, only may occur, it is our aim and endeavor to be fully prepared for. We are so engaged, so absorbed in preparing for an uncertain life, that we omit to prepare for a certain death.

Heaven sees no spectacle on earth so melancholy, as the sportiveness of souls on the brink of an unblest eternity.

If men make so much and so rapid progress in evil here, where there exists so many restraints and hindrances to evil, and so many means of good, what must be the progress of the impenitent hereafter; how swift, how awful! In hell there will be no restraint from evil, and no means of good; no Sabbath; no Bible, no good Spirit, no Savior. He will be in the midst of such company, and surrounded by such examples, and uninvited to any effort at restraint, much less reformation, by any ray of hope that would in the least avail.

Tell what is behind you, and I will tell you what is before you.

If, in time, men become so vile as to be the incarnation of evil, what must they not be in eternity?—Nevins.

AN APPROPRIATE ANSWER.—A Methodist minister, who had some dozen or more of persons to baptize, was asking them, "how they would be baptized?" when one of the number, with great simplicity, replied, that "she did not wish to be baptized at all, she wanted to be SPRINKLED!" Fact. —Pioneer.

OFFICE OF ANGELS.—Heaven [illegible] less than earth, its active duties; [illegible] edness of heaven is an useful and [illegible] ic blessedness; and they who are sometimes painted as feasting in the kingdom [illegible] joying the presence of their Maker, [illegible] at others, described as engaged in battle with the great dragon and its adherents, as stopping, in the cause of saints, the mouths of lions, and subduing the violence of fire, as keeping guard around the prophets of the Lord, and as temptation, and in the hour of his mortal agony, consoling witnesses of His kingdom upon earth; as calling the Gentile Cornelius to the first fruits of Christian adoption; as smiting with an invisible sword the arrogant and persecuting Herod, and breaking down before the apostle Peter the chains and gates of his captivity.—Bishop Heber.

"I WANT A BIBLE."—A real weather beaten tar, walking on the wharf at B——, met a friend of the Bethel cause, and said with much earnestness of manner, "I want a Bible. Do you think I could get one at the Bethel Library Room?" "Well, I don't know," the friend replied, "there are other good books, but I believe, just at this time, the Bibles are all gone. Come in with me and see." He came in and said to me, "Sir, I have come to see if I could get a Bible?" "I am very sorry," I replied, "that there is not a single Bible on the shelves. We are just out, but shall have another supply soon. There are other good books in great variety. Come and look at them." He shook his head, and said, "I want a Bible. You perceive I am an old countryman. My father was a preacher. The last thing he did when I came away, was to take down the Bible and read to me, very feelingly, the parable of the Prodigal Son. I have often forgotten his admonitions. But now I have just escaped with my life. The vessel on board of which I sailed, capsized, and three of the men were drowned. I clung to the wreck forty-eight hours, and was taken off almost at the point of complete exhaustion. While hanging there, I thought of my father's last instructions, the parable came up fresh to my mind, I wanted to read it from the Bible." The friend who met him on the wharf, flew out to obtain one for him, that he might have this life boat for the poor sailor. I prayed with him. While on his knees, he said distinctly, and with a feeling heart, "Father, I have sinned."

Minister's Department.

From the Spirit and Manners of the Age.

THE AFFECTIONATE PASTOR.

Next in importance to the truth and kindness of the doctrine, is the spirit in which that doctrine is delivered. We have good reason to believe that the preachers of the Divine word often defeat their own aim by a repulsive harshness of temper which betrays itself in their mode of speaking. Every one who is acquainted with human nature, and is conversant with the New Testament, must own, that a kind, conciliatory, and pathetic style of address, is both adapted to command attention and impress the mind, and best accords with the spirit of the gospel. Timothy was exhorted in meekness to instruct even such as opposed themselves, with the hope that God might give them repentance to the acknowledgement of the truth. I am aware that a want of zeal, or a sickening sensibility and mincing delicacy, is equally inconsistent with the grand objects and ends of the Christian ministry. But surely a man may be full of ardor, and faithful to his Master, and the souls of his fellowmen, without assuming an aspect and a tone of indignant austerity. There may be energy blended with suavity, zeal mixed with love. The arrows of truth, and the sword of the Spirit, receive no additional keenness or force from having been dipped in acrimony.

As some preachers employ a soft, soothing style, replete with epithets of tenderness more suited to the nursery than the pulpit; so others, despising this low, contemptible, whining cant, verge to the opposite extreme, and conceive they have reached an elevation of manly dignity and strength, when their boisterous language and manner remind us of the orator on the hustings, rather than the minister of the sanctuary. It has not escaped the shrewd observation of some venerable men, that our young divines are beginning to transfer the theatrical or senatorial gestures and tones, which have so often fascinated on the platform, to the pulpit. I fear the change is no improvement. A challenging, confident air, and a fierce positive manner, are not likely to instruct, convince, melt or console the hearers of the gospel. Our Lord named James and John Boanerges, sons of thunder; but it is evident from their character, that benevolence and love pervaded and regulated all their energy. It was not the thunder of Sinai, but of Zion, which they wielded with such happy effect. "The zeal of some men," says Mr. Cecil, "is of a haughty, contending, ferocious character. They have the letter of the truth, but they mount the pulpit like prize fighters. This spirit is a reproach to the gospel. But there is an opposite extreme. The love of some men is all milk and mildness! There is so much delicacy and so much fastidiousness! They touch with so much tenderness! and if the patient shrinks, they touch no more!

While the servants of Immanuel guard against this timorous, time-serving spirit, let them not act as if they were to be af- [illegible] by vehemence and force. Whether [illegible] is addressed to the understanding, [illegible] to the conscience, a mixture of affection will generally be found necessary to render the word profitable.— [illegible] the heroic Luther, and the indefatigable Whitefield, knew how to blend pathos with the sterner power of eloquence.

The latter of these eminent preachers rarely delivered the message of the gospel without melting into tears.

I have read an opinion delivered by some philosophers, that in the composition of man there are nine parts of affection, and one part of reason. Supposing this to be an exaggerated statement, yet all who think closely, must allow, that the ingredients of feeling outweigh and far exceed, in operative influence, the power of intellect. If this fact be admitted, the inference deducible from it, bears upon the subject now in hand. The preacher who depends chiefly on reasoning or remonstrance, without kind persuasions or touching appeals, is leaving the most vulnerable points of the citadel for one which is doubly fortified.

Let those who fill the sacred office imbibe the Spirit of their Master, and imitate the apostle Paul: the way in which he preached Christ, and followed him, may be gathered from those epistles which he addressed to the churches. To the Galatians he said, "My little children, of whom I travail in birth again, until Christ be formed in you, I desire to be present with you now, and to change my voice, for I stand in doubt of you." To the Thessalonians he said: "We were gentle among you, even as a nurse cherisheth her children; so being affectionately desirous of you, we were willing to have imparted unto you, not the Gospel of God only, but also our own souls, because ye are dear to us."

From the Boston Recorder.

BOTH RIGHTEOUS.

"And they were both righteous before God, walking in all the ordinances of the Lord blameless." This may be regarded as an ascription on the tomb of the pious Zechariah and Elizabeth.

1. It told the truth—epitaphs do not always do this. But God can not be deceived concerning character, and can not lie when he speaks of it; and wrote this inscription.

2. It is a noble epitaph. It places a crown of honor on the heads of the righteous pair. The highest nobility in the universe derive all their glory from their righteousness. A more honorable thing could not have been said of this humble couple, than is said in the statement that they were "both righteous."

3. It is an enduring epitaph. Brass corrodes, marble crumbles. Inscriptions on either are gradually effaced. But eighteen hundred years have gone, and left this ascription as fresh as ever. It can not be effaced. It is on the imperishable records of the divine government. God wrote it. It stands. We shall depart, and our monuments crumble after us into dust. But this will be read as if drawn in living characters, throughout all generations. The last being that lives in this world will read this epitaph, radiant still with the same brightness as when first recorded by the divine pen.

4. And it is an epitaph for all the world's perusal. It is not confined to a single church-yard, to be read by the curious of a single community. Nations have read it, and all the nations will yet do it. As kingdom after kingdom receives the word of God, they will find this bright gem upon its pages. No epitaph of human origin has had or will have so many readers.

All epitaphs are not instructive, but here are most deeply interesting suggestions.

1. This must have been a happy couple. They both drank at the same fountain of living waters. They were not divided in respect to the sources of their enjoyments, each thus furnishing a drawback on the other's happiness. They went up into Mount Zion together. They accompanied each other into the secret places of the Almighty, and shared together the fatness of the Lord's house, and "the rivers of his pleasure."

2. They must have exerted an undivided moral power upon their household. As they were both righteous, they acted unitedly in favoring righteousness, and frowning upon iniquity. The erring child or domestic could not fly from the just rebuke of the one, to the indifferent and justifying spirit of the other. The sun was not half eclipsed, as if one only had been righteous. It poured its full radiance in approof or reproof. Their moral influence flowed forth like the river, uniting different streams, and then accumulating its own power.

3. The truth of this epitaph is the assurance that this couple are united now in the nobler relations of heaven. That they walked in all the commandments of the Lord blameless, is the best possible evidence that they are now serving God both day and night in the eternal temple. This course of life gave them moral fitness for heaven. Death could not disunite such a couple. In their minds were the elements of an everlasting union. One might have gone before the other, yet both possessing assimilation of moral character to the holy beings above, both must reach the same home whenever the silver cord of life was loosed. That husband and wife are in heaven!

Reader, it may be soon, perhaps sooner than you are aware, that your epitaph will be written. What shall it be?

Foreordination and Foreknowledge.

The former of these terms signifies, previous appointment; predetermination; predestination. The latter, a knowledge of a thing before it happens; prescience. Confounding these terms has led to fatalism, and induced the belief with many, that from all eternity the destinies of all men are determined by God; and that it is not in the power of men to do any thing which may alter their condition beyond the confines of the tomb.

That there is a perceptible difference in the terms, is easy to be seen by all. That there is not necessarily a dependence of one upon the other, we think is alike easily shown; i. e., that the foreknowledge of God does not necessarily imply that the things known are foreordained. Did we admit this conclusion, we should admit that men were machines, incapable of acting only as acted upon, and that they could no more be accountable to God for their conduct, than an engine for its motion when propelled by steam.

That all things present, past, and to come, are fully known by God, can not reasonably be doubted. But to say that all things are ordered from eternity, is, in effect, to deny the system of salvation which offers peace and pardon to all men. The system of salvation instituted by the Lord Jesus Christ, proposes to save men on certain conditions, and by the use of certain means. Thus, "he that believeth and is baptized, shall be saved." Here, a faith that produces acts of obedience, is the condition of salvation. Connected with this is the repeated exhortation of Christ to men, to choose the way of life. If God had, from all eternity, decided the destinies of men, then these terms of salvation could not, consistently, be offered. We freely admit that God does know what will be the final condition of all men, but we as freely affirm that this knowledge of God does in no way affect the choice of the creature on which his destiny is determined.

God knows what course of conduct every person will take, and the inevitable consequences of that course. He likewise knows that he might take a different course just as freely as the one he will take, since he has set before him the way of life, and the way of death, and made him the chooser of his own destiny. Therefore, we conclude that foreordination and foreknowledge are distinct attributes of the Jehovah, and that the exercise of the latter is not consequent upon the existence of the former. God foreknows the conduct of all men, and their compliance or non-compliance with the terms of salvation which he has made in the Gospel, decides their destiny and fixes the decree of God relative to them.

The purity of God's kingdom is most strikingly exhibited by this view of the subject. The rational exercise of the intellectual faculties of men, convinces them of the propriety of obedience to God, and shows most clearly that God is worthy of such obedience, and that the happiness of the creature is identified with the same. Therefore, men are induced to yield themselves willing sacrifices to God, and are made to delight themselves in the law of the Lord. This is a state of feeling that forced obediencce can never excite. If men are constrained to come into the service of Christ, the same kind of effort must be continued to keep them in such service. And if men love and serve God from constraint, there must be feelings in them differing widely from those who are enamored with God and the excellencies of his government, and love and serve him because he is worthy of such love and service.

Riches.

He, only, can properly be termed rich, who has a title to an inheritance in heaven. He is then possessed of a treasure that is as enduring as his deathless spirit. And he knows that when earth's treasures have ceased to benefit, he will not be left destitute. Through all eternity his treasure will be increasing, and to it there can never be an end. If we would compare it with any thing, we search in vain for a fit resemblance. All that we can know, is, that it is spiritual and eternal, and fitted for the capacities of an eternal being. He who shall possess it can neither be satisfied with less, or enjoy more. The christian inheritance in this life is better than any other, since it yields, according to the language of the Savior, an hundred fold more than any thing else. In the time of persecution, of sickness, or adversity of any kind, this will yield him an inexhaustible source of consolation. He who is possessed of a heavenly inheritance is infinitely happier under any circumstances than is the man who possesses all things else, and is destitute of this.

Few, comparatively, can be rich in earthly goods, but every soul may be rich in faith, and heirs of the kingdom. This is secured by yielding the heart to Christ, and the life to his service—a sacrifice which is every way calculated to enrich him who makes it.

THE TRINITY.—NO II.

ADDITIONAL PROOF OF THE DOCTRINE.

Some of those passages in the Old Testament which intimate the Doctrine of the Trinity, and the full proof of it which is contained in the Baptism Commission and Apostolic Benediction, received our attention last week.

The next branch of the argument, is—

THE DEITY of JESUS CHRIST.

By the Deity of Christ is meant, that in his divine nature he is the self-existent and Eternal GOD. This sentiment is fully implied in the command to baptize into the name of the Son, and also by the Benediction in the name of the LORD JESUS CHRIST.

Incontrovertible evidence of Christ's Deity is also found in CHRIST'S OWN ASSERTIONS CONCERNING HIMSELF.

I. Christ's Assertion of his Unity with the Father.

St. John x. 30.—I and my Father are one.

That oneness in spirit, in interest, and in design, is here implied, none can doubt, for the 17th chapter of St. John clearly evinces this; but likewise, that something more, even oneness of Being, is taught, is made equally evident by St. John xiii. 7—9:—If ye had known me, ye should have known my Father also: and from henceforth ye know him, and have seen him. Philip saith unto him, Lord, shew us the Father and it sufficeth us. Jesus saith unto him, have I been so long time with you, and yet hast thou not known me, Philip? He that hath seen me, hath seen the Father; and how sayest thou then, shew us the Father?

When Christ asserted his oneness with the Father, the Jews took up stones to stone him for blasphemy, because, he being a man, made himself GOD.

That by what he then said to them he did not mean to relinquish the high claim which they had understood him to assert, is evident from these concluding words of this interview of Christ with the Jews:—"That ye may know and believe that the Father is in me, and I in him."

That they understood him to re-assert his claim to supreme Divinity, is clear from this record,—'Therefore they sought again to take him."

II. Christ asserted Himself to be the "I Am."

St. John viii. 58.—Before Abraham was, I am.

Read this assertion in connection with the context;—"Your father Abraham rejoiced to see my day; and he saw it, and was glad. Then said the Jews unto him, thou art not yet fifty years old, and hast thou seen Abraham? Jesus said unto them, Verily, verily, I say unto you, Before Abraham was, I Am. Then took they up stones to cast at him: but Jesus hid himself, and went out of the temple, going through the midst of them, and so passed by."

"I Am": As if he had said,—'Do you marvel that I have seen Abraham? Behold! I am the self-existent GOD who created Abraham; the same "I AM" who sent Moses unto your fathers, and who commanded Moses to say unto the people, "I AM hath sent me unto you."' The Jews perfectly understood this claim; hence, they instantly grasped stones to cast at him whom they deemed the bold blasphemer. He said not one word to remove the impression which they had received concerning his high claim; but he did something to confirm it, viz:—"going through the midst of them, and so passed by."

III. Christ Asserted his own Omnipresence.

Matt. xviii. 20.—For where two or three are gathered together in my name, there am I in the midst of them.

Not, there will I be, or, will I come, but, "there am I." He thus asserts his own Omnipresence one of the attributes of the Deity: for though there should be even so many such assemblies in the same hour, interspersed over this wide world, each assembly might plead the promise—"THERE AM I."

IV. The Deity of Jesus Christ is proved by his own Assertion of his Inferiority to the Father.

St. John xiv. 28.—For my Father is greater than I.

This assertion implies conclusive evidence of Christ's supreme Divinity. In his station as one sent from the Father, and who was to return to him, he was inferior to the Father; but where is the pertinency of his proclamation of this truth, unless in some sense he was truly God? Suppose that in his highest nature he was nothing but a creature, why should he say, "My Father is greater than I"?

Let any mere man proclaim in the midst of a public assembly, 'God is greater than I'—and the instantaneous response of every mind would be, "Who did not know that"! If the brightest angel in heaven should wing his way to earth, and proclaim, "God is greater than I"—our feeling would be, 'Angel, we know it; thy words are useless, and indicate something of vanity in thy own mind: for how couldst thou suspect that we should not know that thy CREATOR is greater than thou art!'

If the being who should make this announcement to us, were exalted ten thousand times as far above what the brightest angel ever will be, as that angel would then be above the lowest of the intelligent creation—his announcement would merit from us the same reply.

Whoever the proclaimer might be, however exalted, if he were a mere creature, his words, "God is greater than I," would be useless breath, and would savor of arrogance. By these illustrations I mean to say, that the pertinency, and even the propriety of Christ's assertion, "For my Father is greater than I," cannot be made manifest only by the aid of the truth, that he possessed supreme Divinity. In one word, —It was his EQUALITY with the Father, which laid the foundation for him to speak of his INFERIORITY to the Father.

FOREIGN NEWS.

From the New Yorker.

FIFTEEN DAYS LATER FROM EUROPE.

ARRIVAL OF THE BRITANNIA.

The steamship Britannia, Capt. R. B. Cleland, arrived at Boston at half past 7 o'clock on Saturday morning, in 13 1-2 days from Liverpool, whence she sailed on the 19th ult. She arrived out on the 9th, in 11 days from Halifax, where, it will be remembered, she was detained several days by injuries caused by running upon rocks in entering the harbor. Great anxiety had begun to be felt for her in England before her arrival. The Caledonia, Capt. McKellar, arrived at Liverpool at 2 o'clock on the 14th, or in just 13 days from Boston.

Nothing further had been heard from the President, and the last hope of her safety is now abandoned. It appears that the vessel seen near the Azores by the Portuguese ship Conde de Palma, was the French steamer Tounere, on her return from Rio and Brazil. She reached Gibraltar on the 2d in 94 days from Rio and 83 from Bahia.

The news by this arrival is very meagre, except in two important items. The Whig Ministry has been beaten on a direct vote of No Confidence, and must now dissolve Parliament or resign. They choose the former, acting under the advice or entreaties of the Queen. The other important item is in the improvement in the Cotton Market, which is decided and seems likely to be sustained.

The great debate in the House of Commons on Sir Robert Peel's motion, that the present Ministry do not sufficiently possess the confidence of Parliament to enable them to carry into effect measures deemed by them important to the public welfare, was brought to a close at half past three o'clock on the morning of the 5th ult. The House then divided with the following result:

For Sir Robert Peel's motion,	312
Against it, (Whig and Radical,)	311
Majority against the Ministers,	1

This is the fullest vote within our recollection. A full House consists of 645 Members, of whom 50 to 100 are generally absent from the country—'paired off.'—Here were all but 22 Members voting, and the Speaker probably not voting, though present. The closeness of the vote on so vitally important a question is also remarkable.

When the vote had been stated and the cheers had subsided, Lord John Russell announced that the Ministers would take till Monday, (this was Saturday,) to determine what they should do. On Monday, accordingly, he stated that the Ministry had resolved to advise a dissolution of Parliament, at as early a day as the business of the session would allow, whereupon, Sir Robert Peel gave notice that he would not oppose the usual supply bills. The Ministers have since been beaten 18 votes on their Criminal Law bill.

The Dissolution was expected to take place on the 23rd ult., or soon after. The Queen would not attend in person, but by commission, being in a delicate state of health. She is expected to present another heir to the throne about the 1st of October.

All eyes are now turned to the approaching Elections, which are certain to be more furiously, universally contested than for many years before. Money in millions will be squandered in every form of bribery and corruption—nay, is already beginning to be poured out like water. Both parties are confident of success, but the Tories most so. Lord John Russell stands as a Whig candidate for the City of London, and a mighty struggle will there be made. Lord John is to be married, (for the third time,) to Lady Fanny Elliot about the last of this month.

An election to fill a vacancy in Parliament was going on at Northampton; Sir John Cam Hobhouse being the Whig and a Mr. Larpent the Tory candidate. Party feelings ran high, and terrible riots were the consequence; flags were torn down, and individuals injured, until it became necessary to call in the Military. Several persons had been stabbed, and many houses seriously injured.

There is nothing new from China.—Heavy reinforcements are going out to the British army in India.

France.—Marshal Soult recently resigned on account of the defeat of an obnoxious bill for recruiting the army, but was induced to reconsider his decision.

The French have experienced additional checks in Algiers, and Abd-el-Kader is in great force there. The abandonment of that Country is again talked of.

Spain.—Affairs seem to be getting worse in Spain. The Treasury is empty, and the Ministry can find nobody to lend them The young Queen's health is critical.—There has been a serious riot or commotion at Barcelona.

Portugal is also in commotion. The Ministry have been outvoted and resigned, but hold on until others are found to take their places.

Turkey.—The revolt in Bulgaria and other European Provinces appears to have been premature, and to be now completely crushed. The Turks have behaved with their accustomed barbarity. Candia or Crete is still in a state of insurrection, but Tahir Pacha landed there on the 16th of May, and expected soon to crush all opposition. The Consuls advised the Greeks to surrender; they took time to consider, but continued their preparations for resistance. Great exasperation exists, and a proclamation for a general arming of the Christians has been issued.

The French have 98 ships of war carrying 2804 guns in the Mediterranean.

The Druses of Lebanon refuse obedience to the commands of the Sultan.

It is stated in a letter from Carlsrhue, that the small town of Parsberg has been entirely burnt down; 224 houses were consumed.

The Precurseur of Antwerp says, on the authority of letters from Holland, that a marriage between the Prince de Joinville, and the Princess Sophia, daughter of the King of Holland, may be considered as agreed upon.

Congressional News.

From the New-Yorker.

WASHINGTON CORRESPONDENCE.

Washington June 30, 1841.

In the Senate, Mr. Tallmadge presented a petition signed by about 15,000 voters of New York City, for a National Bank.

The resolution of Mr. Buchanan relative to removals from office, was taken up for the morning hour, and some conversation arose as to the necessity of keeping it before the Senate any longer, as all were willing that the desired information should be given. The request, however, of Mr. Pierce was complied with, and he enjoyed the "poor privilege" of addressing the Senate, for the morning hour, on this subject.

The Bank bill was again taken up, and discussed relative to amendments at some length.

Mr. Henderson offered an amendment providing that aliens resident in the United States, and also corporations of the United States and Territories, be permitted to become stockholders. This was opposed by Messrs. Benton and Calhoun, and advocated by Messrs. Henderson, Preston and Mangum.

At the suggestion of Mr. Mangum, the amendment was modified to exclude resident aliens. This modification was supported by Messrs. Clay, of Ala., Walker, Allen and Woodbury, and opposed by Messrs. Clay of Ky., Smith of Ind., Huntington, Morehead and Berrien. The modification was then rejected: Yeas 23, Nays 25. After which the original amendment was passed: Yeas 33; Nays 16.

Other slight amendments were adopted.

In the House, the Distribution and Preemption was taken up and argued during the day, the question pending being on the motion of Mr. Clifford to strike out the enacting clause.

The bill was opposed by Messrs. Clifford, Merriwether, Floyd, Kennedy of Ind., Payne and Alford, and advocated by Mr. Howard of Mich. Messrs. Alford and Merriwether opposed it, not from the principles of the bill, but from the circumstances under which it was brought forward, the Treasury being oppressed with debt, which it was necessary and honest to liquidate before a distribution took place.

A message was received in the House to-day from the President, which was not read, but is understood to contain a recommendation for a General Bankrupt Law.

The President has signed the bill for the relief of Mrs. Harrison, and returned it to Congress.

Washingtou, July 1, 1841.

In the Senate, to-day, various petitions were received, most of them for a Bankrupt Law.

The morning hour was occupied by Mr. Pierce, in farther debate on the resolution of Mr. Buchanan, relative to removals from office. He commented with much vehemency on the unjustifiable (as he deemed them,) removals from office, made by the present Administration.

The Fiscal Bank Bill was again taken up, the question being on the amendment of which Mr. Rives gave notice yesterday, providing that branches should be located in the States only by their consent.

Mr. Rives supported it in a most eloquent and able speech, contending that the sovereignty of the States should be preserved inviolate from any aggressions of the General Government, and that no branches should be located in the States without their express consent.

Mr. Clay opposed the amendment, and strongly urged the original form of the bill, and that the Bank should not be dependent for its beneficial results, on the mere caprice of the States.

Mr. Rives replied, strongly opposing the original form of the bill, and declaring that he could not from principle, support the bill in that form, and calling on his friends who preferred it, but who still without compromise of principle might agree to the amendment, to yield to the strong convictions of those opposed to it, and that on the high and broad principles of national patriotism, they should unite in forming this agent, which was demanded by the people of the Country.

Mr. Preston, in a brilliant speech, declared himself in favor of the amendment of the Senator from Virginia and in a liberal spirit of concession, called on the Whigs to unite on the details of this plan, which had been so plainly called for by the people.

Mr. Merrick took the floor, and the Senate adjourned.

In the House, the Speaker laid before them the Message of the President received yesterday, containing a petition of numerous citizens of New-York, for a Bankrupt Law, and requesting them to give a respectful hearing to the prayer of the petitioners. It also communicated returns of the late Census, in compliance with the resolution of the House some days since.

Further papers in the contested election case of Mr. Banks were laid before the House.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the State of the Union, and resumed the consideration of the Distribution and Pre-emption Bill.

Mr. Charles Brown of Pa. at length opposed the bill.

Mr. Gilmer went against the bill under the circumstances of embarrassment and debt of the Treasury, but expressed himself a friend of the Distribution of the Surplus Proceeds of the Public Lands.

Mr. Bidlack opposed the bill on the same grounds.

On the motion of Mr. Cost Johnson, a resolution was adopted instructing the Committee on the Public Lands, to inquire into the expediency of reporting a bill, appropriating Public Lands, to satisfy unsatisfied military land warrants of officers of the Virginia line, and of the Revolutionary and the last War.

Mr. Rives' speech of to-day is considered as one of his most successful efforts.

Washington, July 2, 1841.

In the Senate, after further discussion by Messrs. Pierce and Linn, the resolution of Mr. Buchanan relative to removals from office was laid over.

The special order of the day, the bill to incorporate a Fiscal Agent, then came up, and

Mr. Choate, of Mass., in a brief and forcible speech, supported the amendment offered by Mr. Rives. His chief reason for this was, that the bill, as originally reported, could not pass, and the interests of the country absolutely demanded a Bank of some kind.

After a few remarks from Mr. Clay, and a brief rejoinder by Mr. Choate, Mr. Simmons of R. I spoke in favor of the bill, and Mr. Archer at length against the amendmendment of Mr. Rives. Mr. R. rejoined, and Mr. Merrick of Md. took the floor, when the Senate adjourned to 3 o'clock.

In the House, Mr. Pickens of S. C. made a long speech in reply to Mr. W. Cost Johnson, on the Land Distribution and Preemption Bill.

Mr. Winthrop of Mass. spoke for three quarters of an hour in favor of the bill, and Mr. Cooper of Pa. replied with great force to the speech of his colleague, Mr. C. Brown, vindicating the Executive's appointments in Pennsylvania, and defending the character of individuals whom Mr. B. had attacked. He went on to support the bill, and when he had closed, Mr. Dean of Ohio, and Mr. Habersham of Ga. both spoke against it—the latter to the hour of adjournment.

Washington, July 3, 1841.

In the Senate, to-day, Mr. Linn offered a resolution, relative to the bullion trade of the West with Mexico. He spoke at some length, and did not conclude, and the resolution was laid over, and with that of Mr. Buchanan, relative to removals from office, will serve to occupy for some time the morning hour.

Mr. Bayard offered a resolution, which was adopted, appointing a select committee of five members, to take into consideration the vote of the Senate, relative to the admission of reporters to the floor of the Chamber. Brief remarks were made by Messrs. Bayard and Walker, which latter gentleman referred to the misrepresentations of the proceedings of the Senate, by letter writers, and stated his belief that correct reports would never be furnished until a corps of reporters were employed by government.

Mr. Clay referred to a report which had been placed in his hands, given in a Washington paper which he scarcely ever read, misrepresenting him and the Senator from Massachusetts, (Mr. Choate,) in the conversation between them yesterday, and stating the facts of the case, by way of correction. He regretted any excitement that had taken place in the debate, and expressed his pleasure that the disagreement of the two Senators from Virginia, (Messrs. Rives and Archer,) had been settled.

Messrs. Archer and Rives severally made explanations expressing their regret at whad occurred, and their desire that it should not again happen.

The Bank Bill was then taken up, and Mr. Bayard spoke at some length, coinciding substantially with the amendment of Mr. Rives now pending, and offering a slight verbal amendment.

Mr. Huntington opposed the amendment.

The Senate then went into Executive Session, after which it adjourned till Tuesday.

It is understood that the following appointments were confirmed;

General Winfield Scott, to be General-in-Chief of the United States Army.

Judge Huntington, of Indiana, Commissioner of the General Land Office, vice J. Whitcomb, removed.

P. R. Fendall, U. S. District Attorney for this district, vice F. S. Key.

These are all good appointments.

The House were engaged in the consideration of the Distribution and Pre-emption bill during the day. Messrs. Habersham, McKeon, and Davis, of N. Y., opposed the bill; and Mr. Underwood advocated it.

The House adjourned to Monday.

Washington, July 5, 1841.

The Senate has not been in session today.

The House met, and a vote was taken on going into the Committee of the Whole, which prevailed by a small majority. The Distribution and Pre-emption bill was accordingly taken up, and Mr Wise spoke for three hours and a quarter in opposition to the bill, as laying the foundation for a protective tariff, as distributing revenue where there is now a deficiency, and as inexpedient in every point of view.

Mr. Rayner took the floor and the House adjourned at half past 1 o'clock.

Although the House have manifested much of a working spirit, in refusing to adjourn over, on account of the anniversary of this nation's independence, there has been scarcely a quorum in attendance for the whole day.

The day has been celebrated in a very happy and appropriate manner by a celebration of the Sabbath Schools of this city. The scholars of the schools of the Protestant Churches were united in procession at the City Hall, and marched to the Capitol Grounds, where seats and entertainment were provided.

They numbered about two thousand. Addresses were delivered by Rev. Mr. Smith of this city, Rev. Mr. Bingham of the Sandwich Islands, Senator Southard and others.

The Military Companies of this city have paraded to-day, and the day has been celebrated as usual by cannon, fire-works, &c., and passed off in an orderly manner.

The Company of the United States Flying Artillery, Capt. Ringgold, from Fort McHenry, who have been in the city for some days, have made a display in front of the President's House this evening.

Washington, July 6, 1841.

The resolution of Mr. Linn to change the hour of meeting of the Senate from 10 to 11 o'clock, was taken up, and after considerable debate by various Senators, rejected.

The special order of the day, the Fiscal Bank bill, was then taken up, the amendment of Mr. Bayard to the amendment of Mr. Rives pending.

Mr. Berrien addressed the Senate in a constitutional argument of some length, opposing both the amendments and advocating the original bill.

Mr. Merrick supported the amendment of Mr. Rives. He surrendered no power of Congress under the Constitution, but went for the amendment on the ground of expediency, for the purpose of establishing in the most speedy manner, the special agent, so strongly demanded by the people.

Mr. Bates, in a highly powerful and eloquent speech, declared his preference for the original bill, and the absence of all doubt in his mind as to the power of Congress to establish a Bank of the United States, within or without the District of Columbia, and branches in the States, with or without their consent. This had been decided by the expositor which had been provided for itself, the Supreme Court of the United States, and that decision should be considered as engrafted on that Constitution, to be obeyed under their oath for its support. There were some of the friends of a Bank who had constitutional scruples, and these were not to be disregarded. He had gone to them because they could not come to him; and for the purpose of establishing a Bank, which he considered of the highest importance, by the unanimous vote of its friends, he should vote for the amendment.

Mr. Prentiss very briefly and lucidly advanced similar views in support of the amendment.

Mr. Dixon opposed the amendment, and maintained that they, as legislators, should follow strictly their own judgment without compromise.

The amendment of Mr. Bayard, which placed the establishment of the branches upon dissent, instead of assent of the States, was rejected—Yeas 9; Nays 36.

The question recurring on the amendment of Mr. Rives, which, it will be recollected, placed the establishment of the branches in the States on the consent of those States,

Mr. White opposed and Mr. Walker advocated it. The question was then taken, and the amendment was rejected. Yeas 10; Nays 38.

Mr. Huntington offered a slight amendment which was adopted. The amendments of the friends of the bill were now considered as offered, and Mr. Buchanan took the floor and, on his motion, the Senate adjourned.

He will lead off the opposition to-morrow in a set speech.

The House were to-day occupied for about three hours, in calling the Yeas and Nays, and contending on the adoption of a rule, reported by Mr. Calhoun, Chairman of the Select Committee, on that subject, which provides that hereafter the Committee of the Whole can be discharged by a vote of the majority, from the consideration of any subject that has been before them six days. This was debated at great length and finally adopted.

Mr. Stanly then offered a resolution that the Distribution Bill, now under discussion, be taken out of Committee at 7 o'clock this evening, which, after some debate, was adopted.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, and the Distribution and Pre-emption Bill was again taken up, and advocated at length by Messrs. Rayner and Marshall, and opposed by Mr. Rhett. The hour of seven having arrived, the Committee proceeded to vote on the various amendments offered, most of which were rejected. The bill was passed in Committee by a vote of 117 to 103.

The bill was then reported to the House, and the previous question being moved by Mr. Stanly, was demanded by the House, when the vote was taken on various amendments; after which the bill was passed by a vote of Yeas 116; Nays 108.

The House adjourned at a quarter past eleven o'clock, having been in Session thirteen hours and a quarter. ARGUS.

News of the Day.

Convictions.—Chas. Lancaster, late postmaster at Carrolton, Illinois, was recently tried at Springfield, and convicted of purloining money from letters. He was sentenced to ten years imprisonment in the penitentiary.

James McCabe, charged with having robbed the mail between Springfield and Shelbyville, plead guilty, and was sentenced to ten years imprisonment at hard labor in the penitentiary.

M. W. Andrews, of Paris, who was apprehended on suspicion of having robbed the mail, was released—no indictment having been found against him—the proofs not being sufficient to support the charge.

Cheap Traveling.—The fare from this place to Boston by Steamboat J. W. Richmond is $3—from Boston to New-York by steamboat & railroad, $2—New-York to Albany up the Hudson river, $1—and in some boats only 50 cents—from Albany to Saratoga Springs $1.00 The fare is, therefore, only about seven dollars from the Kennebec to Saratoga! This is cheap enough. Who would have predicted this a few years ago, when it required a five dollar bill to go to Boston? We shall soon be able to go to St. Louis for ten dollars, and take a trip to the Moon, by way of excursion, for ten more.—Hallowell Cultivator.

S. F. Hol-brook is the President, and C. Water-man the Recording Secretary of the Washington Total Abstinence Society of Boston.

The latest Swindler.—A countryman was done out of thirty dollars recently at New Orleans, by an ingenious rogue who pretended to have dropped his pocket-book, which the countryman found. The loser insisted upon paying a reward of twenty dollars to the fortunate finder, which he did with a fifty dollar bill, receiving thirty dollars of good money in change. The countryman, in addition to the loss of thirty dollars, was afterwards arrested for attempting to pass counterfeit money.

The weather could not be more favorable for the ripening of wheat, and better ordered so as to prevent its affected by rust, than it now is. We have had abundance of rain, the air is clear and cool, the sun shines brightly from morning till night, and most of our exchange papers in western New-York say that there will be full an average crop.—*Buffalo Com. The store of E. Clark & Co. at Oxford, Chenango co. was entered on Sunday the 27th ult. and robbed of money to the amount of $1100. A man employed about the store, named John Figary, is supposed to be the robber. He was pursued to Little Falls, where they found he had been arrested on suspicion of having robbed a fellow-passenger.—There was found on his person $910 of the stolen money.

Mr. O. Richmond was drowned on Sunday the 27th ult. in attempting to swim his horse across the outlet of a pond near his residence, at New Berlin, Chenango co.

A young female named—Glazier, living near Jones' Bridge, between Geneseo and Moscow Livingston co. put an end to her existence on the 30th ult. by taking arsenic.

William Randall, an industrious and steady apprentice aged about 17 years, was drowned while bathing in the river at Schenectady, on Sunday evening the 27th ult.

The amount of Treasury Notes outstanding on the 3d inst. was $8,345,985.

Gen. Jackson has had a severe attack of cramp colic; but by the last accounts he was better and was considered out of danger.

The Supreme Court of this State is now in Session at Utica. Its decision in the case of Alexander McLeod, may be expected in a very few days.

The census of this State shows that 10,093,991 lbs. of maple sugar were made in New-York in the spring of 1840. This is over 4 lbs. to every man, woman and child in the State.

A little girl about eight years old, daughter of Mr. Lewis, of Waterford, Conn. recently, in attempting to get out of a window, was caught by its dropping upon her neck and was soon strangled.

Mr. Benjamin Clark, an intelligent and highly respectable citizen of Palmyra, Wayne co. put an end to his life by cutting his throat with a pocket-knife, on the 21st ult. His circumstances were in every respect comfortable, his character unblemished and no reason can be conjectured for this act of self-murder.

Young Semmes, the student in the Virginia University, implicated in the murder of Prof. Davis, has been admitted to bail in the sum of $25,000. He is likely to die.

Henry St. George Tucker, has been appointed Professor of Law in the University of Virginia.

We are informed that not a single gun, pistol, or even cracker, was fired in Philadelphia, last Monday! The law against them, is no more positive than here, but the habitual respect for it is greater, and the city authorities enforce it without respect of persons.

Temperance Protracted Meeting.—The city of Pittsburgh has been the scene of an extraordinary and cheering excitemnt on the subject of temperance, occasioned by the visit of the reformed drunkards of Baltimore. Successive meetings have been held for more than two weeks, and were, at the last accounts, still in progress. The Advocate says: "Up to this hour the enthusiasm beggars description. Our churches are in danger of being broken down by the immense crowds that throng them to hear the Missionaries from Baltimore or other reformed drunkards of our city simply relate the thraldom they were in, the means of their deliverance, and the felicitous effects that they have experienced in themselves and witnessed in their families since. The excitement of a Methodist camp-meeting in comparison with the temperance meetings now in progress in Pittsburgh and vicinity must hereafter be regarded as a tame affair."

A Thief Detector.—Mr. Parker, of Boston, has invented a curious apparatus for preventing thieves from opening doors. The machinery is attached to an air-chamber, (into which air is compressed with a pump,) by wires connected with the bolt, door, windows, or other opening to the store; any movement to the wires, sets in motion the machinery, and opens a whistle, which continues to blow till the machinery is run down. The noise produced may be heard at a great distance, and is similar to the steam-whistles attached to locomotives on our railroads.—Times.

Awful Effects of Intemperance.—A most horrible accident occurred last week in the county of Two Mountains, Lower Canada; a man, while in a state of intoxication, having fallen into a kettle of boiling potash, and been completely dissolved. Search was made for his body, but not the least particle of it could be found.—Boston Post.

Trouble at Harvard College.—The Boston papers contain accounts of some disgraceful disturbances in the University at Cambridge. What the origin was, we cannot learn. It seems, however, that one of the tutors, a Mr. Wheeler, had become greatly obnoxious to many of the students, who resolved to force him to leave his situation. After sundry exploits of a mischievous character, they held a meeting last Monday night, at which it was resolved to wait upon the Faculty and if they refused to comply, to refuse to perform their College duties. Just as they were forming a procession, the obnoxious tutor, with the tutor in Latin, appeared, and ordered them to disperse. A wild uproar succeeded—the officers were grossly insulted, and after amusing themselves for awhile, the students dispersed. Mr. Wheeler sent in his resignation to the Faculty, which was declined; several of the students were promptly expelled, and the rest have come to their senses, and now "roar as gently as sucking doves."

Common Schools in Vermont.—The Vermont Chronicle states that the number of children in that State between the ages of 1 and 13 is 106,000, and the number of district schools 3300. The number of teachers employed is 5100. The school tax for the year is $61,803 equal to $22 for each district; the sums raised voluntarily by the towns and districts amounted to $81,000. The aggregate expenses for schools including board for teachers, books, fuel, &c. are about $202,740 or $112 to each district.

New-York City.—The No. of buildings in the compact part of the city of New-York, is 31,116; of which there are used as breweries, distilleries, tanneries, and the like, 46; as dwelling houses exclusively, 16,458; as dwellings with shops, 6,614; as stores and offices exclusively, 3,855; as taverns and private boarding houses, 736; as baths 9; as factories with engines equal to 1100 horse power, 71; as large factories with labor-saving power, 172; as private stables, 2,603; as livery stables, 137; as dairy stables, 57; miscellaneous, 1,355.

The valuation of the real estate in the city, as corrected by the Board of Supervisors in 1840, is $187,222,714; and of personal estate, $65,013,801. Aggregate, $252,236,515.

From 1810 to 1841, the corporation has expended for opening, widening and improving streets, &c. $6,275. 317.

The total amount derived from the city by the State, from auction duties, from 1816 to 1840, inclusive, is $4,249,527.

Death on the House-top.—On Saturday evening, says the Newark Advertiser, Joseph Howey, of Woodbury, New Jersey, died on the top of his house to which he had gone for the purpose of fixing his stove pipe. While there he ruptured a blood vessel, and died in a few minutes.

A Struggle for Liberty.—The Norfolk Herald states that a slave belonging to Petersburg, eloped on Sunday, the 20th ult. from his owner, who, suspecting that he had been secreted on board of the schr. Three Sisters, Johnson, for Boston, which had sailed the day before, immediately took the steamer, Patrick Henry, in hope of overtaking the vessel. He succeeded in overhauling her, and search being made, the slave was found secreted, and taken back. What a state of contentment this indicates.

Mysterious.—The Albany Evening Journal says the citizens of the neighboring village of Bath have within a day or two been thrown into considerable excitement, from having heard cries, exhibiting great terror, proceed from the woods in the vicinity. A well dressed man, of great size, has recently been seen loitering about the hills. When last seen, he was nearly divested of clothing. Our informant says the cries were so loud as to be heard audibly for miles around. The citizens have turned out en masse in pursuit of the cause of this mystery.

The following message in writing was received from the President of the United States through John Tyler, Jr., his private Secretary:

WASHINGTON, July 1, 1841.

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

I have the honor herewith to submit to the House of Representatives the copy of a letter addressed by myself to Mrs. Harrison, in compliance with the resolutions of Congress, and her reply thereto.

JOHN TYLER.

WASHINGTON CITY, June 13, 1841.

My dear Madam; The accompanying resolutions, adopted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States, will convey to you an expression of the deep sympathy felt by the Representatives of the States, and of the People, in the sad bereavement which yourself and the country has sustained in the death of your illustrious husband. It may now be justly considered that the public archives constitute his enduring monument, on which are inscribed, in characters not to be effaced, the proudest evidences of public gratitude for services rendered, and of sorrow for his death. A great and united people shed their tears over the bier of a devoted patriot and distinguished public benefactor.

In conveying to you, my dear madam, the proposed respect of the two Houses of Congress, for your person and character, and their condolence on the late afflicting dispensation of Providence, permit me to mingle with theirs, and to render you my fervent wishes for your health, happiness, and long life.

JOHN TYLER.

MRS. ANNA HARRISON.

NORTH BEND, June 24, 1841.

Dear Sir: I have received with sentiments of deep emotion the resolutions of the Senate and House of Representatives, which you have done me the honor of forwarding, relative to the decease of my lamented husband.

I cannot sufficiently express the thanks I owe to the nation and its assembled Representatives, for their condolence, so feelingly expressed, of my individual calamity, and the national bereavement; but, mingling my tears with the sighs of the many patriots of the land, pray to Heaven for the enduring happiness and prosperity of our beloved country.

ANNA HARRISON.

JOHN TYLER, President of the U. States.

Box Places at Auction.—It was announced on the bills of the Park Theatre that the box seats for the night of Elssler's benefit, would be put up at auction, in the saloon of the theatre on Tuesday morning at 10 o'clock, and knocked down to the highest bidder. At the appointed hour yesterday, the arrangements were all completed, and every precaution which prudence could dictate, had been taken, to guard against accident from the great rush which was anticipated. At half past 10 there was a rush of one person to the saloon, and he, a small reporter for the public press; and as no one else appeared, or was likely to appear, the sale was declared adjoured sine die, to the chagrin of those who would have got up such a contemptible exhibition, and to the honor and credit of our citizens. Fanny must go farthern North or South with such tom-fooleries. They wont do here.—N. Y. Express.

Narrow Escape.—On the 19th ult. whilst a number of students in Geneva College were bathing, one of them, a member of the Sophomore class, Edward F. De Lancey, son of Boshop De Lancey, being somewhat exhausted, started for the shore, which was about 8 rods distant. In coming near a boat, about half way, he began to strangle, without being able to give the alarm. Those in the boat, unable to dive for him, put out an oar to his assistance, but he was too far gone. When the alarm was made Douglass Boardman, of the Junior class, swimming to the boat as soon as he could, dove for De Lancey, and brought him up apparently lifeless. He was carried to the shore, where, with the drawers and wrappers of the students, he was rubbed and soon resuscited. He has since entirely recovered.—Geneva Cour.

The Colonial Missionary Society.—This Society, connected with the Union, has nine missionaries in the colonies under its patronage. It has five theological students in an academy which has it established in Canada. Twenty chapels have been reared, and 1200 members gathered into the churches. Out of about 2000 churches connected with the Congregational Union, only about 250 contribute to this Society.

Baptist Seminary at Hamilton.—A recent report of this Institution represents it in a flourishing condition. To accommodate the increase of pupils, additions have been made to its farm, and several buildings erected. In order to furnish the means of educating the increased number, a debt of $20,000 over the receipts has been incurred. To liquidate this, the Baptist Education Society have resolved to raise $25,000, by means of shares of $100, $50, and $25 each. There are now over 200 young men pursuing a course of instruction at this Institution.—The recent effort of the denomination to meet the demands of the age, by affording an educated ministry, have been great and worthy of all praise.

Wheat Importation.—The quantity of corn and grain entered in Great Britain for home consumption from foreign countries in 1838 was 1,803,425 quarters; the amount of duty received thereon was £176,285. The quantity of corn, &c. admitted in 1839 was 4,402,945 quarters, and the duty thereon was £1,046,508. The quantity admitted in 1840 was 3,457,696 quarters; and the duty thereon was £990,966. The meal and flour admitted to home consumption from foreign countries in 1838 was 311,918 cwts. the duty thereon was £7,921.—The quantity admitted in 1839 was 590,597 cwts. on which the duty was £51,888. The quantity admitted in 1840 was 936,740 cwts. and the duty thereon £155,824. Jour. Com.

Missions of the United Brethren.—The July No. of the Moravian Missionary Intelligencer gives a summary of the missionary stations and their occupants in the employ of that church. The mission to Greenland, established in 2733, has 4 stations, 23 missionaries, and 1801 Greenland converts. That to Labrador, established in 1870, has 4 settlements, 26 missionaries, 1034 Esquimaux converts. The mission to the N. A. Indians, established in 1734, has 3 stations, 11 missionaries, and 276 India converts.—In West Indies, the missions at the Danish Islands, are 7, missionaries 40, and negro converts 10,599; at Jamacia, 11 stations, 27 missionaries, and 11,702 negro converts; at Antigua, 6 stations, 21 missionaries, and 14,972 negroes; at St. Kitts, 3 stations, 11 missionaries, and and 4,762 negroes; at Barbadoes, 31 stations, 10 missionaries, and 1,757 negroes; at Tobago, 1 station, 5 missionaries, and 400 negroes; at Surinam, 4 stations, 24 missionaries, 6,671 negroes.—In South Africa, there are 7 stations, 45 missionaries, 4,739 converts of the Hottentot, Caffree, Tambookie, and Fingoe tribes. Making the grand total of 53 stations, 243 missionaries, and 57,813.

The Legislature of Arkansas has passed a law offering a quarter section of land, as a bounty to each settler coming into the State.

We learn that Professor Ingraham has received and accepted the appointment of Secretary of Legation to Spain. The Professor speaks the Spanish language as well as the English.

Five hundred persons have joined the Middletown, (Conn.,) Temperance Society within the last two weeks. Four thousand have joined the Temperance Society of Pittsburg and Alleghany within a short time.

In Vernon, July 3d, by Professor Hawley, Professor HORATIO R. CLARKE, of Oneida Conference Seminary, and Miss MARYETTE, daughter of Rev. George Gary, of Black River Conference.

DIED,

In Piscataway, New Jersey, May 6th, at evening, after a short illness of twenty-three hours, RHODA, wife of Joel Dunn, and daughter of Deacon David F. Randolph, aged 27 years.

She has left a large concourse of relatives, a youthful husband, and two small children to mourn their loss. Our sister obtained a hope in the Savior and united with this church in early life, and, after marrying, she had the happiness of seeing her husband follow the same path, which strengthened the bonds of union; but these ties, however strong, must be broken by death. In an unexpected hour he came, but his victim was prepared to go! For months she had, apparently, been growing in grace, and had told her husband and family, that her stay with them was short—her house was set in order. As a sister in the church, she was one beloved; her place was never left vacant in the sanctuary unless prevented from attending by sickness. In her manners, she was very reserve—always bearing about with her the image of Christ—her conversation much sweetened with grace, presenting an air of cheerfulness in all her deportment. And, of a truth, she was a living member of God's Church—an affectionate companion—a kind mother, and a loving and worthy daughter, relative and friend.

Her funeral was attended on the Sabbath by a large and attentive congregation, and a sermon preached from Job xix. 23—27, selected by the family as having been a favorite text of hers.

Religion is the sacred balm,
That heals our every wound,
This treasure I have found most sure,
When stepping to the tomb.

You that pass by, behold me now
A mouldring to the dust;
As I am now, so you must be,
Then in the Savior trust. W. B. G.

In Genesee, on the 4th inst., WILLIAM DE FRANCE, son of William and Eliza Ennis, aged 20 months and 6 days.

In Edmeston, Otsego Co., N. Y., on the 16th of June last, Mrs. Betsey Crumb, consort of Mr. Silas Crumb, aged 51 years.

Mrs. C. possessed a remarkably amiable and peaceable disposition, and was much beloved by her numerous acquaintances for her kind and affectionate intercourse with them. She became a member of the Seventh-day Baptist Church, in Brookfield, in 1821; and in the organization of the 3rd S. D. B. Church in that town, she united with it and remained a member of it until her death. She has evinced by her steady and persevering course in the cause of her Redeemer, she was truly pious. In her last illness, which she bore with much fortitude and patience, she was supported by a hope in Christ, "full of glory." And although surrounded by a family much endeared to her, she seemed to feel no reluctance in leaving them, believing that she would then be with Christ, which, to her, would be far better.

She has left an affectionate husband and a number of children, together with numerous friends to lament her loss.

They tell me she was dead! [illegible] there come,
Twined with the recollections of her name,
Such thoughts as memory loves. Again she seemed
The tender mother and the gentle friend,
Wearing the brightness of life's sunny smile,
As if it knew no shade, and earth no [illegible]
For she had learned [illegible] the heart's [illegible]
It has no anchor, but the Savior's breast,
And so she came to Him, trusting [illegible]
Her partner's, hers, her children's God, [illegible]

Then I remember'd [illegible]
In the glad spring-time [illegible] bright sun [illegible]
Her infant blossoms were my charge, to love,
Instruct, and every budding thought improve.
And how her voice, with those that matron band
In meek entreaty rose to Him, whose hand
Was spared to bless us. [illegible] voices sung
Perfected praise, and grove, and woodland rang
With cherubic music

O, that prayer—which moves
The lever of the Universe, should be Restrained, and he who hears, and hearing loves,
The raven's cry—the suppliant's melting plea
Forgotten in his own immensity.

It is not well. Teachers can tell how dear
The earnest pleadings of a mother's prayer
And not in vain such offerings are laid,
Upon Heaven's altar. All shall be repaid
An hundred fold

So may they reap for whom
That mother's tears, abundantly were sown
Here every bliss, with future promise rife,
And there the fullness of eternal life. L. M. C.

POETRY.

From the Temperance Journal.

Dr. Reese has kindly furnished us with the following touching and sensible verses, for publication:—

NEW YORK, March 29, 1841.

Dr. D. M. REESE,

SIR—After the meeting in Forsyth-street, Monday evening, I was conversing with a lady on the subjects there discussed, when she told me I was almost a monomaniac in my hatred to alcoholic drink; the following verses were written to-day as an excuse for my warmth. Please, sir, oblige me by handing them to Mr. Hawkins, of the Baltimore delegation, requesting him to present them to his daughter, as she also may be accused of the same fault. ALMIRA.

Go, feel what I have felt;
Go bear what I have borne;
Sink 'neath a blow a father dealt,
And the cold, proud world's scorn;
Thus struggle on from year to year,
Thy sole relief the scalding tear.

Go, weep as I have wept,
O'er a loved father's fall;
See every cherished promise swept,
Youth's sweetness turned to gall;
Hope's faded flowers strewed all the way
That led me up to woman's day.

Go, kneel as I have knelt;
Implore, beseech, and pray;
Strive the besotted heart to melt,
The downward curse to stay—
Be cast with bitter curse aside—
Thy prayers burlesqued, thy tears defied.

Go, stand where I have stood,
And see the strong man bow;
With gnashing teeth, lips bathed in blood,
And cold and livid brow;
Catch his wand'ring glance, and see
There mirrored, his soul's misery.

Go, hear what I have heard—
The sobs of sad despair—
As memory, feeling's fount hath stirred,
And its revealing there
Have told him what he might have been,
Had he the drunkard's fate foreseen.

Go to thy mother's side,
And her crushed spirit cheer—
Thine own deep anguish hide—
Wipe from her cheek the tear.
Mark her dimmed eye, her furrowed brow;
The gray that streaks her dark hair now,
Her toil worn frame—her trembling limb,
And trace the ruin back to him
Whose plighted faith, in early youth,
Promised eternal love and truth;
But who, forsworn, hath yielded up
This promise to the deadly cup,
And led her down from love and light,
From all that made her pathway bright,
And chained her there, 'mid want and strife,
That lowly thing—a drunkard's wife!
And stamped on childhood's brow, so mild,
That with'ring blight—a drunkard's child!

Go, hear, and see, and feel, and know,
All that my soul hath felt or known,
Then look within the wine cup's glow—
See if its brightness can atone.
Think, if its favor you would try,
If all proclaimed, 'Tis drink and die.

Tell me I hate the bowl—
Hate is a feeble word.
I loathe—abhor—my very soul
By strong disgust is stirred,
Whene'er I see, or hear, or tell,
Of the dark beverage of hell!

INCIDENTS OF TRAVEL IN CHIAPAS AND YUCATAN.

In our former remarks on the Antiquities of Central America, we promised to present at greater length some proofs of the position we then alone maintained, that the ruined cities of Gautimala—which all the learned agreed in considering ancient, if not ante-deluvian works of an extinct race—were, on the contrary, of comparatively modern date; were Mexican cities, inhabited at the time of the conquest by the progeny of the people that built them. We shall redeem our word by referring our readers to the books before us. Notwithstanding that lecturers and reviewers, the public and the press, without one known exception, pronounced against us, we felt warranted in holding this opinion singularly, because convinced that the question had not been thoroughly and fairly studied in all its parts, nor viewed in all its aspects; that sundry facts had been overlooked, and certain Spanish historians disregarded, the testimony of which must appear on reflection conclusive in our favor. It was while preparing a short summary of this neglected but important evidence, that the volumes of Mr. Stephens, then, recently returned from a visit to the ruins, were announced as forthcoming; and we determined to await their appearance in the hope and belief that the new facts and observations promised by that intelligent traveler, would in some way affect our conclusion, and either oblige us to abandon, or help to establish it.

From the impression conveyed to our minds by this lecture, and from the descriptive part of these volumes, we were prepared, and we expected to encounter in Mr. Stephens an advocate of the popular, the adverse opinion. The poetry of antiquity, though in this case imaginary, is made to invest his livery and charming narrative with an adventitious interest.—This disguise is preserved till the last. We were, therefore, surprised, and no less pleased at finding near the close of his work, a chapter entirely corroborating the view we have all along taken. In this chapter, which every one should read, is briefly, but convincingly shown the insufficiency of the evidence for antiquity claimed, and also, some of the many grounds that exist for believing the contrary. Now that this view is taken by so distinguished and competent an authority, of course any further support from us would be supererogatory and vain. We will, therefore, merely give a few extracts, and then retire behind this ample shield.

In Vol. II. Chap. XXXVI., after showing that the aboriginal structures are anomalous and unique, he says:

"I am inclined to think that there are not sufficient grounds for the belief in the great antiquity that has been ascribed to these ruins; that they are not the works of the people who have passed away, and whose history has become unknown; but, opposed as is my idea to all previous speculations, that they were constructed by the races who occupied the country at the time of the invasion by the Spaniards, or of some not very distant progenitors. And this opinion is founded, first, upon the appearance and condition of the remains themselves.

"Secondly, my opinion is founded upon historical accounts. Herrera, perhaps the most reliable of the Spanish historians, says of Yucatan: The whole country is divided into eighteen districts, and in all of them were so many and such stately stone buildings that it was amazing, and the greatest wonder is, that having no use of any metal, they were able to raise such structures, which seem to have been temples, for their houses were always of timber and thatched. In those edifices were carved the figures of men with ear-rings, after the Indian manner, idols of all sorts," &c., and again: "there was such plenty through the country, and the people multiplied so much, that the old men said the whole Province looked like one town; and then they applied themselves to build more temples, which produced so great a number of them."

In the third volume of this old author now beside us, we have marked twenty passages equally pertinent and conclusive. But our work is rendered needless.

"I have thus," continues our traveler, "very briefly, and without attempting to controvert the opinions and speculations of others, presented our own views upon the subject of these ruins. As yet we perhaps stand alone in these views; but I repeat my opinion, that we are not warranted in going back to any ancient nation of the whole world for the builders of these cities; that they are not the work of people who have passed away, and whose history is lost, but that there are strong reasons to believe them the creations of the same races who inhabited the country at the time of the Spanish conquest, or some not very distant progenitors. And I would remark that we began our exploration without any theory to support. Our feelings were in favor of going back to a high and venerable antiquity. During the greater part of our journey, we were groping in the dark, in doubt, and uncertainty, and it was not till we arrived at the ruins of Uxmal that we formed our opinion of their comparatively modern date. Some are beyond doubt older than others; some are known to have been inhabited at the time of the Spanish conquest, and others, perhaps, were really in ruins before. Their desolation and ruin are easily accounted for. With the arrival of the Spaniards the sceptre of the Indians departed. In the city of Mexico every house was razed to the ground, and throughout the country the communities were scattered, their temples thrown down, their idols burned, and the palaces of the Caciques ruined. And, without this, we have authentic accounts of great scourges which swept over, and for a time depopulated and desolated the whole of Yucatan.

"It perhaps destroys much of the interest that hangs over these ruins to assign to them a modern date; but we live in an age whose spirit is to discard phantasms and arrive at truth, and the interest lost in one particular is supplied in another scarcely inferior; for the nearer we can bring the builders of these cities to our own times, the greater is the chance of knowing all. Throughout the country, the convents are rich in manuscripts and documents written by the early fathers, Caciques, and Indians, who very soon acquired the knowledge of Spanish and the art of writing.—These have never been examined with the slightest reference to this subject; and I can not help thinking that some precious memorial is now mouldering in the library of some neighboring convent, which would determine the history of some of these ruined cities. If only three centuries have elapsed since any one of these unknown cities was inhabited, the race of the inhabitants is not extinct. Their descendants are still in the land, scattered, perhaps, and retired like our own Indians, into the wilderness which have never yet been penetrated by a white man, but not lost."

From the Knickerbocker for July.

FUNERAL CEREMONIES OF MODERN GREECE.

A sick man has just breathed his last: his wife, mother, daughters, sisters, in a word, such of his nearest female relatives as are at hand, close his eyes and mouth, each giving free course to the grief inflicted by the calamity, according to her disposition and the strength of her attachment. This first duty discharged, they all withdraw to the house of some relation or friend in the vicinity, where they change their garments and array themselves in white, and as for the nuptial ceremony, except that their heads are uncovered and their hair unbound and pendant. While they are thus occupied, other women are attending to the corpse; they clothe it from head to foot in the best apparel, and in this state lay it upon a very low bed, with the face uncovered and turned toward the east, and the arms crossed upon the breast.

These preparations being over, the relatives return in their mourning dress to the house, leaving the doors open, so that all the women of the place, friends, neighbors, or strangers, may enter after them. A circle is formed around the corpse, and their grief breaks out anew, and, as before, without measure or restraint, in tears, shrieks, or words. These irrepressible and simultaneous plaints are soon followed by lamentations of a different nature, that is to say, by myriologues. Ordinarily, that of the nearest relative comes first; after her, the remaining relatives, friends, or mere neighbors, in a word, all the women on the spot, who possess the ability, bestow this last tribute of affection one after another, and sometimes a number together. Not unfrequently there are found in the circle of assistants, women who have recently lost one of their own kindred, whose hearts are yet overflowing with sorrow, and who have some communication to make him. In the dead before them, they behold a messenger who will convey to the dead for whom they mourn, fresh testimony of their recollection and regret, and in consequence, a myriologue destined for the latter is delivered to the former. Others content themselves with throwing on the deceased bouquets of flowers, or various light articles, which they implore him to be so good as to transmit to their friends in the other world.

The delivery of the myriologues is not interrupted until the arrival of the priests to accompany the corpse to the place of interment, and is still prolonged until the funeral procession has reached the church. They cease while the priests are engaged in prayer and singing, but re-commence as the body is about to be lowered into the grave. Nor do they end with the rites of the sepulchre, but are renewed on fixed occasions for an indefinite space of time.—First, for a whole year from the day on which the death has taken place, the females of the family are permitted to sing myriologues only; every other song, however melancholy, however befitting the most serious impressions which the ideas of death, the grave, and last farewell, can produce, would be reputed a diversion incompatible with the reverence due to the dead. Nor is this all: whenever they go to church, the women seldom omit, either before or after divine service, to meet at the tomb and reiterate the adieu of the burial-day.

When one of their relatives die in a foreign land, an image of the person is laid upon the funeral bed, partially clad in the garments of the individual whom it represents, and is then addressed with the same lamentations as if it were a real body.—These myriologues are still more full of sadness than others, as the inability to deposit and preserve in consecrated ground the remains of the beloved object is regarded as adding to the weight of the affliction.

Mothers also compose for their deceased infants myriologues which are often exquisitely pathetic. The child is bewailed under the emblem of a flower, a bird, or any thing in nature sufficiently beautiful for a mother's fancy, to experience pleasure in conceiving a resemblance between it and her lost darling.

KNOWING THE WORLD.—The great and constant danger to which children in the higher walks of life are exposed, is the prevailing turn and spirit of general conversation. Even the children of better families, who are well instructed when at their studies, are yet at other times continually beholding the world set up in the highest and most advantageous point of view. Seeing the world, knowing the world, standing well with the world, are spoken of as including the whole sum and substance of human advantages. They have their education almost exclusively attended to, with reference to the figure it will enable them to make in the world. In almost all companies, they hear all that the world admires, spoken of with admiration; rank flattered, fame courted, power sought, beauty invoked, money considered as the one thing needful, and as the atoning substitute for the want of all other things. The phrase, "knowing the world," is commonly applied, or misapplied, in the way of panegyric, to keen, designing, selfish, ambitious men, who study mankind in order to turn it to their own account. But in the true sense of the expression, the sense which Christian parents would wish to impress upon their children, to know the world is to know its emptiness, its vanity, its futility, and its wickedness. To know it is to despise it; and in this view an obscure Christian, in a village, may be said to know the world better than a hungry courtier, or a wily politician; for, how can they be said to know it, who go on to value it, to love it, to be led captive by its allurements, to give their soul in exchange for its lying vanities?—Hannah More.

DISCOVERY AMONG THE STARS.—M. Bessell, a German astronomer, has made one of the greatest discoveries of modern times, by having ascertained the parallax of the double star 61 Cygni. He found, from repeated observations, made from August, 1837, to March, 1840, that the parallex of a Cygni did not exceed 31 hundredths of a second, which places the distance of that star from us at nearly 670,000 times that of the sun, or which is nearly 61 millions of billions of miles, (or more nearly 63,650.000,000,000 miles.) This immense distance can be better conceived when we state, that if a cannon ball were to traverse this vast space at the rate of 20 miles a minute, it would occupy more than 6,000,000 years in coming from that star to our earth; and if a body could be projected from our earth to 61 Cygni, at thirty miles an hour, (which is about the same rate as carriages on rail roads travel,) it would occupy at least 96,000,000 years. Light, which travels more than 11,000,000 miles in a minute, would occupy about 12 years in coming from that star to our earth.

FRANKLIN'S CODE OF MORALS.—The following list of moral virtues was drawn up by Franklin for the regulation of his life:—

Temperance.—Eat not to fullness; drink not to elevation.

Silence.—Speak not but what may benefit others or yourself; avoid trifling conversation.

Order.—Let all your things have their place; let each part of your business have its time.

Resolution.—Resolve to perform what you ought; perform without fail what you resolve.

Frugality.—Make no expense, but to do good to others or to yourself; that is wasting nothing.

Industry.—Lose no time; be always employed in something useful; keep out of all unnecessary action.

Sincerity.—Use no hurtful deceits; think innocently and justly; and if you speak, speak accordingly.

Justice.—Wrong none by doing injuries, or omitting the benefits that are your duty.

Moderation.—Avoid extremes; forbear resenting injuries.

Cleanliness.—Suffer no uncleanliness in the body, clothes, or habitation.

Tranquility.—Be not disturbed about trifles, or at accidents common or unavoidable.

Humility.—Imitate Jesus Christ.

REFLECTION—If you would increase in wisdom you must reflect. The mere sight of things amounts to nothing. A fool may go round the world and come back a fool at last, because he has no reflection. One man learns more from a mole-hill than another does from a mountain.

The reason that many men want their desires, is, because their desires want reason. He may do what he will, that will do but what he may.

Be reserved, says William Penn, but not sour; grave, but not formal; bold, but not rash; humble, but not servile.

MILKING.

That material loss is sustained by the dairy man, from the manner in which the process of milking is usually performed, can scarcely be questioned by any one who has paid attention to the manner in which the milk is produced, and the nature of that fluid. In milk, the most valuable part is the lightest, as we see from the cream rising to the surface of the vessel; and it is reasonable to suppose that the same relative position is maintained in the udder as in the pan or pail, that is, the cream or richest part is in the highest part of lacteal vessels, and of course is the last to be extracted in milking. When, therefore, this operation is carelessly and imperfectly performed, or in other words, the cow is not "milked clean," the best part is left to the udder, and lost to the dairy. It may be said, however, that what is left at one time, is obtained at the next milking, and is not, therefore, lost; but it must be remembered, that the progress of absorption is constantly going on, and that by leaving the richest part for this action of the vessels, it is irrevocably lost; and, besides, the more completely the vessels are emptied, the greater the action will be. All dairy men are aware of the fact, that to dry a cow, nothing more is necessary than to only partly drain her udder at each successive milking. The secretion of milk will cease, and the absorbents become active in proportion as the milk left incites them, until none will be left; and this result, in a greater or less degree, always ensues where the milk is not fully extracted. This also explains why a cow milked three times a day, will give more milk in the twenty-four hours, than when milked only twice.

In a large dairy, "dripling," or stripling the cows; after they have been milked in the usual manner, is practiced, and with evident profit, as the milk thus obtained is very nearly pure cream. A writer in the Farmer's Magazine thus describes the manner in which this last draining of the udder should be performed:

"The milker should be instructed to milk as fast as his strength will allow; and the idle or slow milker I would at once discard from this branch of the dairy. When he has obtained all the milk he can by the common method, he should be required to press moderately with his left hand the upper and every part of the udder, so as to force downwards all the milk that may be remaining in the smaller or higher milk carrying tubes; and as it is pressed into the receptacle and teat, he should milk it out with his right hand until the whole is completely discharged. The same plan must be pursued with the remaining quarters of the udder. It must not be supposed that his method will be distressing to the animal; on the contrary, her quietness during the process, is a satisfactory indication that it occasions no pain, but rather an agreeable sensation. This plan, though effectual in keeping up the cow to her full quantity of milk, will not, generally speaking, take more additional time than a minute over the old mode of milking, and persevering in this plan, all the milk will be obtained, the richest, as well as the thinnest of course."

It is by attention to minute things that most of the profits of the farmer are realized, and we are confident that by attention to this point, non-essential as it may at first appear, the dairy man would find that an important addition would be made to the sum total of his annual profit.

RHEUMATIC AND STRENGTHENING PLASTER.

The peculiarities of this compound are owing to the immediate effects produced on the animal fibre, it being carried by the absorbants to the seat of disease or pain, without producing disagreeable sensations. As an external application it is a powerful auxiliary, and will cure, in all curable cases, such as acute and chronic Rheumatism, Scrofulous Affections, weakness of back, pain in the side, head and limbs, affections of the Spine, &c &c &c.

This Plaster is warranted to be by far the best ever offered to the public—much superior to "Jew David, or Hebrew Plaster," and at less than half the price.

WINSLOW'S

BALSAM OF HOREHOUND.

An unparalleled remedy for common Colds, Coughs, Asthma, Influenza, Whooping Cough, Bronchitis, and all diseases of the Breast and Lungs, leading to Consumption; composed of the concentrated virtues of Horehound, Boneset, Blood Root, Liverwort, and several other vegetable substances. Prepared only by J. M. WINSLOW, Rochester, N. Y.

The well known and universally admitted pectoral virtues of the Herbs from which the BALSAM of HOREHOUND is made, are too generally known to require recommendation; it is therefore only necessary to observe that the Medicine contains the whole of their Medicinal properties, highly concentrated, and so happily combined with several other vegetable substances, as to render it the most speedy, mild and certain remedy, now in use, for the complaints above mentioned.

Thousands of testimonials will be shown, if wanted, at any time, placing the above medicines beyond reproach.

In conclusion he would only say, that he will not be under-sold on any article which he offers for sale.

MONTHLY SERMONS,

BY

A VILLAGE PASTOR :

(JULY, 1841.)

NO. VII.—IT IS A SHAME NOT TO BE A CHRISTIAN.

1 Cor. xv. 34.—I speak this to your shame.

What does Paul speak to their shame? That some of them had not the knowledge of God. The plain sentiment of the text is this, viz;

It is a shame not to be a Christian. Why?

1. Because it is a shame to neglect to do what is in itself right.

2. To neglect such a high privilege.

3. To remain in such company as the sinner chooses while he refuses to become a Christian.

4. It is a shame to treat the entreaties of Christians as he does who is not a Christian.

5. It is a shame thus to treat the triune Jehovah, Father, Son, and Holy Spirit. It is superlatively shameful thus to spurn the arrangements of Divine Grace.

6. But especially, (according to the primary application of the text,) it is a shame for those who profess to be Christians, to belie their profession.

Reflections.

1. The shame of the wicked is constantly augmenting.

2. We see how those misjudge, who suppose that experimental religion is something beneath their dignity. They ought to be ashamed that they are destitute of it.

3. It is solemn to reflect, that all who continue to refuse to become Christians, must "awake to shame and everlasting contempt."

4. Impenitent sinner! Will you now abandon your shameful course of impenitency, and this hour become a true Christian?

Some whom I address have not the knowledge of God—are not Christians: in this day of Gospel privileges—"I speak this to your shame."

"A Village Pastor" embraces this opportunity to say, that he thinks it his duty to occupy but little space in the Register, while its columns are occupied in the elucidation of that fundamental doctrine of the Christian system—the Trinity.

For the Register.

Mr. Editor.—Your paper being known as the acknowledged public organ of our denomination, whatever doctrine it subscribes, either avowedly, or tacitly, must have its effect in shaping the public judgment relative to the sentiments held by our people.

In conducting a paper upon the liberal principles which I am happy to observe yours is conducted, it may, of course, happen that views, not according with those entertained by the majority of our communicants, may find way into its columns; and I think two such instances have recently occurred. The first was the article from Romaine, headed, "Perseverance." The second was the Sermon, No. VI., "By a Village Pastor."

Entertaining such views, I ask the favor of having the remarks I am about to present you on those articles, published in the Register; and will notice the Pastor's Sermon first.

I observe that inferential reasoning is a most difficult operation, in which both the actor and the spectator are continually in danger of erring, as to what in truth may, or may not, be inferred. The truth of this remark, I think, is clear from the great contradiction of opinion among men on points requiring inferential reasoning to settle them; or where it is used, though not requisite or applicable. The drift of the inferences in the Sermon before me, I think, affords a specimen of the inferential illusion that so frequently begirts even the strong and capacious mind, in attempting to follow and bring to view the thread of consistency, interwoven with, and connecting the several parts of the Divine Providence relating to man; a fiber of which thread is embraced in the text, "For we are his workmanship."

The point at which the allusion, as I suppose, first strongly manifests itself in the Pastor's reasoning, is, where he infers that because God must have entertained the design or purpose to do a thing before it be done; therefore, he must have entertained that design, or purpose "from Eternity." I will give you my objections to this opinion. [illegible]

1. It is very difficult if not impossible to conceive the idea intended to be expressed by the words, "from Eternity"; for that seems to require powers of conception commensurate with, or equal to eternity, which, I believe, are not thought to belong to the human mind.

2. The best idea we can form of this expression, or its import, involves this also: that nothing could have preceded the purpose of God in this matter. And, yet, the language of the inspired author of the Pastor's text, put knowledge before it; in Rom. viii. 29. "For whom he did foreknow he also did predestinate," using the word predestinate in this verse, in the same sense as he does the word purpose, in the preceding one; in both of which he has direct reference to God's designs relating to saints.

3. If God did not know how men would employ their powers, in the exercise of their "Free Moral Agency," before he purposed what their destiny should be, the probability would be, that as God had exercised no judgment or knowledge in purposing, there would be no justice or treatment according to desert, or deeds done, in the execution of his purposes.

4. If the purpose of God be from eternity, and that purpose have the force of necessity, determining the affections and final destiny of individuals, then no agency, given to the subjects of that purpose afterwards, (and it could only be given afterwards,) could be either Free, or Moral. For they could neither prefer, pursue, or reach a different destiny; and this being known to them, no sense of duty, or of guilt, could be excited in the soul, as all experience proves. Therefore, they could not be effected, either by moral principles, or be subjects of moral law. But if agents at all, they must be so in a physical sense only, & subjects only of physical law. But if by the purpose of God is meant, only, that he willed or determined, by way of choice, that things should come to pass in one way rather than another, and provided ample means to bring them to pass in that way, except those means should be perseveringly spurned by "Free Moral" Agents, (which appears to be what it must mean if men are such agents,) then the statement of the Village Pastor, and every statement, indicating that the event of a person's loving God, has been absolutely fixed, singly, by His purpose, from eternity, or any other assignable period, must be a mistake; that is, not true.

5. The inference that the doctrine of election is in perfect harmony with the Free Moral Agency of man, I think is very just. But in the statement "That God hath purposed to cause certain rebels from Eternity to love him," I think the Pastor has unwarily shifted from one topic to another, and, therefore, though what he says were in itself true, yet it is by no means a statement of the doctrine of Election. For to elect, is to exercise a choice for, of one or more of the things which do, or may exist. But to purpose, implies the effecting of the nature, or circumstances of a part, or all of the things that do, or may exist.

6. The idea of the purpose being new, is, I think, of no importance, since it argues no mutability in the nature of God, or the principles of his government, but, simply, a modified application of those principles to save lost men; and for that matter, might as well have been first entertained, yesterday, as "from Eternity." But if we consult the Bible as to the actual antiquity of God's purposes of mercy to fallen men, we shall find that we are not fixed by that, at any instant, or point, either in eternity, or time; but that they were entertained before, though probably not very long before the foundations of the world were laid. And why, I ask, should they have been entertained sooner? when, so far as we can judge, man's very existence itself was not determined.

If it should be thought that the eleventh verse of the third chapter of the epistle to the Ephesians, presents an objection to the foregoing, I observe, that although the word purpose be qualified by the word eternal, this is not the same as to qualify the word eternity by the word from. For then, the expressions, Eternal life, Eternal judgment, Eternal fire, and Eternal damnation, must import that the life, the judgment, the fire, and the damnation, spoken of in such terms, must have been from Eternity, which, I suppose, no one will assert. Things may be called Eternal which have their beginning to-day, to-morrow, or thenceforth, if they are of endless consequence after they begin.

I will defer remarking on the other subject at present, as I have not room in this, but if nothing prevent I will attend to that soon. SPECTATOR.

DAMNABLE DELUSIONS.

A LETTER TO A FRIEND.

I wish to say a few words to you on an all-important subject. It is for you to consider and apply them. They may meet you again, and under circumstances which will preclude the reception of benefit from their consideration.

Reason and scripture teach that men may hold opinions which place their eternal salvation in jeopardy; and not only so, but which insure the loss of the soul. If this is not so, then, ultimately, it will make no difference what opinions we embrace; and if God will treat men, finally, irrespective of their opinions, then he is indifferent to both truth and error. Is not this plain.—And does not reason plainly reject it? And the Apostle Paul in 2 Thess., chap. ii. verses 11 and 12, plainly teaches that men may be left to embrace opinions which, unless reclaimed from them, insure their damnation. We wish you here to pause and examine this position until you perceive and admit its correctness. We will state a few of these opinions for your consideration.

I. The first we adduce is Atheism. This is to reject in theory and practice the being of a God. By adopting this theory you reject all natural and revealed religion.—And you must believe that every thing exists without a first cause—and that all the harmony and order in the universe is the effect of chance. And then you must be a god yourself: for until you know all things, how can you tell but the thing you do not know is God. So that you can not be an Atheist until you are first God; and if God, how can you be an Atheist?

This is a damnable delusion, and for these reasons. An Atheist is in the moral world, what a regicide is in human governments. As he denies the existence of God, he can neither love, reverence, or obey him. There is nothing in the opinion to conform or assimilate in any degree to the will or image of God; and there is every thing in it to foster our worst passions, and prejudicial to the best interests of men. Even the heathen judged the Atheist worthy of death. No man can live and die an Atheist and be saved.

II. The next we induce is Infidelity. Infidelity consists in the rejection of the Bible as a divine revelation, and, of course, of the plan of salvation which it reveals. Its fundamental principle, is, that human reason alone is sufficient to guide us into all truth, and that a divine revelation is both unnnecessary and unmade. By adopting this theory you reject all revealed religion, and rest your eternal hopes and prospects upon these three principles, the being of a God, your own reason, and the light of nature. But rejecting the Bible, how can you certainly know whether there is one God or many? What can you know about the attributes of God? By what certain standard can you determine what is vice, and what virtue? By what authority can you command men to forsake vice and to pursue the path of virtue?—You can not answer. And is it not clear that infidelity takes away all certainty from the unity of God—veils his moral attributes in darkness—destroys the distinction between vice and virtue—takes away the foundation of all religion, and leaves man without any power to control or direct him to pursue whatever course he may select.

There is surely nothing in Infidelity to teach us that we are sinners, to communicate any information as to our moral circumstances, to teach us reverence for God or his government, or our need of conformity to his holy character. The only hope for the salvation of the Infidel is the bare possibility that his system may be true; and if true, then the past is all imposture; and the vast future is with the impenetrable shades of an eternal night. Infidelity therefore is a damnable delusion.

III. The next we adduce is the rejection of the divinity of Christ. And by this we mean the rejection of his supreme divinity as the equal with the Father. Unless Christ is God, what do these scriptures mean? "Great is the mystery of godliness, God manifest in the flesh." "He shall be called the mighty God, the everlasting Father. "The word was God." "Had they known, they would not have crucified the Lord of Glory." And if he is not the true God, where has been the intellect of the church for 1800 years? If not the true God, can the Bible be other than a dark and deceptive and dangerous book? Christ is either God or he is not. If he is not God, then his church until now, with all its companies of martyrs, and missionaries, and holy men, has been composed of gross idolators; for they have worshiped him as God;—if he is God, the rejector of his supreme divinity withholds the homage which is his due, and subjects himself to the awful sentence, "As for these, mine enemies, that would not have me to rule over them, bind them head and foot and cast them into outer darkness where is weeping and gnashing of teeth." The divinity of Christ is not among the less vital points of Christian doctrine, which men may receive or reject without putting their salvation in jeopardy. It touches every spring of life and action in our faith and practice. Rejecting his divinity, we reject his atonement, his righteousness, his intercession; or receive them in such a way as to render them of no avail. To believe in Christ savingly, we must believe on him just as he is, and unless we believe on him as "God manifest in the flesh," we believe not on him at all. And then comes the text, "He that believeth not the Son shall not see life, but the wrath of God abideth on him." Do not these considerations make it apparent that the rejection of the deity of Christ is a vital error, a damnable delusion? Does not Peter assert this? 1 Pet. ii. 1.

IV. The next we adduce is the denial of future punishment. If Christ, by his death, secured the salvation of every man, there never was a fact more equivocally published—the Bible greatly misleads, and very needlessly alarms. If there is no future punishment, there is no way of accounting for the way in which the New Testament misleads and alarms, but by charging Christ and his apostles with either incompetency or dishonesty. If there is no future punishment, what means hundreds of texts like these: "These shall go away into everlasting punishment"—"Except a man be born again he can not see the kingdom of God"—He that believeth not the Son shall not see life, but the wrath of God abideth on him"—"The smoke of their torments ascendeth up forever and ever."

If there is no future punishment, then the moral law has no penalty. The general reply to this, that its penalty is inflicted in this life, is inadmissible, because contradicted by universal experience. If there is no future punishment where is the foundation of morals? If God will treat all men alike hereafter, why not regard them all alike here? And why is it not right and proper for men to be imitators of God, and to regard all men alike, irrespective of their moral character? Here, then, are the distinctions between vice and virtue gone forever, and the gulph which separates heaven and hell, according to the Bible, filled up.

We cannot believe the Bible and reject future punishment, without converting it into a deceptive book—without proving the Savior and his apostles incompetent or deceptive teachers—without sweeping away the whole foundation of morals as with the besom of destruction. Must not, then, the rejection of future punishment be a vital error, a damnable delusion?

V. The next we adduce is a dependance on moral character for salvation. The position of the moralist is this: "If I live an honest and moral life here, it will be well with me hereafter." There can be no religion without morality; but morality is not religion. If it is, then,

It was utterly unnecessary that the Savior should ever visit our world. A good system of morals could have been promulged at an expense infinitely less than the mission and death of Jesus Christ. For aught we can see, a Seneca or a Johnson would have answered the purpose.

If morality will finally save, then the atonement is unnecessary; and the making of it was an act of cruelty on the part of heaven. The trials and sufferings of Christ were without sufficient cause.

If morality will finally save, then the Bible is a deceptive book; for, by many a precept and example, it teaches the contrary doctrine. Read the history of the young man who kept the law from his youth up,—ponder the conversion of Nicodemus with the Savior,—diligently consider the life of Paul, which, up to the period of his conversion, was in the eye of the law, blameless. Can you for a moment believe that your dependence on your morality is sanctioned by the Scriptures?

The above position strikes a blow at the whole system of revealed religion. And the mere moral man is an Infidel in theory and an Atheist in practice. He substitutes his morality for the atonement, and himself for the Savior, and leaves God entirely out of the question. He rejects salvation by grace, and if he seeks it at all, he seeks it as the reward of his own works. Can it be otherwise than as a damnable delusion?

VI. The next we adduce is procrastination. This consists in putting off submission to God to a more convenient season. This takes too many things for granted. It takes for granted that repentance and faith may be better exercised at some future time than now, which is not the case. Whilst without repentance towards God, we are every day going from bad to worse. It takes for granted that God will be as ready to receive us at a future time as now; which may not be the case. There is such a thing as exhausting the patience of God, and as his hearing our prayers without answering them. (Prov. i. 26—28.) It takes for granted that if we reach the time fixed in the future, that we shall have our present desires to forsake sin; which may not be the case.

A course of sin never deepens, but always weakens religious impressions. The current of sinful desires is ever increasing in strength. It takes for granted that you are as sure of time to come, as of the present; which is not the case. We know not what a day may bring forth. Our continued earthly existence depends on so many contingencies beyond our control, that we are in jeopardy every hour. And then, how few that procrastinate ever embrace the Savior. It is a delusion of the devil to gain time so to rivet upon you the chains that bind you to death, as to make your damnation sure.

In theory, these delusions differ very widely; but yet they all lead to the same result. We do not assert that the theoretical believer who postpones submission to Christ, is as bad as the Universalist or Unitarian:—much less that the moral man is as bad as the infidel or atheist. But as to the salvation of the soul, the difference is merely in theory. They all agree not to have Christ to reign over them here, and in the world to come they must be alike excluded from the consolations of his presence and the joys of salvation.

There is no way of salvation but through the Lord Jesus Christ. He is the way, the truth, and the life. And every sentiment, whatever be its type or character, that prevents us from believing in him, however honestly, is a damnable delusion. Unless evidently found in him as our head, and clothed in his righteousness, and sanctified by his Spirit, all, all will be lost. Cast, then, your guilty soul now upon his atonement, crying, God be merciful to me a sinner. S. Y.

CHRISTIAN EFFORT SHOULD BE DIRECTED TO DEFINITE OBJECTS.

That Christians are under obligations to labor personally for the advancement of Christ's kingdom, is a sentiment now very generally admitted in theory, however much it may be denied in practice. The time has been in the church, and that not very distant—when its members were scarcely exhorted or expected to exert any other influence than that of a passive, consistent piety. There is a remarkable contrast between the writings of divines in the last and the present centuries. However valuable the former may be,—and from their great excellency we would not detract—they were certainly very deficient in urging Christians to personal, positive effort, for the extension of the kingdom of Christ. This duty is probably better understood now by the church than it has been since the days of the apostles. Would to God it were as extensively practiced as it is well understood.

There is, if we are not mistaken, a general desire to perform it, pressing the consciences of most of the disciples of Jesus in this day of light. The difficulty is that this sense and desire of duty are too general in their character. They do not sufficiently notice particulars,—do not centre upon specific objects of labor.

When a vast work is to be accomplished, men are too apt to fix their minds upon the grand end, without considering the details by which that end is to be gained. We look upon a beautiful statue, and admire the general appearance of the whole, without once thinking of the innumerable strokes and delicate touches of the chisel that were necessary in bringing out, and perfecting the features, drapery and limbs. So Christians look upon the conversion of the world, as a desirable and sublime event, but too frequently overlook the minute details of labor, by which it is to be procured. They do not sufficiently direct their efforts to the specific objects which are essentially to the production of the great end.

There are not a few who seem to think it selfish to exhibit a great deal of interest in any one branch of Christian benevolence, or for the prosperity of any particular church, when there is so much to be accomplished for the world at large; and in the expansiveness of their benevolence, they overlook the interests of home, and sometimes, it is to be feared, the spirituality of their own hearts.

They forget that the prosperity of each church is essential to the complete triumph of Christ's cause. Before the church universal can be holy and prosperous, all its branches must become so, for if every portion of the church, but one, were prosperous, the depression of that one would detract from the glory of the whole. A sound building can not be reared of rotten timbers. A kingdom can not be in a healthy condition while any of its provinces are in a suffering or turbulent state. A stream can not be perfectly pure or clear while any of its tributaries are polluted or muddy. So in order to the purity and efficiency of the church universal, all the branches of which it is composed must be pure and efficient.

Those specific duties, then, which are adapted to promote the prosperity and purity of the individual church of which he is a component member, are first in obligation upon every disciple of Christ. We doubt the honesty and sincerity of that man's prayers and labors for the introduction of the millennium, who does not strive by his example and influence to give a millennial character to the church with which he is connected. He posseses not a proper foreign missionary spirit who does not perform missionary work at home. The Christian, therefore, who would consistently and most effectively labor, for the universal triumph of the gospel, must engage in those minor duties of Christianity, which are necessary to bringing all within his own circle of influence to the obedience of the faith.—Baptist Record.

A FALLEN STATE.

That a creature formed for an endless duration should be disposed to turn his attention from that object, and to contract his views and prospects within a circle, which, compared to eternity, is but a mathematical point, is truly astounding; and as it is impossible to account for it from the natural constitution of the mind, it must originate in some great moral cause. It shows that some great catastrophe has befallen the species—that some deep and radical malady is inherent in the moral system. Though philosophers of a certain description may attempt to explain and justify it on an ingenious hypothesis, yet in spite of metaphysical subtleties the alarming enquiry will still return, how is it that the disposition of mankind is so much at variance with their precepts? That no train of reflection is more unwelcome than that which is connected with their eternal home? If the chance is considered as a happy one, if the final abode to which we are hastening is supposed to be an improvement on the present, why shrink back from it with aversion? If it is contemplated as a state of suffering, it is natural to inquire what is it that has invested it with so dark and sombre a character? What is it that has enveloped that species of futurities in a gloom, which pervades no other? If the indisposition to realize a life to come arises in any measure from a vague presentiment that it will bring us, so to speak, in a closer contact with the Deity, by presenting clearer manifestations of his character and perfections, (and who can doubt this is a principal cause?) the proof it affords of a great deterioration in our moral condition is complete. For who will suppose it possible that a disposition to hide himself from his Creator should be an original part of the constitution of a reasonable creature?—or what is more portentous and unnatural than for him that is formed to shun the presence of his Maker, and to place his felicity in the forgetfulness of Him in whom he lives, and moves, and has his being! If he is pained and disquieted whenever he is forcibly reminded of Him whose power sustains and whose bounty replenishes the universe with whatever is good and fair—if the source of being and of happiness is the object of terror, instead of confidence and love—it is not easy to conceive what can afford a stronger conviction of guilt, or a more certain presage of danger.—Robert Hall.

THE CLAIMS OF THE SOUL.

The soul's concern is the great concern. The interests of experimental, vital, practical religion are the great interests of our being. No language can be too strong—no language can be strong enough, to give them due expression. No anxiety too deep, no care too heedful, no effort too earnest, no prayer too importunate, to be bestowed upon this almost infinite concern of the soul's purification, piety virtue and welfare. No labor of life should be undertaken, no journey pursued, no business transacted, no pleasure enjoyed, no activity employed, no rest indulged in, without ultimate reference to that end of our being. Without it, life has no sufficient object, and death has no hope, and eternity no promise.

What more shall we say? Look at it—look at this inward being, and say—what is it? Formed by the Almighty hand, and therefore formed for some purpose; built up in its proportions, fashioned in every part by infinite skill; an emanation, breathed from the Spirit of God—say, what is it?—Its nature, its necessity, its design, its destiny,—what are they? So formed it is, so builded, so fashioned, so exactly balanced, and so exquisitely touched in every part, that sin introduced into it, is the direst misery; that every unholy thought falls upon it as a drop of poison; that every guilty desire, breathing upon every delicate part and fibre of the soul, is the plague-spot of evil, the blight of death. Made, then, is it for virtue, not for sin, oh! not for sin, for that is death; but made for virtue, for purity, as its end, its rest, its bliss; made thus by God Almighty.

Thou canst not alter it. Go, and bid the mountain walls sink down to the level of the valleys, go and stand upon the sea-shore, and turn back its swelling waves; or stretch forth thy hand, and hold the stars in their courses; but not more vain shall be thy power to change them, than it is to change one of the laws of thy nature. Then thou must be virtuous. As true it is, as if the whole universe spoke in one voice, thou must be virtuous. If thou art a sinner, "thou must be born again." If thou art tempted, thou must resist. If thou hast guilty passions, thou must deny them. If thou art a bad man, thou must be a good man.

There is the law. It is not our law; it is not our voice that speaks. It is the law of God Almighty; it is the voice of God that speaks; speaks through every nerve and fibre, through every power and element of that moral constitution which he has given. It is the voice, not of an arbitrary will, nor of some stern and impracticable law, that is now abrogated. For the grace of God that hath appeared to all men, teaches, that, denying all ungodliness and every worldly lust, they must live soberly, and righteously, and godly in this present evil world. So let us live, and then this life, with all its momentous scenes, its moving experiences, and its precious interests, shall be but the beginning of the wonders, and glories, and joys of our existence. So let us live; and let us think this, that to live thus, is the great, urgent, unutterable, all-absorbing concern of our life and of our being.—Dewey.

THEY KNOW NOT WHAT THEY DO.

These words derive impressiveness from the circumstances under which they were uttered. The Son of God was hanging on the cross; he was surrounded by an unfeeling multitude who embittered his dying moments by their profane jeers; and among these, was conspicuous a band of men who were principally active in carrying forward his execution. The sufferer does not appeal to their humanity, and ask a mitigation of his pains, nor does he pour upon them execrations for their cruel treatment; but turning his eyes to heaven, he addresses the Father of mercies, and pleads with him not to requite the murderers according to their deeds, but to have pity on their infatuation: "Father forgive them, for they know not what they do."

It is characteristic of the sinner that he knows not what he does. We do not say that his ignorance is his apology; far from it. It is rather in most instances an aggravation of his sin because it is wilful, and persisted in, despite of all the means of instruction. In some cases it is true, ignorance extenuates, as in the case of Paul, who persecuted the followers of Christ, and who thought he did God service thereby, but obtained mercy because he did it ignorantly in unbelief. Most men who sin, however, know that they are doing wrong, although they may be ignorant of the extent of the wrong. Did they know, indeed, the guilt they thereby incur, the fiercenes of that anger to which they are exposing themselves, and the extent of horrors involved in the destruction of the soul, they would start back in affright from the perpetration.

When I see a man living in the unrestrained indulgence of his vicious propensities, and gratifying the lust of the flesh, the lust of the eye, and the pride of life, without seriously reflecting on the doom pronounced on the wilful transgressor, and while I thus see him braving the anger of God, and for the sake of a temporary and imperfect gratification incurring the forfeiture of heaven, I exclaim, alas! poor sinner, he knows not what he does.

When I see the young devoted to the pursuits of vanity, relying on the world for happiness, and refusing to remember their Creator in the days of their youth, how evident is it that they know not what they do.

When I see the sanctuary of God comparatively deserted, while the places of worldly amusement are thronged, and the most sacred institutions contemned, by those who are placed under unspeakable obligation to observe them, I see clearly that such sinners know not what they do.

When I see a state or national legislature and other officers holding high public trusts, regardless of their responsibility to God, and forgetful that they are his stewards, and in accordance with this, enacting laws which are hostile to true religion and morality, and calculated to blot out from remembrance the Holy Sabbath, I think of their awful account at the bar of God, and say, they know not what they do.

When I see rational men embracing a false religion, and rejecting the truth as it is in Jesus, either from pride of intellect, or to appease without purging conscience, I see in their infatuation the same mournful evidence, that they know not what they do.

Is it credible? Can any one for a moment suppose, that sinners of the various classes would deliberately pursue their courses if they knew the certain issue? Would they turn their backs upon the Savior, close their ears to every loud threatning, and kind invitation, and cling to their besetting sins, if they certainly knew that the end of these things would be death? No, it could not be. Sinners flatter themselves, they hope against hope, they have a thousand refuges of lies to which they flee, and they hide from themselves the awful doom which awaits them. And still, unbelieving as the wicked and irreligious may be, and little as they may know the exceeding sinfulness of sin, their damnation slumbereth not, but hurries onward to meet them.—Presbyterian.

Busy Bodies.

This class of beings are reprehended by the Apostles in their epistles to the churches. Peter classes them with murderers, and liars. If we were to judge of them from their works, we could not regard them otherwise than as the pests of the societies in which they are permitted to live. We know of no possible advantage that they can be to any, unless it is to exercise the patience of those who may be better subjects of their officious meddling.

A busy body must be,

1. An ignorant person. A person of any refinement of manners, or of any knowledge of himself or human nature, can find better employment than to meddle with other men's matters. It is the lowest calling in which a person can engage, as it requires no sagacity of mind, neither exercise of discretion. A fool may be a busy body; but a person of ordinary faculties will scorn the task.

2. A busy body cannot have in exercise the feelings that characterize the Christian. The Gospel requires the believer to love his neighbor as himself. The work of the busy body is to originate and give circulation to scandal to the prejudice of others.—Nothing but extreme depravity of heart, can lead to such a course, since no one is benefited, while some may suffer. The believer by the exercise of christian charity seeks to hide the faults of others. The busy body gives vent to his evil feelings, by discovering faults where they do not exist, or magnifying them where they do. If the christian discovers a fault in another person, his first labor is, if possible, by benevolent means to heal it. If the busy body discovers a real or imaginary one, he cannot rest until it is flying upon the wings of the wind.

3. They are envious persons. One prominent characteristic of a busy body is, to envy those who by accident or otherwise may chance to be more favored than themselves. The best of every thing belongs, of right, to the envious person, at least, in his own estimation. And if he cannot, by virtuous conduct command so high a place in the esteem of men as another person, his envious heart brings into exercise the scandalous meddling of his trade, until the innocent are made to suffer. Reader, you may know the busy body by his officious meddling with other person's characters, or business, whether by impugning his motives, misrepresenting his conduct, or by whatever means he may detract from his real worth. Mark such, and have nought to do with them, for they rank, at least in the Apostle Peter's estimation, with murderers, liars, &c.

Look out for your Horses!

Within a few weeks past an extensive business of horse-stealing has been carried on in the southern part of Onondaga county, and parts adjacent. On the night of the 17th, a horse was taken from B. Gardner of this town, and a span from the pasture of Capt. Joel King, of Pompey, belonging to Paul King, of Delaware co. About 20 horses have been stolen from that vicinity within a few weeks.

"Campbell's Treatise on Painting."

The publisher, R. R Lewis, has left us a few specimens of the above work. We were ever confident that the work would be of material benefit to that class of Artists for whom it was intended; and our only regret is, that the publisher suffered the "Treatise" to be so miserably bound; the binding having been done solely by himself, without the least shadow of experience in the business. We deprecate this, inasmuch as it may prove a serious barrier to a ready sale of the edition issued, and, perhaps, in some instances, bring discredit upon this office where the printing was done; very many people not knowing the difference between a bad "register" in printing, and bad "folding" in binding.

THE OLIVE PLANT AND LADIES' TEMPERANCE ADVOCATE hails us from New York. It is a neat quarto of 8 pages. It has the following just sentiments for its motto:—

"Alcohol, the foe of humanity, is the demon curse of the domestic sphere, the murderer of countless thousands of wives and mothers—that which has robbed woman of her beauty, her comforts, her rights, her health, her home, her reason, her life. The tears woman has shed, would form a river; the groans she has uttered, collected and concentrated, would be louder than the earthquake's terrific sound; and if funeral obsequies were to be in proportion to the ruin and wo produced, the whole heavens would be clad in sackcloth, and the earth, as in Egypt in the reign of Pharaoh, should have her days of mourning and darkness."

We most gladly welcome the "Olive Plant," and hail it as a harbinger of good to the class for whom it is designed. What can be more fitting than this—a Ladies' Temperance Advocate? The cause of Temperance must, and will prosper when it comes into the hands of the Ladies. It is plain that females are the greatest earthly sufferers from intemperance, but we trust but few, if any of them, will share a drunkard's HELL in the eternal world. Let them, now, rally around the standard, and exert their irresistible influence, and save themselves from the curse of drunken companions and relatives. Let them blend their influence to drive the monster intemperance from the domestic circle, and from every community where woman lives and has influence.

We wish the enterprize all success, and trust it will do much toward advancing the Temperance reform. Ladies, take the "Olive Plant." One dollar, sent post paid to the "Olive Plant," New York, will secure a copy for a year.

DROWNED.—A son of David Wood, aged 18, of this town, was drowned on Sunday of this week while bathing in a pond, 2 1-2 miles from this village.

ERRATA.—SPECTATOR wishes us to correct a mistake which occurred in his letter published some weeks since. In the last paragraph, in the emphatic clause, for such a course, read "such a cause." Also, the same, in the same paragraph, a few lines above.

REVIVAL.—We are informed that there is an interesting state of feeling in the 3rd S. D. B. Church in Brookfield, and that some have been baptized.

Some men will believe nothing but what they can comprehend; and there are but few things that such are able to comprehend. St. Evermond.

THE TRINITY.—NO III.

CONCLUSION OF THE ARGUMENT FOR THE DEITY OF JESUS CHRIST.

In addition to Christ's own assertions concerning himself, his Deity is sustained by the following arguments:

I. He accepted of Divine worship.

St. John xx. 28. And Thomas answered and said unto him, My Lord and my GOD.

This was not a mere expression of surprise, without any definite meaning, for Jesus immediately commended Thomas for his belief—"thou hast believed."

II. The Srciptures require us to pay Divine worship to Christ.

St. John v. 23. That all men should honor the Son, even as they honor the Father. Heb. i. 6. When he bringeth his first begotten into the world, he saith, And let all the angels of God worship him.

III. Omniscience is ascribed to Christ.

St. John xxi. 17. Lord, thou knowest all things. Matt. xii. 25. Jesus knew their thoughts. St. John ii. 24, 25. But Jesus did not commit himself unto them, because he knew all men, And needed not that any should testify of man: for he knew what was in man.

IV. Creative Power is ascribed to Christ.

St. John i. 3. All things were made by him, and without him was not any thing made that was made.

Where the Scriptures teach that God created all by Jesus Christ, there is no intimation of delegated Omnipotence, (!) but the simple idea is, that the DIVINE BEING in the person of JESUS CHRIST performed the work of Creation.

V. The Deity of Christ is sustained by comparing some passages in the New Testament with some in the Old.

Ps. xlv. 6. Thy throne, O GOD, is forever and ever. Heb. i. 8, proves that this was said "unto the Son."

Isaiah vi. 3, &c. And one cried unto another, and said, Holy, holy, holy is the Lord of hosts; the whole earth is full of his glory. Then said I, Woe is me! for I am undone, because I am a man of unclean lips, and I dwell in the midst of a people of unclean lips; for mine eyes have seen the King, the LORD of hosts"—(JEHOVAH of hosts.)

In the 40th verse of the 12th chapter of St. John, the judicial blindness which Isaiah predicts, (in Isa. 6th.) should come upon the Jews, is mentioned, and it is added in verse 41—"These things said Esaias when he saw his glory and spake of him." And verse 42—"Nevertheless among the chief rulers also many believed on him; but because of the Pharisees they did not confess him, lest they should be put out of the synagogue." That Jesus Christ was the Being whom Isaiah saw and of whose glory he spake, as recorded in Isa. 6th chapter, is too plain to be controverted: and this same Jesus was "JEHOVAH of hosts."

VI. Several other passages plainly teach the Deity of Christ.

Among them are, Isaiah ix. 6. For unto us a child is born, unto us a Son is given, and the government shall be upon his shoulder; and his name shall be called Wonderful, Counsellor, THE MIGHTY GOD, The Everlasting Father, the Prince of Peace.

Matt. i. 23. And they shall call his name EMMANUEL, which, being interpreted, is, GOD with us. St. John i. 1. In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God.

1 John v. 20. And we know that the Son of God is come, and hath given us an understanding, that we may know him that is true; and we are in him that is true, even in in his Son JESUS CHRIST. THIS IS THE TRUE GOD, and eternal life.

These evidences of Christ's Deity shew us on what a firm foundation the Theology of that sincere Oneida Indian rested—one who was familiarly called "GOOD PETER."

While Mr. Kirkland (father of the late Rev. J. T. Kirkland, President of the Harvard University,) was a Missionary to the Oneidas, being unwell, he was unable to preach on a certain Sabbath, and told Good Peter, one of the heads of the Oneidas, that he must address the congregation. He modestly, but reluctantly assented. After a few words of introduction, he began a discourse on the character of the Savior. "What, my brethren," said he, "are the views which you form of the character of Jesus? You will answer, perhaps, that he was a man of singular benevolence. You will tell me that he proved this to be his character by the nature of the miracles which he wrought. All these, you say, were kind in the extreme. He created bread for thousands who were ready to perish. He raised to life the son of a poor woman who was a widow, and to whom his labors were necessary for support in old age. Are these then your only views of the Savior? I tell you they are lame. When Jesus came into our world he threw his blanket around him, but the GOD WAS WITHIN." (President Dwight's Travels.)

May the Lord deliver me from the disbelief of those who reject the Deity of Christ, and may he grant me the honest, ardent, and Bible faith of "Good Peter."

"JESUS, my GOD, I know his name,
His name is all my trust;
He will not put my soul to shame,
Nor let my hope be lost."

FOREIGN NEWS.

From the New-York Tribune—Extra.

SUNDAY MORNING, July 1841.

IMPORTANT FROM EUROPE.

ARRIVAL OF THE CALEDONIA.

The steamship Caledonia, Capt. McLeller, which left Liverpool on Sunday the 4th inst. reached Halifax on the 15th and Boston at 1 o'clock on Saturday, the 17th, or in less than thirteen days, including her stoppage at Halifax. This is a very quick passage. The Caledonia brings 71 passengers, among whom is Mr. Jaudon, London Agent of the U. S. Bank.

The intelligence is of decided importance. The British Parliament was dissolved by the Queen on the 22d ult. and the immediate election of a new House of Commons ordered. The election was proceeding when the Caledonia left, attended by intense excitement and the most deplorable riots.

The Great Western had not arrived out on the 3d—16 days after she had left this port.

There is no longer a hope for the President.

The Acadia arrived out on the 29th ult.

The President's Message reached England on the 23d in the South America. It excited no interest.

There is a rumor of an intended marriage between the brother of Prince Albert and Clementine, only daughter of Louis Philippe.

The London banking house of Whitmore, Wells & Whitmore has failed.

There have been serious riots in Liverpool, Carlisle, Blackburn, Manchester, Edinburgh, Nottingham, Cambridge, Kensington, and the Tower Hamlets, and several persons stabbed, and some died of excitement.

There is a late overland Mail from China and India, but it brings little of interest.—The British are sending out more forces to China, both from England and India, and the difficulties seem far enough from conclusion. The Chinese do not think of yielding.

The British Ministry have shifted places considerably, but this is of little moment in view of their 'last shift,' which appears to be so surely at hand.

The Commercial news is of interest.—American Cotton had advanced 1-2d. per lb. on our late rates, equal to $1,00 per bale. The market promises further improvement.

There is a little change in Grain. The prospect for the growing crop is very good.

Money is in demand caused by the heavy loans negotiating by the great Continental Powers to pay the expenses of their War last year. The current rate of interest on best paper is 5 per cent. The French Government have reduced their advertised loan of 450,000,000 francs to half that amount, or about $42,000,000. The bullion in the Bank of England has decreased $550,000.

Joseph Hume, M. P., the great economist, has been defeated in a canvass for Leeds.

DISSOLUTION OF PARLIAMENT.

The 22d of June being appointed for the prorogation of Parliament by her Majesty in person, a very large number of persons assembled in the Park, and along Whitehall to the Horse Guards, down Parliament street, to the Peers' entrance of the House of Lords.

At half-past one o'clock the royal procession left Buckinham Palace in the usual state, the Queen being accompanied by his Royal Highness, Prince Albert and the different officers of the household. Her Majesty and the Prince were much cheered as they passed along, and on the arrival at the House of Lords, a royal salute of 21 guns was fired.

On her entrance, her Majesty was received by the Lord Chancellor, Lord Melbourne, and the other great officers of State.

Having robed, the Queen entered the House of Lords, the body of which, as well as the strangers' gallery, was chiefly occupied by ladies in full dress. The Queen then commanded their Lordships to be seated, and the Usher of the Black Rod despatched to the House of Commons to command their attendance at the bar.

The Commons, with the Speaker at their head, having appeared at the bar, the right hon. gentleman proceeded to address her Majesty on the results of the session, and concluded by praying her Majesty's assent to the Appropriation bill.

The ceremony of giving the Royal Assent to the Appropriation bill and several other bills was then gone through, and her Majesty proceeded to read, in a clear and firm voice, the following speech from the Throne:

Her Majesty's Speech.

"My Lords and Gentlemen,

"On a full consideration of the present state of affairs, I have come to the determination of proroguing Parliament, with a view to its immediate dissolution.

"The paramount importance of the trade and industry of the country, and my anxiety that the exigencies of the public service should be provided for in the manner least burthensome to the community, have induced me to resort to the means which the Constitution has entrusted to me of ascertaing the sense of my people upon matters which so deeply concern their welfare.

"I entertain the hope that the progress of public business may be facilitated, and that divisions injurious to the course of steady policy and useful legislation may be removed by the authority of a new Parliament, which I shall direct to be summoned without delay.

"Gentlemen of the House of Commons—

"I thank you for the readiness with which you have voted the sums necessary for the Civil and Military Establishments.

"My Lords and Gentlemen—

"In the exercise of my prerogative, I can have no other object than that of securing the rights and promoting the interests of my subjects; and I rely on the co-operation of my Parliament, and the loyal zeal of my People, for support in the adoption of such measures as are necessary to maintain that high station among the nations of the world, which it has pleased Divine Providence to assign to this country."

WASHINGTON CORRESPONDENCE.

Washington, Wednesday, July 7, 1841.

In Senate, memorials were presented today, by Mr. Wright, of citizens of Schenectady against a National Bank, and by Mr. Buchanan of citizens of Pennsylvania, for a Bankrupt Law.

The resolution of Mr. Buchanan calling for information relative to removals from office since the 4th of March, was debated by Mr. Linn during the morning hour, in general condemnation of the course pursued by the present Administration.

The Fiscal Bank bill was then taken up, and Mr. Buchanan spoke for two hours, in a powerful and argumentative speech, in opposition to the bill in toto, and in reply to the arguments of Mr. Clay, and the report of the Committee accompanying the bill. Mr. Buchanan is possessed of most commanding talent, and argues in a clear and almost unanswerable manner. He ended by moving to strike out, as the location of the Bank, "the District of Columbia," not supplying any place, but leaving it to be filled by the Senate.

This was supported by Messrs Wright and Benton, and opposed by Mr. Walker, on the ground of his belief that if the place of location was changed, it would be established at New York, where it would be under the control of stock-jobbers of this country and those of England, and it would in fact be a British Bank, located in New York. He opposed the addition of this tremendous power to the already absorbing power of New York and its money oligarchies of Wall-street.

Mr. Wright had no desire for the establishment of this blessing in New York; it had been proved to be to Philadelphia one of the most serious misfortunes.

Messrs. Clay, of Ala., Woodbury and Calhoun advocated the amendment, with a view, if it were adopted, to insert New Orleans.

Mr. Allen vehemently advocated the striking out of Washington, and would not vote to fill it all, as he would not be guilty of entailing by his vote, such a curse upon any portion of the country.

The amendment was rejected, by Yeas 20, Nays 29.

Mr. Calhoun then moved an amendment to strike out the District of [illegible] insert New Orleans. This w[illegible] by Messrs. Benton, Walker [illegible] and Buchanan, and oppos[illegible] pan; after which it was [illegible] 16, Nays 29.

The Senate adjourned [illegible] four.

In the House, Mr. [illegible] of the Committee of Ways [illegible] ported a bill for the [illegible] Country, which was refer[illegible] mittee of the Whole on [illegible] Union.

Mr. Wise, Chairman of [illegible] on Naval Affairs, reported a [illegible] provisions for the naval ordi[illegible] was referred to the Committe[illegible] Whole.

Mr. King from the same committee, reported a bill making provisions for the Home Squadron, which was referred to the same Committee, and two thousand extra copies of the bill and report ordered to be printed.

A resolution reported by Mr. Williams, of Ct., was, after some debate, adopted, authorising the purchase of a set of maps for the purpose of estimating the mileage of the members.

The resolution of Mr. Warren, of which notice was given yesterday, was adopted, limiting speeches in the Committee of the Whole to one hour!

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, (Mr. Briggs in the Chair,) and took up the bill making provision for the support of the lunatics of the District of Columbia, which, after some debate, was adopted in Committee.

The Loan bill was taken up, and in a concise and powerful manner advocated by Mr. Fillmore. Mr Gordon opposed it.—The Committee then rose, and the House adjourned.

The resolution of Mr. Warren, adopted to-day, will have the very beneficial effect of cutting off the long speeches, and greatly tend to facilitate business. The vote was 108 to 39.

Thursday July 8.

In the Senate, to-day, Mr. Linn, continued his remarks during the morning hour, on the resolution relative to removals from office.

The Fiscal Bank bill was then taken up, and various amendments were offered which gave rise to incidental debate. The opponents of the Administration are now offering their amendments, those of the other side having been gone through, as it is understood.

Mr. Walker offered an amendment requiring the whole affairs of the Bank to be published annually, and laid before Congress.

Mr. King proposed to the gentleman to modify the amendment so as to require the affairs of the Bank to be published weekly, every fortnight, or monthly, in a daily paper where the Bank was located.

Mr. Clay, of Kentucky, objected to the amendment, and contended that a due degree of publicity was provided by the bill, that the concerns of the bank were liable to the investigation of the Secretary of the Treasury, of a Committee of Congress, of a Committee of Stockholders, and every Director, and opposed as unnecessary the expense and trouble of having printed, yearly, the whole business affairs of the bank, which would fill twenty or more large volumes.

Messrs. Benton and Woodbury advocated the amendment, expatiating on the necessity of publicity in the Bank affairs.

The amendment was rejected: Yeas 23, Nays 25.

Mr. Walker offered an amendment, authorizing any ten stockholders to investigate the concerns of the Bank at any time.

This after a few remarks by Mr. Buchanan advocating it, was adopted: Yeas 24, Nays 23.

An amendment offered by Mr. Walker, and briefly discussed and amended by Messrs. Clay, of Ky., Simmons, Bayard, Berrien and Woodbury, was adopted, providing that in every case of loan or discount granted, when one of the Directors dissents, the vote shall be taken by Ayes and Noes, and entered on the books of the Bank, open to inspection with other records.

An amendment of Mr. Benton providing that Government directors shall have free and full participation in all the transactions of the Bank, after some discussion, in which it was contended that it was unnecessary, the bill itself containing this provision, was adopted: Yeas 25, Nays 22.

Several other amendments were offered, debated, and most of them rejected: a number of which were offered by Mr. Benton, who professed the desire of getting along with them as rapidly as possible, as he had many more to offer.

In the House, the bill to extend the [illegible] of the port of New Orleans, so as to include the city of Lafayette, was read a third time and passed.

The resolution of Mr. Floyd offered some days since, calling for information relative to the McLeod case, was taken up.

Mr. Hunt spoke at some length in an able and eloquent survey of the case, and in defense of Mr. Webster. Under the present form of the resolution, and the exposition of it given by its friends, he could not vote for it, as censuring the conduct of the Secretary of State. He warned gentlemen that although this was a question on which their eloquence and oratory might be displayed, if by injudicious action we were involved in war, it would not be a war of words.

The resolution was laid over, and the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union (Mr. Briggs in the Chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill authorizing the [illegible]

Mr. Pickens opposed the bill as creating a National Debt, and as unnecessary, attempting to show that there would not, at the end of the year, be a deficit in the Treasury, the estimates of the Secretary [illegible] of the expenditures being [illegible] receipts too low. He was [illegible] marks and compelled to [illegible] the expiration of the hour, [illegible] of yesterday. This [illegible] and he took his seat [illegible] and uncons[illegible]

[illegible] supported by Messrs [illegible] and opposed by [illegible]

Friday, July 9.

[illegible] presentation by Mr. [illegible] for a General Bank[illegible] morning business, the [illegible] the Fiscal Bank of the [illegible] was taken up.

[illegible] of Ohio, moved to amend the [illegible] to provide "that the Board of Directors of the Mother Bank shall publish in [illegible] paper at the seat of Government each order which may be issued to any office or branch, directing it to expand or contract its loans and discounts, or any other order, immediately after its issue, and shall report to the Secretary of the Treasury all such orders, to be reported to Congress at the commencement of each Session.

This amendment was warmly supported by Messrs Allen, Wright, Walker, Linn, Calhoun, Nicholson, and Benton, but negatived: Yeas 23, Nays 26.

Mr. Walker then moved to amend the bill by excluding the directors or officers of the Bank or branches, or Members of Congress, from obtaining any loans or discounts.

This amendment was supported by Messrs. Woodbury, Walker, and King. Mr. Clay, of Ky., opposed it.

Mr. Henderson, of Miss., offered to vote for a limitation, but not for the exclusion of all loans to Directors of the Branches. The amendment was so modified as to limit the indebtedness of any Branch Director, as borrower or endorser, to $10,000; and in this shape the restriction was agreed to: Yeas 25, Nays 21. The question now recurred on forbidding all loans to Members of Congress, which likewise prevailed: Yeas 23, Nays 22. The Senate then adjourned.

The McLeod case was next taken up, and Mr. Hunt, of N. Y., spoke ten minutes, being the remainder of his hour.

Mr. A. V. Brown, of Tenn., next obtained the floor, and spoke three-fourths of an hour in violent condemnation of the course of Mr. Webster in this matter. Here the morning hour expired, leaving Mr. A. V.

Brown entitled to speak fifteen minutes the next morning. The House passed to the orders of the day.

Mr. Fillmore moved that at 2 o'clock tomorrow, the House do take the Loan Bill out of the Committee of the Whole. Messrs. Proffit and Sergeant thought that too soon, as the Opposition had spoken less than their share upon it. Mr. Fillmore consented to say "Monday, at 2 o'clock," on which the Previous Question was called, and the resolution passed: Yeas 97, Nays 79.

The House now went into Committee on the Loan Bill, and Mr. Saltonstall, of Mass., spoke cogently in support of it. He first showed that the late Administration left a large amount of debt on going out of power—part of it in Treasury Notes, and part unascertained, floating, unliquidated, to meet which there was only $673,000 in the Treasury, and that scattered all over the Union, in the hands of Collectors and Receivers, in sums from $20 and upwards.

Mr. Wise, of Va., made a few remarks, avowing himself hostile to the bill and to the Distribution, as leading to a Protective Tariff. He was opposed to the whole string.

Mr. Watterson, of Tenn., thought he should not consume all his hour. [Mr. Wise said if he run out, he might take the balance of his.] Mr. Watterson resumed, and made a fiery speech against Whiggery in general, with little reference to the bill. He was followed by Mr. Cushing, of Mass., in defence of the bill, and he, by Mr. Eastman in opposition, contending that there would be a balance in the Treasury next January. Mr. McKeon of this city followed on the same side, condemning the Land Distribution, inveighing against the British Money Power, and insisting that the Government should retrench Expenditures, especially the cost of our Foreign Missions. Mr. Barnard of N. Y. replied to him, (each speech occupying about the hour,) and then the House adjourned.

Saturday, July 10.

In the Senate, Mr. Linn continued his remarks on the resolution relative to removals from office, in the general field of discussion heretofore pursued by him, in opposition to the course of the present Administration. He did not conclude, and when he will, no conjecture can be formed, as the question seems reserved merely as a ground for making speeches for political effect, by circulation.

Various memorials were presented, chiefly praying for a Bankrupt Law.

The Fiscal Bank Bill was taken up, and Mr. Woodbury offered an amendment prohibiting donations from the Bank to any officer. This was debated at length by Messrs. Woodbury, Walker, Benton and others, and being amended on motion of Mr. Clay, of Ky., extending the restriction so as to prohibit donations not only to officers and Directors but to any one, was passed.

Mr. Wright offered an amendment striking out that clause of the bill, which gives Congress the power of hereafter increasing the capital in the amount of twenty millions of dollars. Mr. Wright briefly advocated this. Mr. Clay opposed it, contending that as by the provisions of this bill, Congress was bound not to establish another Bank during the existence of this, it should not be deprived of the power of increasing the capital of this, which would only be exercised when required by the wants of the country, and in as wise a manner as by the present Congress. The amendment was rejected: Yeas 22, Nays 26.

A motion was then made to go into Executive Session, but before this was put, Mr. Clay made an inquiry which he left to the courtesy of the other side of the House to answer, whether they had offered the amendments they intended, with the exception of the Senator's printed, (Mr. Wright's) amendments. Mr. Wright replied he intended offering some others, but few however. The motion was carried, and the Senate went into Executive Session.

Thus it appears that amendments are yet coming, and that the bill will be detained probably many days.

In the House, the morning hour was occupied on the resolution relative to the McLeod case, which was discussed by Mr. Brown of Tenn., (in continuation from yesterday,) condemning the course of Mr. Webster, insisting that McLeod was personally responsible.

Mr. Linn, in a happy manner, replied, defending the course of Mr. Webster, and exhibiting the impropriety of disturbing pending negotiations, between the two Governments, and forestalling public opinion by declaring the present attitude of the case. The resolution lies over.

The Loan Bill was then taken up, and opposed by Messrs. McKay, Hunter, Holmes, Van Buren, Gilmer, and Walker. Mr. Underwood made a few brief remarks in reply to the nullification threats of Mr. Pickens and Rhett, and showing them as mere empty sounds.

Mr. Hunter, the former Speaker, who has been on all sides of every question, came out to-day and exhibited his colors, in opposition to the Loan Bill, to the Distribution Bill, a Tariff of any kind, and a National Bank. Where he next will be found is a matter of doubt.

Monday, July 12.

In the Senate to-day, Mr. Tallmadge presented a memorial of citizens of New York for a Bankrupt Law. He took occasion in a brief and powerful manner to express his conviction of the interest and importance of this subject to the citizens of the entire Union, and of the necessity of action on it by Congress at the present Session. He referred to a declaration that had been made, that the bill would not pass at this Session, from the opposition of Mr. Clay, and his belief of the untruth of this, and that the distinguished Senator, as ever, was ready to comply with the wishes of the people in this bill as soon as it could be reached.

Messrs. Walker, Linn, and Morehead briefly gave their views in favor of such a bill.

Other petitions of this character were presented; and also a petition by Mr. Tappan, from citizens of Ohio against the establishment of a National Bank, a Protective Tariff, the Distribution of the Proceeds of the Public Lands, and the Assumption of the State Debts.

Mr. Smith, of Ind., from the Committee on Public Lands, reported the Distribution Bill from the House, with amendments.

The special order, the Fiscal Bank bill, was then taken up.

Mr. Wright offered an amendment, striking out the clause providing for the purchase by the Government of one-third of the capital. He briefly advocated it, on the ground of an entire divorce of Government with moneyed institutions, and on the ground of financial policy.

Mr. Clay replied, showing that the Senator had entirely overlooked the design of this institution, which was to regulate the currency: and it was effective in its operations, preserving the government from the losses sustained by the Swartouts and Prices under the Sub-Treasury.

It was farther debated by Messrs. Clay, Wright, and Calhoun at some length. In the course of the debate, Mr. Clay, in reference to the time already consumed in this bill, declared his willingness to support a proposition which should place the business of the session in the hands of the majority. The people demanded "action," "action," and he was for complying with their request.

Mr. Calhoun said the cry for relief arose from those who were interested in State Stocks, and were wishing another expansion of the currency to relieve them—that the cry for "action" was nothing but a cry for "plunder," "plunder." To the sturdy yeomanry and the business portion of the community, who are now looking anxiously to the measures of reform of this Extra Session, we will refer this sentiment for decision. The amendment was rejected by Yeas 22, Nays 27.

Mr. Wright offered an amendment prohibiting the Secretary of the Treasury to subscribe for the United States the one-third of the twenty millions to be subscribed by private individuals, and providing that the Bank shall not do business till this whole amount is taken up by individuals, and corporations, and briefly advocated it. Mr. Clay, of Ky., opposed this with his usually profound and clear reasoning, and in his remarks touched on the unconstitutionality of a repeal of this charter before the period of its limitation. To this Mr. Buchanan replied in a spirited manner, contending that it was in the power of Congress to repeal the charters of Public Institutions at any time. Mr. Clay rejoined, and Mr. Buchanan again replied, in an interesting manner, showing the gigantic abilities of both, and the tremendous power of the arguments of which both are possessed. The amendment was rejected. Yeas 21, Nays 28.

Mr. Clay, of Alabama, offered an amendment, providing that the President appoint those directors to which the individual stock which may be taken by Government, is entitled—which was rejected: Yeas 17, Nays 37.

Other slight verbal amendments were offered.

The House immediately resolved itself in a Committee of the Whole, (Mr. Briggs in the chair,) and took up the Loan Bill.

It was oppesed by Messrs. J. W. Jones and Atherton, and advocated by Messrs. G. Davis, of Ky., Dawson and Fillmore. The hour of two having arrived, the debate ceased under a resolution of Friday, and the Committee proceeded to vote on amendments. It was passed in Committee; and in the House Mr. Morgan moved the Previous Question, which was sustained—Yeas 126, Nays 88.

The amendments having been agreed to, the bill was then passed: Yeas 127, Nays 91. As amended, the bill provides a loan of twelve millions of dollars, at six per cent interest, redeemable in not less than three nor more than eight years.

The hour-law for speeches, and the resolutions to take out of Committee at special times, works well and greatly facilitates action on measures of relief and reform, so anxiously awaited by the people, who will not fail to reprobate Mr. Calhoun's sentiments, before noticed.

Tuesday, July 13.

In the Senate, Mr. Linn occupied the morning hour in continuation of his remarks on the resolution relative to removals from office.

The Senate then took up the Fiscal Bank Bill; and Mr. Wright offered an amendment, providing that in case of a general suspension of specie payments by the Bank, or any of its Branches, the charter shall be forfeited. This was debated during the entire day, and with one exception by Loco Focos, among whom were Messrs. Wright, Benton, Clay, of Ala., Walker and Woodbury, who advocated it.

Mr. Berrien opposed it, contending that the provisions proposed by the bill sufficiently guarded this point, and entering into a constitutional argument, that the corporation being of a private character, was not liable to repeal. The amendment was rejected. Yeas 22, Nays 25.

In the House, the McLeod resolution was debated during the morning hour by Mr. Bowne, of N. Y., in a flaming manner in its support.

The bill making an additional appropriation of three thousand dollars for the lunatics of the District of Columbia, was passed.

The Speaker laid before the House a Communication from the War Department relative to additional appropriations for defense, which were laid on the table and ordered printed.

Also, from the Treasury Department, a report from Mr. Hassler, of his completion of the one-ounce weight.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. Adams in the Chair, and took up the bill making appropriations for Navy Pensions. This was discussed by Mr. Wise and others.

The Santa Fe expedition started on the 15th ult. It consisted of three hundred men. The Civilian says the march is not on a direct line, but comprises a campaign against the Indians—the course being first to the head waters of the Brazos, and thence across to the head waters of the Trinity, for the purpose of scouring the country about and between these points.

Andrew Jackson Davis shot himself accidentally, and died instantly at Austin, on the 12th, while endeavoring to explain some military manœuvre to a portion of the members of the Santa Fe expedition, to which he was attached.

Wyoming County.—The Commissioners appointed to locate the site of the County buildings for the new county of Wyoming, have decided in favor of Warsaw.—Alb. Eve. Jour.

Decision in the Case of McLeod.—The Prisoner not discharged.—The decision of the Supreme Court of this State, sitting at Utica, in the case of Alexander McLeod, indicted for the murder of Amos Durfee, at Schlosser, in this State, in connection with the burning of the Caroline was pronounced on Monday, the 12th inst. The prisoner had applied for a discharge,—first, on the ground that he did not participate in the alledged offence, and was not present at its commission; and secondly, that if present and acting, it was in the necessary defence and protection of his country against a treasonable insurrection, of which Durfee was acting in aid at the time.

The Court, through Judge Cowen, decided against the application. The effect of this decision will be, to cause the prisoner to be tried on an indictment, by a Jury, unless the case in its present form should be appealed to the Court of Errors, [the State Senate,] as we have understood it would be, in the event of a decision like the present by the Supreme Court of New-York; and, should the Court of Errors affirm the present decision, that then the case would be carried to the Supreme Court of the United States.

The Court did not consider it their province, under the present application, to examine the question of the prisoners guilt or innocence, beyond the depositions or proofs upon which he was committed. "The depositions heretofore taken in the cause being cut off, there are no means of inquiry left to us on this motion, by which we can say whether the charge would probably be mitigated on the trial to a very doubtful case of manslaughter, or to a homicide in defence, or whether all participation might be disproved by showing a clear alibi."

There are still two Courts to review the decision, should the prisoner so elect, and if either of them reverse it, the case will not go to a Jury. If, however, it should finally go to a Jury, there is good reason to expect an acquittal; as it seems now to be universally understood that McLeod did not accompany the expedition which destroyed the Caroline.

The Albany Daily Advertiser says,—"We learn from Mr. Hillyer, of the New-Nork Deputy Sheriffs, who arrived from Utica this morning, that McLeod remains for the present with the Sheriff of Oneida county. What further course of proceedings will be taken is not yet determined.—McLeod, we learn, is anxious to go to a jury forthwith; should he determine upon this course, the application for a writ of error on the judgment of the Supreme Court, as intended by his counsel, will, of course, be abandoned."—Jour. of Com.

Incendiarism on the Frontier.—The last affair of this sort took place on the night of the 28th ult. The building destroyed was a barn belonging to Mr. Holt, about four miles from Missisquoi Bay: the store and other buildings adjoining belonging to Messrs. Holt & Crossett, were with great difficulty saved from the devouring element. It will be recollected that the Philipsburg affair has been charged under oath upon certain commissioned officers in Her Majesty's service. The Montreal Times attribes this last outrage also to wretches on the Canada side of the line, and throws the responsibility of the consequences on the authorities of the Provinces.—Alb. Argus.

Wyandott Indians.—We learn from good authority that Col. Johnson has succeeded in treating with the Wyandotts for the purchase of their ultimate removal west of the Mississippi. The tribe, consisting of about seven hundred souls, is the last remnant of the Indian race within the borders of our State. If our recollection serves us, the Wyandotts originally claimed to be the owners of the soil from the Lakes to the Ohio, and from Pittsburg to the Great Miami River. They were familiarly known as the grandfathers of the Western tribes. The first to possess, they are the last to leave. Those beautiful hunting grounds of their fathers, where a century ago a white man had never trodden, are now, entirely occupied by a different race, numbering more than two millions of souls.—Cincinnati Republican.

President Harrison's Remains.—The Committee and detachment of U. States Marines, arrived at our wharf with the remains of the late President, about three o'clock on the morning of the 5th inst. About 9. the body was conveyed to the residence of Col. W. H. Taylor, followed by the committee and a number of the old and intimate friends of the deceased. Although a couple of military companies were on the wharf when the body was brought ashore, and notwithstanding that many of our citizens had likewise gone down, there was neither bustle, nor show, nor parade of any kind, but instead of these, the countenance of every one, as he silently followed the hearse, bore an impress of the deep sorrow that had been reawakened within.—Cin. Gaz.

On the 7th inst. the citizens tendered their last honors to the earthly remains of their late friend and fellow-citizen, William Henry Harrison. The hearse which bore the body from the residence of Colonel Taylor to the steamboat that conveyed it to North Bend, was preceded by the company of Dragoons, and the several military companies which arrived from the Louisville Encampment in time to join in the procession, and followed by relatives and personal friends of the deceased, by the Committee which had brought it from Washington, the Committee of Forty which had been appointed to make arrangements for the Obsequies, the City Council, Officers and Soldiers of the Late War, Judges and officers of the Superior and Common Pleas Courts, members of the Bar, Old Fellows, Firemen, other Associations, and large numbers of citizens in an individual capacity.

The procession moved to solemn music, from the residence of Col. Taylor to the steamboat Raritan, which lay at the foot of Main; and the pavements and doors and windows of houses, for the whole of this distance, were crowded with persons, numbering doubtless from 18,000 to 20,000, who had assembled to have a last look, as it passed, of the coffin which inclosed the body of the venerated dead.

The boat left the wharf for the Bend about 1 o'clock, bearing with the remains the Committee, and detachment of United States Marines, and relatives of the deceased. By special invitation, the Rev. John T. Brooke went down to perform the funeral service of the Church of England at the tomb.

It is much to be regretted, that all the Companies which formed the Oakland Encampment, did not reach the city in time to join in the procession. The Louisville, Buttler, Harrison, and Citizens' Guards, and the Dayton Artillery, left soon after the others, but on a boat which ran much slower than the Mail, and did not arrive here till just as the Raritan was putting off with the remains.

Tornado at Detroit.—On the 6th instant, Detroit was visited by a tornado of wind and rain which inundated all the streets, drains and cellars—swept down awnings and awning posts—stove in doors and windows—tumbled over chimneys and sycamores—scattered oil casks, dry goods, boxes, and brooms—crushed corn stalks and peas—riddled roses and frightened children—and shook every house in town to the foundation—so powerfully did it dash ahead.

"Why don't you come after cold vituals as usual?" said a lady to a boy who had for a long time been a daily visitor for that species of charity. "Father has joined the Temperance Society, and we have warm victuals," was the reply.

The Springfield (Illinois,) Journal publishes a wholesome warning in advertising A. D. Young, a young man of 25 or 30, who, it appears by the statement, has within a few years been married to no less than three respectable girls in the West, and been engaged to two others—all now living. The fellow is abroad through the country in some new disguise.

Butter and cheese is produced in the Empire State to the value of $10,497,032 annually. Oneida county alone produces $847,391 worth of butter. Herkimer county $676,351, and Dutchess, $713,834.

A society of Reformed Inebriates has been organized at Montreal. At the close of the second meeting, 22 individuals gave in their names for the Montreal Society, and eight for the society of Reformed Drunkards.

The bill reported from the Naval Committee of the House of Representatives, for the support of a Home Squadron of ships of war, proposes to provide, for that purpose, for the pay, subsistence, repairs, &c, of two frigates, two sloops, two small vessels, and two armed steamers, "to be employed as a Home Squadron."

Hail Storm.—Some severe hail storms have lately occurred in various parts of the western country. One passed over four or five counties in Kentucky, whose track was from four to five miles in width. The next day, the 25th ult., another passed over Rush county, Ia., doing great damage to the crops. The Rushville Whig says so much hail fell that the wheat and rye crops were in many places entirely destroyed; the corn was also thrown down and greatly injured. The hail fell in such quantities as to lie in drifts without melting for nearly two days. The accompanying wind did also great damage to timber.—Journal of Com.

A Life Bridge.—A valuable invention has recently been exhibited in this city, by Dr. Beman, the object of which is the more effectual extinguishment of fires and to save persons from burning buildings. It consists of a square box or carriage body, mounted on a moveable platform a few feet below with which it is connected by a stout framework. Whenever a building is on fire, the machine is conveyed to and set down before it, two or three firemen instantly get into the box, through the bottom of which one or more hose-pipes are passed. By turning a crank they are immediately raised to the level of the fire or nearest window—whether twenty, forty, or sixty feet—and torrents of water forced exactly upon the flames. If lives are endangered, one side of the box is let down as a drawn-bridge directly to the nearest window, and the inmates of the burning building at once removed into the ark of safety. So of valuable property. Meantime the work of extinguishing the conflagration goes forward efficiently.—Tribune.

Captured Slavers.—The bark Harvest, which arrived at Fairhaven, on the 4th inst. reports that eleven slavers have recently been captured by H. B. M. cruisers, and carried into St. Helena, from July 1st, 1840, to April 3d, 1841. By these captures, fourteen hundred and seventy-six human beings were rescued from hopeless slavery, and will be restored to their country and liberty, while their inhuman stealers will meet the punishment due to piracy, according to the laws of Great Britain.

Horrible Proceedings.—A most violent and outrageous proceeding has lately occurred at Bellvidere, Ill. The facts of the case are briefly these: the country in the region of the Illinois River has been for a long time and is now infested with a gang of blacklegs, counterfeiters, horse-thieves and and pirates, and the people have found the laws, or at least the administration of them, entirely inadequate to the protection of their property; consequently they have been forced to form themselves into 'volunteer companies, and anti-horse-thieves societies.' One was formed about 20 miles below this, at Washington Grove. Mr. Campbell was actively engaged in getting it up. On Sunday night the 28th ult. two of the Driskells, notorious through that region as ringleaders and harborers of all sorts of villains, rode up to Campbell's house and asked his son if his father was at home; he called his father to the door, when the Driskells shot him dead and fled. The volunteer companies of De Kalb and Winnebago counties immediately collected and went in search of the Driskells. On Tuesday they caught the old man and one of his sons—tried them by Lynch law, and were convinced that they were the cause if not the perpetrators of the atrocious murder of Mr. Campbell. They sentenced them to immediate death, then placed the old man about ten rods off, and then bade him prepare for death, giving him five minutes; when the time was up, about fifty balls went through him. The son was then served in the same manner, neither making any disclosures more than saying that another son of Driskell killed Campbell. The company are now pursuing the other Driskell, who had fled with a confederate. Five hundred dollars reward is offered for his head.

However great the provocation, such violent proceedings cannot be justified.

Another Mammoth Discovered.—An animal has been dug up in 'Big Bone Lick,' we are informed by the Louisville Messenger, which measures sixty feet in length, in height twenty feet, and twelve feet broad at the hips? It is called the 'Kentuckian,' and it is said that the owners of the 'Missourian' have concluded to give up their small skeleton as a bad job.

Disastrous Fire—Waterford in Ruins!—A fire broke out at 4 o'clock on Sunday, in the village of Waterford, four miles above Troy, in a small building near the Episcopal church. It raged with the greatest fury for three hours and consumed nearly the whole business part of the town, including the Saratoga Co. Bank, Episcopal Church, Academy, the Mansion House, formerly Demanrest's, nearly every store in the place and about fifty dwelling houses—making in all from seventy to eighty buildings, among which were the most valuable in the town.

It was a scene of unparalleled confusion, devastation and distress. The whole village was covered with furniture, goods, and articles of every description. Every house appeared emptied of its contents, and the inhabitants of the village and the adjoining towns, together with many hundreds from Troy, crowded together in the neighborhood of the fire. At one time, the destruction of the bridge over the Hudson appeared inevitable, and nothing saved it but the exertions of the Troy and West Troy firemen, Waterford having but one fire engine, and that almost useless.

The whole loss is not less, probably, than $150,000, a portion of which is insured, though we have not learned to what amount. The Fireman's Insurance Company at Albany, have lost $6000 to $10,000. The Rensselaer and Saratoga of this city, and the Saratoga Mutual, and other companies are also losers.

The cause of the fire is not known; but strong fears are entertained that it is the work of an incendiary.

Rev. E. K. Avery.—A correspondent of the Boston Traveler, writing from Rhode Island, states the following:—"The murder of Miss Cornell was committed, if committed at all, on the night of the 20th of December, 1832, and on that night Mr. Avery was absent from his family in Bristol. He could not satisfactorily account for the time he was absent. In his examination, however, he said that in the evening of the 20th of December, he was returning home from the coal mines on the island of Rhode Island; and while on his way he saw and spoke to a man and boy, who were driving a flock of sheep. If he could have proved that he saw the man and boy at the time alledged, his innocence would have been established beyond a shadow of doubt or dispute. Unfortunately, in despite of every effort, they could not be found. I was conversing on this subject, a few days since, with a distinguished gentleman, of Bristol and he informed me of the astounding fact, that the man and boy have recently been discovered, and the boy, now a full grown man by the way, has by affidavit substantiated every word Mr. Avery asserted on his examination!

My information comes to me, from a source too respectable to be doubted, and I impart it to you with great satisfaction."

NOTICE.

The annual meeting of the S. D. B South Western Association, will take place at Northampton, Clark co., O., on the fifth day of the week before the second Sabbath in October. A general attendance, is desired, and brethren from foreign churches are invited.

DIED,

In this village, on the 19th inst., of consumption of the liver, Mrs THIRZA G., wife of George W. Barnes, aged 30.

Mrs. Barnes made a profession of religion some six or seven years since, and has ever maintained her profession as become a Christian. During her illness, which was protracted and severe, she manifested a willingness to depart and be with Christ in glory. In the death of Mrs. B, community has lost a valuable member. Parents and relatives have been bereaved, and the tenderest ties of affection broken which bound her to her husband. She has left an infant about two months old.

In Amity, on the 29th ult JESSE ROGERS, in the 74th year of his age.

Mr Rogers united with the Seventh Day Baptist Church in Waterford Conn., more than forty years since, and remained a member of the denomination; till his death. He lived several years in De Ruyter, and from there he was an early settler in the town where he died. His location was very favorable for the entertainment of travellers, to whom his doors were always open.

He had for several years been gradually declining under the influence of consumption, but his dissolution was hastened on by a shock of Numb Palsey. He left a numerous circle of friends to mourn his loss; but the circumstances connected with his life and death, gave them satisfactory evidence that they need not mourn as those who mourn without hope.

In Brookfield, on the 11th inst., Miss ABBY COON, daughter of Abraham and Amy Coon, aged 18 years.

Sister Coon experienced religion about two years ago, and in her illness enjoyed the blessedness of that man whose sins are forgiven, and whose iniquities are pardoned, and died as the good man dieth, in full triumph over all the powers of sin. Sister Coon was sick about three months.

In Bolivar, Allegany co., on the 5th inst., Mrs LUCINDA, wife of James Maxson, aged 45 years, 6 months and 12 days.

In Wirt, in January last, JUDITH LESTER, in the 85th year of her age.

POETRY.

SUNSET MUSINGS.

BY WILLIAM WORDSWORTH.

The Sun, that seemed so mildly to retire,
Flung back from distant climes a streaming fire,
Whose blaze is now subdued to tender gleams,
Prelude of night's approach with soothing dreams.
Look round :—of all the clouds not one is moving ;
'Tis the still hour of thinking, feeling, loving,
Silent, and steadfast as the vaulted sky,
The boundless plain of waters seem to lie ;
Comes that sound from breezes rustling o'er
The grass crowned headland that conceals the shore !
No 'tis the earth-voice of the mighty sea
Whispering how meek and gentle he can be !

Thou power supreme ! who, arming to rebuke
Offenders, dost put off the gracious look,
And clothe thyself with terrors like the flood
Of Ocean roused into the fiercest mood,
Whatever discipline thy will ordain
For the brief course that must for me remain ;
Teach me with quick-eared spirit to rejoice
In admonitions of thy softest voice !
Whate'er the path these mortal feet may trace,
Breathe through my soul the blessings of thy grace,
Glad, through a perfect love, a faith sincere
Drawn from a wisdom that begins with fear ;
Glad to expand, and for a season, free
From finite cares, to rest absorbed in Thee !

THE LIFE GUARDSMAN.

BY JESSE R. DOW.

The Life Guard of Washington! Who can think upon this band of gallant spirits without feeling a glow of patriotism warming his heart, and stirring up the sluggish feelings of his soul? Fancy paints against the figures which history has suffered to fade away, as the shadows departed from the magic mirror of Cornelius Agrippa ; and the heroes of the past start up before us like the clan of Roderick Dhu at the sound of their chieftan's whistle. They come from Cambridge, and from the Hudson, from Trenton and from Princeton, from Yorktown and from the Brandy-wine, from mountain pass and woody vale, gathering in battle array around the lowly bed of their sleeping leader, amid the solitary shades of Vernon.

The Life Guardsmen are fast fading away. One by one the aged members have departed, and now Lee's corporal slumbers beside his commander. Their march is over.

A more efficient corps never existed on this side of the Atlantic than the Life Guard. Animated by one motive, guided by one object, they surrounded their beloved commander-in-chief, and gloried in being known as his body guard. Was there any difficult duty to perform, it fell to this body, and gallantly did they perform the service entrusted to them. The eye of the general glistened with delight as they filed before him in the shade of evening, or returned into camp from some successful incursion beyond the enemy's lines, ere,

"Jocund day stood tiptoe on the mountain top—" or the reveille aroused the army from their slumbers.

It was the anniversary of the battle of Princeton, when an aged man, with a stout staff in his hand, was seen trudging manfully down Broadway. As he passed along from square to square, he cast his eyes upon the signs and door-plates, and muttering continued on his course.

"Here," said he, "was Clinton's Quarters"—"Edward Mallory, silks and laces"—"and here was the house that Washington stopped at"—"John Knipherhusen, tobacconist," and "here was where the pretty Quakeress lived, who used to furnish the commander-in-chief with information as to the enemy's movements"—"Cafe de mille collonnes"—"all, are changed ; time has been busy with every thing but the seasons—they are the same ; the sun and the rain ; the evening and the morning ; the icicle and the dew-drop ; the frosts and the snow-drift change not but man and his habitations—aye, the very name of places and people have been altered, and the New York of the Revolution is not the New York of '37."

As the old man said this, he seated himself upon a marble door-step, and wiped the perspiration from his brow ; for he had walked a long way that morning, and the thousand associations that passed upon his memory wearied him.

A company of volunteers, in all the pomp and circumstance of city war, now approached by a cross street The bugle's shrill note, mingled in with the clarionet and cymbals ; and the glance of the sun upon their bayonets and polished hemlets, lit up the martial fire that slumbered in the old man's soul. He rose upon his feet.

"It is pleasant enough now to look upon such gatherings," said he, "but those who have heard the drum beat to drown the cries of the wounded and dying, cannot forget their meaning, though youth and joy accompany them, and though the smiles of beauty urge them on." And the old man wept, for the men of other days stood about him, and the battle-fields, then silent and deserted, teemed with the dead and the dying, and the blood formed in pools amid the trampled grass, or trickled in little rills down the smoky hill-side.

A servant now came out of a neighboring house, and invited the old man in. He thankfully accepted the hospitality of the polite citizen, and soon stood in a comfortable breakfast room. A young man of twenty-one received him with kindness, and a tall prim woman of eighty-six cordially insisted upon his joining her family at the breakfast-table. A beautiful girl of eighteen took the old man's hat, and came and wheeled up an old arm chair that had done the family some service in ancient days. The old man as she seated herself beside him, patted her upon the head, and a firm—"God bless you"—escaped from his wrinkled lips. The old lady suddenly paused in her tea-table duty, and looked earnestly at her guest. The old man's eyes met hers—they had seen each other before—but the mists of time shrouded their memories, and blended names, and places, and periods, strangely together.

"Will thee have another cup of tea?" said the matron to the old man.

"I have heard that voice," thought the stranger, as he took the proffered cup with gratitude, and finished his breakfast in silence.

"Oh! Grandmother," said the maiden, springing to the window, "here comes the Iron Greys ; how splendidly they look."

"I cannot look at them," said the matron, in a trembling voice—"thy grandfather was killed by the Brunswick Greys at Princeton."

"What was his name?" said the old man, fixing his dim eyes steadily upon the speaker's face.

"Charles Greeley," said the matron, shedding an unexpected tear.

"Charles Greeley," said the old man springing up—"why, he was a Life Guardsman, and died by my side—I buried him at the hour of twilight by the milestone."

"And thou art?" said the matron earnestly.

"Old Hugh Maxwell, a corporal of Washington's Life Guard at your service,' said the stranger guest.

"Oh! well do I know thee," said the matron, weeping—it was thee who gave me directions where to find him, and delivered to me his dying sigh. This is an unhappy day to me, Hugh Maxwell, but thy presence lends an interest to it that I had no idea of enjoying. William and Anne, thy grandfather died upon Hugh Maxwell's breast in battle—let us bless God that we are permitted to entertain the gallant soldier upon the anniversary of that day of glory."

And the son brought forth the old family bible, and the widow Greeley prayed after the manner of the Quakers, amid her little congregation.

When the service was over, and the breakfast equipage had been removed, the son and the daughter each drew a seat beside the old veteran, while their grandmother carefully wiped her spectacles and took a moderate pinch of Maccoboy. Then seating herself as straight as a drill sergeant in her cushioned seat in the corner, she turned her well ear toward the old corporal and looked out of the window.

"Tell us about the battle of Trenton, and of Princeton, Mr. Maxwell," said the grand children in one voice. The old man looked inquiringly at widow Greeley.

"Thee may tell it, though it may be a sad tale to me," said the matron, and Hugh Maxwell after resting his head upon his hand for a moment, began his account of THE BATTLES OF TRENTON AND PRINCETON.

The twenty-fifth of December, 1776, was a gloomy day in the American camp. An army of thirty thousand British soldiers lay scattered along ~~the~~ opposite side of the freezing Delaware, from Brunswick to the environs of Philadelphia. General Howe commanded the British cantonment, and Lord Cornwallis was on the march from New York to reinforce him.

The British soldiers were flushed with success. They had driven us through the Jerseys. New York Island and the North River were in their power. They tracked us by our bloody foot-prints along the gloomy, though snow clad hills ; and they looked eagerly forward to the day when the head of our illustrious Washington should be placed upon Temple Bar, and the mob of London should cry out while they pointed at it, "there rests the head of a Traitor." The banner of England floated heavily in the wintry air, and the fur-clad Hessian paced his round on the gloomy hills, with his bayonet gleaming in the stormy night ; vidетts were seen galloping along the hill sides, and the valleys echoed with the martial airs of England. But in our camp all was sadness. Five thousand men, ill-armed and worse clad, without tents or even camp utensils, sat crouching over their lonely watch-fires.

But this is not all. The crafty British general had offered a pardon to all who would desert the American cause, and many men of property ; aye! even members of Congress, recreant to honor and principle, pocketed their patriotism with the proclamation, and basely betrayed their country in the hour of her peril. Members of Congress did I say? Yes, those that had been members : and let me repeat their names, lest, perchance, they may have been forgotten in the days of sham power and speculation. Galloway and Allen deserted and joined the enemies of freedom in the fall of 1776.

Such was the state of things at this period. All was silence in the American camp. The star splangled banner hung drooping over our head quarters, and the sentinel by the low door-way stood leaning in melancholy mood upon his rusty and flintless gun. The commander-in-chief held a council of war. At the close of it he gave his opinion—he had heard of the scattered cantonment of the British army.

"Now," said he, striking his hand upon an order of battle, and pointing from the window of the little farm house toward the wild river, "now is the time to clip their wings." It was a master thought : the council of war concurred with their leader, and each member retired silently to prepare for immediate action.

The regiments were mustered—the sentinels were called in—a hasty meal was devoured—the evening shut in with darkness and storm—the word was given, and we began our march. One party moved down, one remained stationary, and one passed up to a point above Trenton. I was with Washington. No one in the ranks knew where he was to go, all was mystery, until we wheeled down the steep bank of the Delaware.

"Onward," was the word. "Cross the river," thundered along the line, and our freezing legions moved on. Who shall describe the pains and perils of that terrible march? Who shall reward the noble spirits, who trusting in their illustrious leader, moved onward amid famine, nakedness, and the winter's storm? Surely, at this day, a generous nation will not let the poor old veteran die who has his scars—but no certificate—to testify to the glory of that night—better feed an imposter than starve a hero.

But to my tale.—Upon a high bank, Washington and Knox, and a few staff officers, wrapped in military cloaks, sat upon their shivering chargers, and awaited the progress of the broken line. We moved on—some on cakes of ice—some on rafts with the artillery—and some in little boats. Dark reigned the night around—the wild blasts from the hills swept down the roaring stream—the water froze to our tattered clothes, and our feet were blistered and peeled by treading upon the icy way. The snow, like feathers borne upon a gale, whirled around us—the dark waters yawned fearfully before us—at every step we were in danger. Now precipitated into the stream, and now forced to climb the rugged sides of the drift-ice, still we advanced. At length the cannon and the tumbrile were landed, and the last soldier stood upon the opposite shore.

Shivering with cold and pale with hunger and fatigue, our column formed and waited for the word. Washington and his staff were at hand. "Briskly, men, briskly," said he, as he rode at the head of the line : and then the captains gave word from company to company, and the army marched on in silence. A secret movement of an army at night keeps the drowsy awake, and the hungry from complaining.—Man is an inquisitive animal, and the only way to make him perform apparent impossibilities, is to lead him after what he knows not. Columbus discovered America in a cruize after Solomon's gold mine, and the vast field of chemistry was laid open to human ken, in a search for the elixir of life, and the philosopher's stone.

All night our troops moved down the west bank of the river, and as the morning spread her grey mantle over the eastern hills, we reached Trenton.

The Hessians, under Rawle, slept. No one feared Washington,—and the mustached soldier dreamed of the Rhine and the Elbe, and the captain slept careless at his inn. But suddenly the cry was heard, "He comes! he comes!" Our frosty drums beat the charge ; the shrill fifes mingled in with a merry strain ; and our hungry army, with bare feet entered the city. Like the Scandinavian horde—in impetuosity and necessity—before the eternal city, we rushed upon the streets, and attacked the surprised enemy at every turn. The startled foe endeavored to defend themselves ; but, before any body of them could collect, a charge of our infantry cut them to pieces. Their colors were absolutely hacked off of their standard staff, while they advanced in line, by a sergeant's sword, and their officers were cut down or taken prisoners. Our victory was complete. One thousand men were killed and made prisoners, and the artillery, consisting of nine pieces, was captured. Such was the effect of the Battle of Trenton upon the enemy ; but to us the consequences were the reverse. Our hungry men were fed, our naked were clothed, the rank and file armed, and the officers promoted.

The same evening we re-crossed the river, but it was not the terrible stream of the previous night ; the foot-prints of boots and shoes were left on our trail, and the drums beat a merry call, while the bugles answered sweet and clear.

In a few hours the Hessian tents shrouded the captors on the site of our old encampment ; and Rawle's officers had the pleasure of drinking their own wine in their own tents, with Gen. Washington and his subalterns, as prisoners of war. So well planned was this attack, that we lost but nine men, and two of them were frozen to death after being wounded.

On the 29th of December, 1776, we again crossed the Delaware, and at 1, P. M., our eagles floated over Trenton.

The "mery Christmas" of our evening party astonished and aroused the king's generals. Lord Cornwallis hastened to form a junction with Gen. Grant, at Princeton ; and on the 2d of January, 1777, the British army marched against Trenton.

It was late in the afternoon when the advance guard of the enemy appeared in sight, their red coats forming a striking contrast with the winter's snow. Our drums now beat to arms, and Gen. Washington with 5,000 of us, crossed the rivulet Assumpinck, and took post upon the high grounds facing the rivulet. A heavy cannonade speedily commenced, and when night came on, both armies had a breathing spell.

Fresh fuels were now piled upon the camp-fires—the sentinels were posted in advance—small parties were stationed to guard each ford—the cry, "all's well"—the quick challenge and the prompt answer—the tramping of a returning vidette—and the occasional tapping of a drum in the guard-room, were heard in our camp. The British General rejoiced in the belief that the morning sun would behold him a conqueror of our leader and ourselves. Secure of his prey, the enemy made preparations to attack our camp on the first blush of morning. The noise of hammers—the heavy rumbling of cannon wheels—the clashing of the armorer's hammer, and the laugh of the artizan and pioneer, came over upon the night wind, and grated harshly upon our sensitive ears.

An officer, mounted, and wrapped in a military cloak, was now seen silently approaching the commanders of regiments in quick succession. He whispered his orders in a low tone—the colonels started with astonishment,—they looked, it was their general, and they immediately sent for their captains. Each officer heard the new order with astonishment, but to hear was to obey. The captains whispered it to their orderlies, and in twenty minutes the whole army stood upon their feet in battle array. Our tents were struck, and our baggage wagons ready for a march.

The sentinels paced their rounds as though nothing was about to happen. The laugh of the relieved guard was heard above the din of both armies, and "all's well" rang above the night.

We now stood ready in open column to march. Gen. Hugh Mercer had command of the van guard, and in a few moments our captains whispered "forward, and be silent"—our living mass immediately moved onward, and filed off toward Allentown. Presently we heard the rear guard, with the artillery, rumbling in our rear, and then our camp, so quietly deserted, was lost sight of in the shadow of the hills.

For upwards of two hours we moved on in comparative silence. Nothing but the whispers of the officers and the heavy tread of the men was heard. It was quite dark, and every breast seemed to be under the spell of mystery. At length a noise was heard, and a staff officer galloped to the rear. As he passed along, he said, in a clear voice, "the enemy are in sight."—In a few minutes the voice of the gallant Mercer was heard loud and distinct, giving his orders—"Attention, van guard, close order, quick time, march." We sprang at the word—each soldier grasped his musket with a firmer gripe—and away we went upon the run.

Three regiments of light infantry opposed us on the plain at Maidenhead and their drums were beating merrily as we drew near them—our front now came upon an open common. We broke into three columns, and headed by the gallant Mercer, dashed on. In a moment, a stream of fire passed along the British line, the dead and wounded fell around me, and our column wavered. At this instant, while Gen. Mercer, with his sword raised, was encouraging the van guard to rush on and secure the victory, a bullet struck him, and he fell from his horse mortally wounded. For a moment only the battle was against us, but soon the firm voice of Washington was heard, as he passed on to the front. Our musketry now echoed terrible ; the enemy began to give way ; a well directed fire from the artillery told fearfully upon the small armed foe, and they were routed. At this moment a British soldier clapped his bayonet to my breast—Charles Greeley thrust it away with his right hand—the soldier fired—his musket and the noble hearted Greeley fell upon my breast. I grasped his hand—it faintly returned my pressure—and then he straitened himself upon the ground, his eyes became fixed, his jaw fell, and he was dead. I bore him quickly to a wounded cart, and hastened to my platoon. The enemy were flying towards Brunswick, and we were masters of the field.

"On to Princeton," shouted our noble leader, as he sent his wounded aid to the rear on a litter.

The line moved on in quick time, and soon we entered the town. Our visit was as unexpected here as at Trenton. A portion of the enemy had taken shelter in the college. Our general as at Trenton headed the charge in gallant style, while the troops, animated by his fearlessness, nobly seconded him. The artillery thundered against the garrisoned college, and the musketry rung wildly from every corner.—Surrounded by a superior force, and not knowing but what Cornwallis had been routed, for they had heard the midnight cannon at Maidenhead, most of the enemy surrendered. A few, however, escaped by a precipitate flight along an unguarded street at the commencement of the attack. In this affair one hundred of the enemy were killed, and three hundred taken prisoners. Lord Cornwallis, as he lay on his camp bed, was roused by the roar of cannon. He started—the sound came from Princeton—he immediately ordered his troops under arms, and hastened to the scene of action. When he arrived the battle was won, and we were on our return march in triumph. As we crossed the Milestone river, we were halted to destroy the bridge at Kingston. I ordered a file of men to assist me, and hastily buried my companion in arms by the water side, while the enemy's cannon answered for minute guns for the brave. Having shed a tear of sympathy over his lonely grave, we joined the main body. At sunset we trod upon the bleak hills of Morristown, and the camp-fires were lighted, the campaign of '76 was over.

As the old man finished his tale, the widow turned away her head, and the grand children hid their faces and wept. At length when they raised their eyes to their guest, his face was pallid—a wildness was manifest in his eyes ; and his frame appeared to be stiffening in death. They sprang to him.

"Forward—on—to—Princeton!" said he, in a cold whisper ; and the last Life Guardsman joined his companions in Heaven.

The next day a numerous body of strangers followed the old veteran to the tomb ; and the widow Greeley placed a plain marble slab at the head of it, and inscribed upon it—

The Missionary's Last Day at Home!

BY SARAH D. HALL.

The bright sun had risen and shone o'er the hill,
The birds of the air began their glad lay,
The echo was silent, the forest was still,
And nature seemed dressed in smiles for the day.

When the exile arose to welcome the morn,
For slumber had fled from the last dreary night,
While thoughts fraught with anguish her bosom had torn,
And joy kindled not till the first rays of light.

The last dreaded echo died not on her ear,
Its direful notes her fond bosom did swell,
'Till the long wished for morn at length did appear,
'Twas the sad heavy dirge of the last Farewell!

She had parted with many that nature called dear;
She had bid them adieu, and left them behind,
And at their departure had not shed a tear,
Nor suffered one cloud to pass o'er her mind.

But, alas! the dread hour of trial had come;
The hour which nature must e'er shrink to tell,
When to parents, brothers, sisters and home,
The echo must vibrate, Farewell! Farewell!

Ah! how can she look on the guides of her youth,
While nature stands bleeding at every pore?
Ah! how can she yield to this solemn truth,
My matron and sire I ne'er can see more?

With brothers and sisters to-day she must part,
A wandering exile, on earth for to roam;
Where now is the solace for her wounded heart!
Where now can she look for parents and home!

Once more her commission resounds in her ear,
While "Lo, I am with you," her master doth cry,
The day-star of hope now banishes fear,
And fountains of grief no more dim her eye.

Affection may drop the tributary tear,
As friends gather round to bid her adieu;
But from their embrace herself she must tear,
While the dear dell and cottage recedes from her view.

Her Savior's commands she will gladly obey,
Since friends all so dear she can leave in his care.
While faith reaches forward to view the glad day
Where anchored in glory she'll meet them all there.

TASTE AND MORALS.

BY PRESIDENT HOPKINS.

Is the prevalence of a cultivated taste favorable to morals? Is there a connection, either in individuals or communities, between good taste and good morals?

That the affirmative of these questions is true, I infer, first, because we find in the emotions of taste, to say the least, an innocent source of enjoyment for our leisure hours, and the mind that is innocently happy, is less accessible to temptation. Indolence, mere vacuity, we all know is the porch of vice, and the great dangers to the young arise from their hours—from the want of means of innocent mental exhilaration, in which they can be induced to spend these hours. It was said by Franklin, that leisure was a time in which to do something useful; but all are not Franklins. If leisure time can be, as it is by many, usefully employed, so much the better; but he who should provide for our youth the means and inducements to spend their leisure time innocently, would be a public benefactor.

A good taste involves a ready susceptibility to the emotions of beauty and sublimity, and of course readiness to receive pleasure from the common appearance of nature, and from every free and natural expression of good feeling. It is, in my view, of the first importance both to character and to happiness, that the young should cultivate a relish for these simple and natural pleasures, the sources of which are open to all. It is important to happiness. How much happiness does the young florist secure, who can look upon the common violet as it opens its eye from the snow of the early spring, with much the same pleasures as upon the choice exotic which is resorted to and exclusively admired by those who have unfortunately been taught that it is vulgar to admire what is common! How much happiness does he secure who is touched by a beautiful action wherever he sees it, who appreciates sympathy wherever he finds it, and however expressed. A mind rightly constituted in this respect, drinks in enjoyment from the objects and occurrences of daily life, as the eye does light. It is also essential to character. How many young men enter life with a false estimate of the advantages which wealth and fashion can confer; who find their happiness, not in the contemplation and pursuit of appropriate objects, but in what others think of them, and to whom the world becomes insipid unless they make a figure in it. Let now misfortune come upon such men, and the world fails them. Their world is gone; they have no resource; they become generally dishonest, sometimes inefficient and gloomy, and commit suicide. These persons come to consider the common and truly great blessings which God has given as nothing unless they may possess those artificial and egotistical enjoyments which arise from conventional society. They see not the splendid ornaments and rich provisions which, to adopt with a slight accommodation the beautiful language of another, are gathered round the earth for them—its ocean of air above, its ocean of earth beneath, its zodiac of lights, its tent of dropping clouds, its striped coat of climates, its fourfold year. It is nothing to them, if they have not man for their servant, that 'all the parts of nature incessantly work into each other's hands for their profits; that the wind sows the seed, and the sun evaporates the sea, the wind blows the vapor to the field, the ice on the other side of the planet condenses the rain on this, and thus the endless circulations of the divine charity nourish man.' What a change when such a person is brought back to a true relish of the simple pleasures of nature! Even sickness, depriving him for a time of what he undervalued, if it bring him back to this, is a blessing; and then the result may be stated in the words of Gray:—

"See the wretch who long has tost
On the thorny bed of pain,
At length regain his vigor lost,
And breathe and walk again."

Then,

"The meanest flow'ret of the vale,
The simplest note that swells the gale,
The common sun, the air, the skies,
To him are opening paradise!"

Then, though he may hold little property by that title which the law gives, he yet feels that the universe is his for those nobler purposes for which it was intended to act on the spirit:

"His are the mountains, and the valleys his,
And the resplendent rivers;"

and he looks back upon his former discontent as the petulance of a child. The simple beauties and the glad voices of nature have made him a man again.

But again, I infer that there is a connection between good taste and good morals, because there is an analogy between those qualities in matter which excite the emotions of taste, and those relations on which morals depend. So much is this the case, that some philosophers found morality upon a theory of the beautiful, considered as a sublime harmony. In all beautiful objects in nature, or in art, there is an order, a propriety, a fitness, a proportion; and the impression which these make upon us is so analogous to that which is made by virtuous conduct, that we use the same term to express both. To me, indeed, it seems that beauty in matter is to moral beauty what instinct is to reason, or what the light of the same elements, but destitute of the highest. Hence, as we would naturally expect, morals furnish that region in the province of taste in which she gathers those flowers that are richest in beauty and sweetness in perfume.

"Is ought so fair,
In all the dewy landscape of the spring,
In the bright eye of Hesper, or the morn,
In nature's fairest forms, is ought so fair
As virtuous friendship!"

But I observe again, that there is the analogy just pointed out between their causes, so there is an affinity between the emotions themselves of taste and correct moral feelings, and the transition from one to the other is obvious. The point requires illustration. That our emotions as associated in groups, is practically known to every body. Even the child does not ask his father for a sixpense when he is in ill temper, because he knows the transition is not easy from ill-temper to generosity. Deep grief can not pass at once to sudden joy. It must be by a gradual transition, first to tender melancholy, and then to cheerfulness, and then to joy. "The garment of sorrow," as Coldridge expresses it, "must be drawn off so gradually, and that to be put in its stead so gradually slipt on and feel so like the former, that the sufferer shall be sensible of the change only by the refreshment." It is by understanding well the affinities of the feelings that the orator can continue to control them as they pass over their widest range. The necessity of a suitable state of mind in order that the emotions of taste may arise, has already been noticed; and what I now observe is, that a state of correct moral feeling is more favorable to this emotion than any other. There is between them such an affinity that they really associate with each other; while there is, between the emotions of taste and a vicious state of mind, no such affinity, but they are to a great extent incompatible.

The external world often gives back to us but the image of our own thoughts, and hence may seem almost as variable as the dim forms of twilight to which the imagination gives its own shape. This tendency of the mind to cast its own hue over nature, or rather to receive different emotions from external objects, according to its own state, is well illustrated by Crabbe, in his tale called "The Lover's Journey." In this tale, Orlando, the lover, starts on a pleasant morning with the expectation of finding the object of his affections at a village, where she had agreed to meet him. The first part of his journey lay across a heath covered with furze. But hear him:

Men may say
A heath is barren; nothing is so gay;
Barren or bare to call this charming scene
Argues a mind possessed by care or spleen."

And thus he went on, admiring the wholesome wormwood and the vigorous briar, till he reached the village, and then disappointment came. The lady had gone to a village some miles further on, under circumstances that vexed him, and led him to doubt her affection. He doubted even whether he should proceed, but at length determined to see and upbraid her. Now hear him again, as he passes along by the side of a beautiful river:

"I hate these scenes, Orlando angry cried;
And these proud farmers, yes, I hate their pride;
See that sleek fellow, how he stalks along,
Strong as an ox, and ignorant as strong.
These deep, fat meadows I detest; it shocks
One's feelings there to see the grazing ox;—
For slaughter fatted—as a lady's smile
Rejoice man, and means his death the while."

And if mere disappointment, without a consiousness of guilt and remorse, could produce such effects, what must we expect when the mind is not at peace with itself? Tendencies are shown by extreme cases, and it is in perfect consistency with the nature of things that Milton makes Satan exclaim, on seeing Eden in its united innocence and beauty,

"O hell! what do mine eyes with grief behold!"

Who can imagine a miser, even, to say nothing of a thief, or a drunkard, lifting his eyes from his buried heaps, and enjoying the scene before him, however beautiful? While he who performs a deed of charity at the end of his walk, will find nature wearing a richer dress on his return. The mind conscious of rectitude is at peace with itself, and is in that calm state which permits it to enjoy whatever is pleasing.

But not only, as in the cases now mentioned, is a right state of moral feeling favorable to taste, but the emotions of taste also tend to introduce moral ideas and emotions. It is, as I conceive, chiefly from this fact that nature has a tendency to lead the mind "up to nature's God;" for we must all be conscious that when we view nature as beautiful or sublime, this tendency is strongest. No one can have stood by Niagara, or upon the White Mountains, without feeling this. Hence the groves and the high hills were the first places of worship. Hence the Indian sacrifices to the Great Spirit when he passes through the wild rapids. And as we associate the beauties of nature with the wisdom and goodness of God, so do we, in many cases, instinctively infer from the displays of taste in man, something of his moral character. Who, for example, in traveling through a solitary forest, if he should come, as there are many such, to a neat log-house, with a trellised woodbine at the door, and with every thing orderly and clean about it, would not expect to pass by unmolested, or, if he should call, to be civilly and kindly treated?—whereas, if every thing bore the appearance of filth and dilapidation, and the only signs of taste were those which indicted a taste for rum, he might well quicken his pace for fear he should be waylaid. No one expects to find indications of taste about the dwelling of a drunkard, or of one abandoned to any low vice. I appeal to any one who hears me, whether he has not felt it was an indication of a good moral character, and an encouragement to charity, when he has entered some poor dwelling and found that there was still kept alive, in the midst of poverty, a susceptibility to the emotions, and a regard to the requisitions of taste.

KEEPING OTHERS' VINEYARDS.

Amidst the exertions which are now put forth by the universal church, there is not a little danger lest zeal should be confounded with piety, and determination of effort mistaken for purity of motive. Of this circumstance we are often reminded, and that in no friendly way, by some whose religion, whatever it may be worth to themselves or others, is certainly in no peril from that quarter. But, for any to dispute the extent of the obligation to spread, throughout the universe, the glorious gospel of the blessed God, is only, in other terms, to demur whether to them will apply the description, "Ye are the salt of the earth," and "lights of the world." And since it is devoutly to be wished that all such selfish religionists would question the reality of their own discipleship, it would be cruelty, indeed, to say one word which might induce them to think more highly of themselves than they ought to think.

Yet is it lawful to learn from an adversary, and censure, even when misapplied, may have a beneficial tendency—it may lead to self-examination. And to confess the whole truth, some who are by no means disposed to dispute the question, "Am I my brother's keeper?" may nevertheless, take up the lamentation, "They made me keeper of the vineyards, but mine own vineyard have I not kept."

An apostle supposes it possible to speak with the tongues of men and of angels, and yet to be as sounding brass, or a tinkling symbal; and in his own person, he manifested perpetual caution, lest, after having reached to others, he should become a castaway. It is, therefore, inconceivable that any measure of attainment, either as to Christian experience or righteousness success, can exclude the necessity of serious enquiry into the state of our hearts before God, or supersede the caution, "Let him that thinketh he standeth, take heed lest he fall."

It is exceedingly possible to be declining in personal religion amidst the most powerful excitement of public services, and this will infallibly be the case if they are permitted to infringe on private devotion.—A neglected closet is a thing for which nothing can compensate. We may engage from morning till night in the most important matters that can occupy our attention; we may all the while be employed in bringing others to a sense of their responsibility, and beseeching them in Christ's stead to be reconciled to God, and yet our own souls may lose much of the tenderness of holy compassion, much of the fervor of heavenly love; in a word, much of every thing which distinguishes the Christian from the man of the world. And when we have done our work successfully, and others have been profited by our exhortations, we may retire, abashed and confounded, lamenting that it is not with us as it was in former days.

Religious declension may proceed to a fearful extent without awakening the slightest suspicion that things are so. The Holy Spirit may be grieved by our self-confidence, by our pride, by our formalism, by our unbelief, while our most intimate friends perceive nothing in us but humility and devotedness. This will assuredly be the case whenever we begin to cherish a similar opinion. The blame-worthiness of the Pharisee in the temple was not that he arrogated to himself the virtues which he recounted there, (for he ascribed them all to God, and rendered thanks for their gracious bestowment,) but it was, that, in the presence of the Holy One of Israel, he could see any thing in himself but reasons for deep humiliation.

But, if in the midst of engagements of a purely religious kind, it is sometimes a difficult task to maintain a vigorous condition of piety, that difficulty becomes yet greater amidst secular duties and in public life.

Brethren, take heed to your spirits, and walk through the world with cautious steps. Amidst your rights, as members of the commonwealth, forget not your sacred obligations as citizens of a better country. Beware of planting thorns for your dying pillow.

POSTURE IN PRAYER.

An article in your excellent paper of the 6th inst. from the pen of a "Country Clergyman," under the above title, has suggested some thoughts to my mind, on a subject which I long deemed important to the Christian church. It is undoubtedly desirable, as proper, that a more general uniformity should characterize the devotional exercises of those churches who are united in one common faith, and who assemble from time to time, to worship the same God and Father of all, and His Son, our Lord Jesus Christ. Your correspondent justly observes that, at the present time no such uniformity exists. Some congregations sit, others stand, whilst a part of them adopt a mixed course of standing, sitting or reclining forward, as best suits their convenience during prayer. He seems, however, to take it for granted that either one or the other of these postures is suitable, and recommends a return to what he calls "the good old ways"—that is to standing.

Some years ago, my attention was called to this subject, and I then took pains to examine the word of God, in order to ascertain what was the position adopted by the Prophets, Apostles and holy men of old, as also by our Lord himself. The result of this investigation was the irresistable conclusion of my own mind that no other was known among the people of God, in Scripture times, when assembled for public worship, than KNEELING; and also that this was the usual posture in private prayer.—In II Kings, viii. 54, we read thus:—"And it was so, when Solomon had made an end of praying all this prayer and supplication unto the Lord, he arose from before the altar of the Lord from kneeling on his knees, with his hands spread up to heaven." This, it will be remembered, was at the dedication of the temple. Again, at the consecration of the temple we find in II Chron. vi. 13th. that he (Solomon) "stood and kneeled down upon his knees, before all the congregation of Israel, and spread forth his hands towards heaven," &c. In Psalm xcv. 6 David says, "O come let us worship and bow down, and kneel before the Lord, our Maker." We read also that Daniel kneeled down three times a day, in his private devotions, and prayed. We have also sundry examples in the New Testament of Christ and his apostles kneeling in prayer. In St. Luke xxii. 41, it says that Jesus kneeled down and prayed; and in Acts 9th, 10th, 20th, and 26th, we hear of Peter and Paul imitating his divine example in this particular. These are but a few of the texts which I might quote, all tending to confirm my position; but I think these will suffice to show that the kneeling was the posture of prayer most common in the ancient church, as well as among primitive Christians. From a careful perusal of the Bible, I think we may infer that kneeling and and prostration were used to express penitent humility; bowing to express deep veneration, and standing to show forth joy and thanksgiving. We read, it is true, "that the Pharisee stood and prayed," but even in this case seems to be tacitly implied that he wanted that humility which would lead him to bow down his body before God. If then, it be shown from Scripture that kneeling is the most ancient, reverential and customary practice of appearing before God, both in public and social worship, I am at a loss to understand how our good puritan forefathers could have found authority for abolishing a practice so devotional and becoming.

But aside from the authority of Scripture, and time honored custom, it appears to me that every reflecting mind must admit, that kneeling is the most expressive posture of humility, devotion and penitence. From time immemorial it has been customary to kneel in the presence of an earthly sovereign. How much more should we bow down when we come into the august presence of the King of kings, and Lord of lords. It may be said that the posture is merely an outward symbol—that God looks not at the outward appearance, but at the heart of those who worship Him. This is very true. But it is equally true that in approaching the throne of Him before whom angels fall and arch-angels veil their faces, an external reverence and humility are proper, and that the abasement of the body may essentially assist devout feelings.

The chief objection to standing is that the attention of the congregation is apt to be diverted from the worship of God to objects which continually meet the eye. As I presume it will not be contended by any that sitting during prayer is sanctioned either by the word of God, or by ancient usage, I will merely observe that wherever it prevails, it is doubtless of recent origin, and is most likely a degeneration from the kneeling posture. Still I think it far less objectionable than standing, in view of the considerations just mentioned.

A CITY LAYMAN.

THE ROBBER RELEASED.

Barabbas sits in sullen despair on the floor of his dungeon, awaiting every moment the appearance of an officer, who is to lead him to execution,—when, lo! there rushes in a breathless messenger, with joy depicted on his countenance, bringing the most incredible intelligence. 'Hail to thee, Barabbas!' he cries out, 'thou art free, thou art free!' and, even while he speaks, he is unchaining the astonished prisoner, and calling him to arise and leave his confinement. In the first moment of astonishment, it seems to a criminal as though he were still dreaming; he then begins to think that he has been permitted, for a few hours to walk about the courts of his prison, to which he must return after enjoying for a short space the free air of heaven. The messenger, however, assures him anew that he is free, and explains how the thing has taken place. Thus Barabbas learns that the sentence of death no longer impends over his head, for it has been annulled and torn; that he has nothing more to do with offended justice, for he has been restored to the rights of a citizen, and no complaints will henceforth be raised against him; on the contrary, he will be treated as though he never had committed; all this has been done, because another has stood in his place, and suffered death on the cross instead of him. The messenger who brings this blessed intelligence, withholds nothing, but declares it freely and fully: and is he not in this the type of a faithful herald of the gospel?—Yes, ye souls that are weary and heavy laden, a message similar to what the murderer received is now conveyed to you, only far greater and far more blessed. In clear and simple terms we declare, that since the great exchange took place, before the judgment-seat of Pilate on Mount Golgotha, there is no condemnation for you that are in Christ Jesus. And we entreat you to receive this word in faith and humility, for we speak in Christ's stead, and bring you the message in the name of God.—F. W. Krummacher.

"IT IS I, BE NOT AFRAID!"

There is not a passage more emphatic, and at the same time more cheering and comforting to the afflicted soul than this.—In the hour of trial, when the clouds of adversity darken our path, and there appears not one ray of light to guide our steps; when the tempest roars, and death, that grim tyrant, stares us in the face, then it is that this sublime and soothing passage comes with all its force, and calms the troubled soul of man.

What a blessing these words of comfort have been to mankind ever since they were uttered by our Savior! The child, when in the dark, hears a footstep approach, its little heart beats faster, but the mother's voice falls upon the ear, "It is I, love, be not afraid," and all is peace in the infant's bosom. Oh! is it not beautiful to contemplate the child's reliance on its mother, but infinitely more so to see the young leaning with the same reliance on the bosom of their Savior. And when sickness comes with its withering blight, and the mother sits beside the cradle of her idolized child, watching for the last breath, yet hoping, praying (oh, such prayers as that agonized mother pours forth, none but those who have suffered, can know,) that God will hear and spare her child. Suddenly it gasps, it breathes once more, and all is over—and that wretched mother sits almost distracted. In her despair she cries, "My child! my child! who has taken it from me—was it not mine own?" But a light breaks in upon her, and a voice whispers, "thy child is not dead, but sleepeth" "it is I, be not afraid.

Again, we kneel beside the death bed of the loved one, and ever and anon a shade of doubt and anxiety passes over the pale face as the shadow of death falls upon it—and like the mariner, tossed upon the ocean wave, without compass or a guiding star, so is the loved one, until we rouse the scattered senses by whispering the blessed assurance of our Savior, "Though you pass through the valley and the shadow of death, yet will I not leave thee; "it is I, be not afraid."

And we have the satisfaction of knowing it is all sufficient. The immortal part has winged its way to the spirit-land. Oh! may I ever call to mind these words of our blessed Savior, "It is I, be not afraid," and I think I may bear the ills of life, and the approach of death, without a murmur.

A SIN TO BE SICK.

According to Prof. Finney, of Oberlin, it seems it is a sin for one to be sick, unless placed in such circumstances as to overwork his organs. We commend the article below, from the New York Observer, embracing the grave nonsense of the Oberlin Professor, with the judicious strictures of the Observer editor, to the consideration of our readers, asking them, when they think the great reformers of the world are going to bring up, in the grand finale of their theories?

"A SIN TO BE SICK.—In the Oberlin Evangelist of the 12th of May is a lecture by Mr. Finney on "A seared conscience." Under the general division, "the consequences of a seared conscience," he remarks:

"'For myself, I can not be sick unless I have been placed in such circumstances as necessarily to overwork my organs, without feeling the deepest shame and remorse. All sickness is the result of violated physical law: and when that violation can be avoided, that is a deep sin and shame, that produces sickness. But all that you may overlook, and will overlook, if your conscience becomes seared. And you may go down to your grave, and to hell, under the deep abhorrence of God, for your reckless violations of the laws of your being; pitying yourself, ascribing both your disease and death to a mysterious providence.'

"If, as is taught at Oberlin, we may refrain from every violation of the moral law, and so be free from sin, it is certainly easier to avoid a breach of physical law, and so be exempt from sickness. "All sickness," Mr. F. says, "is the result of violated physical law," and whenever he is sick, he says that he "feels the deepest shame and remorse, unless he has been placed in such circumstances as necessarily to overwork his organs." But surely this is working more than God requires of any man. His commandments are not grievous. No man ought to overwork his organs, and so make himself sick. And if we work no more than God requires of us, according to Mr. Finney's theology we shall never be sick.

"And why is not this the natural and legitimate deduction from the doctrine of Oberlin Perfectionism? Afflictions, sickness among the rest, are certainly the fruit of sin. Take away the cause and the consequence is removed. In heaven the inhabitant shall never say, "I am sick." And if the believer here on earth becomes perfectly holy, why shall he not be perfectly happy?—And if perfectly happy, he has secured a gracious deliverance from the trials to which, in sin, he was subject, and therefore feels no ill. And if at any time he is sick, he is thus reminded that he has sinned; and "he feels the deepest shame and remorse."

"Such is the progress of error. Let the mind once be loosed from the moorings of Bible truth, and there is no telling whither, or to what lengths, it will be driven. The stouter the bark and the more canvass flying, the farther and faster it will wander. If we have now reached the point in morals where we may live without sin, and the point in physics where we may live without sickness, it would be well to inquire if the Ultima Thule of human attainments has not been found. If not, where will the world be a hundred years hence?"

MR FINNEY'S DOCTRINE (adds the Register,) fully adopted, seems to us would check very much the further settlement of the west. And verily, had it been promulged and generally embraced before the settlement of western New York, the Empire State would show little else but an unbroken wilderness from Oneida to Niagara. Most of it was an exceedingly sickly region, as well as nearly all the western States, and sickness was almost inevitable to the pioneer settlers. Now if they had deemed it so wicked to be sick, as to produce "feelings of the deepest remorse," to have ventured a conflict with the impure atmosphere would have been too criminally perilous, certainly for moral men; and if there had been any settlement at all, it must have been by a set of abandoned creatures who had no fear of God before their eyes, and whose "consciences had become seared!"

Our missionaries in foreign lands, must belong to the class of seared consciences.—Numbers of them are constantly getting sick, and have to return to recruit, or die.—If this sickness is "the result (on their part) of violated physical law," for which they ought to feel the "deepest shame and remorse," it is high time the characters of missionaries was more closely scrutinized, and that we send out no more of these "seared consciences."

The present age is called an age of humbugs. And if some of these should eb found among the systems of theological professors, don't be amazed. Though the sun is at meridian, it is an alarming foggy day, and every man is in danger who does not carry the good bright lamp in his hand, and look carefully to his steppings.

We live in an age when men are fond of learning almost the loss of religion. Nothing will pass with our men of wit but what is agreeable with the nicest reason; and every man's reason is his own understanding. These mighty pretenders have no surer ground to go upon than other men.—They plead for right reason, but they mean their own. In the mean time, they take from us our own surest guide, for religion suffers by their contentions about it.—Baker.

The end of learning is to know God, and out of that knowledge, to love him and to imitate him, as we may the nearest by possessing our souls of true virtue.—Milton.

Borrowed Capital.

It is somewhat common for men to trade on "Borrowed Capital." It is a more frequent thing for men to use property not their own by neglecting to pay the purchase price for it. To all appearances they are frequently as rich and contented as the wealthiest. Those of the former class commonly exhibit the most arrogance and haughtiness of all classes. A sort of Aristocratic pride and supreme selfishness, shows itself in every move, and a species of sovereign contempt is manifest towards those who choose not to think of themselves more highly than they ought to think. This course, in those who have no higher motive than worldly gain, is pardonable: but when it is exhibited in things pertaining to the kingdom of Heaven, it exhibits most odious features. A Christian bartering the interest and truths of religion for personal objects! It is a contradiction in terms, and yet it is of frequent recurrence. It bears upon its front the undeniable truth, that there is no real capital in possession, or in other words, that the heart is destitute of those feelings and emotions that characterize the real christian. We now suggest the inquiry to every professed christian, is your heart right with God? and have you in lively exercise the holy feelings and disinterested benevolence of the gospel? or are you trading on borrowed capital—professing the religion of Jesus Christ, while you exhibit none of its characteristics? That holy religion teaches,

1. Supreme love to God. This is first taught in that moral code of laws written by the finger of God on tables of stone, and delivered to men from Mount Sinai, and afterwards taught by the Prophets, by the Lord Jesus Christ, and those whom he commissioned to preach the glad tidings of salvation to sinners. The whole duty of the creature to God, is briefly summed up in the teaching of the Lord Jesus Christ thus, to love God with all the heart, soul, might, mind and strength. The relation of the creature to the Creator requires this. A love which prompts to obedience in all things commanded, is such as God requires all to exercise to himself. Any thing less than this he will not accept. Any thing that savors of worldly conformity, that detracts aught from the praise due him, or that is designed to subserve convenience, or excuse disobedience, is "Capital Borrowed" from the devil, to serve the Great Jehovah with. It may do to deceive men, but with God, to whom all praise is due, it is not current. Love unadulterated with any manner of sin, is alone acceptable to God; all things else are spurious.

The name of Jesus has doubtless often been professed from different motives than that he is worthy of all praise. This profession is sometimes used as a cloak for sin, and impious hands have touched holy things, and blasphemous tongues have used holy phraseology. Such we think must be regarded as capital borrowed, which can be of no other service than to deceive men, while it will make an eternal bankrupt of him who uses it. Again, men borrow capital by referring to what they once were, and by depending upon the good opinion which was once entertained of their piety and disinterested zeal in the cause of truth. This may for awhile deceive men and sustain one in his unrighteous cause, till he has made the Zion of God bleed at every pore, and caused the name of Jesus to be blasphemed. Oh, how has the church of God suffered by such merchantmen, and by the introduction of such spurious coin!—Do these not know that their pretensions are hollow in the sight of God? Do they suppose that the mask will never be removed, so that men and angels, with God, shall see the rottenness of the heart? Such conduct is trading on "Borrowed Capital." In the day of accounts that soul will be reckoned within equity and justice, when nothing will be accepted as an excuse for not having always exercised the heart unto righteousness. It will be vain to say we have eat and drunk in thy house, in thy name cast out devils, and done many mighty works.

Another way of borrowing capital, is, to trust to a hope once had in the Savior.—What evidence of piety has that man exhibited who has never borne the cross of Christ—never submitted to the duties of religion, but relies on a hope, which years since he indulged. The only evidence of being in favor with God, is to have in lively exercise the principles of the gospel, to love and cherish the things of the kingdom.

A species of self-deception is sometimes manifested, in misjudging the nature and and tendencies of religion, especially by those who adopt new theories of religion, whose animal feeling takes the place of holy obedience. No matter, say they, what a man is if he is only a christian, (i. e.) no matter what he does if he only feels happy! If we mistake not, very many are led astray by such false notions of religion, trusting that all is well when they have never yielded their hearts to God. Such are trading on "Borrowed Capital"—are bringing the sinful feelings of the heart into the service of God, and palming it off upon men for the pure principles of the gospel.

2. Love to man. A man cannot love God as he requires, without loving his neighbor as himself. These two principles contain the whole duty of man. He who is entirely selfish in his feelings and actions, does not love God; and he that does not love God is selfish, and the benevolence that the gospel requires is not in his heart. That man who feels no desire for the well-being and salvation of his fellows, and yet professes strong attachment to God, is using "Borrowed Capital"; his religion is not pure.

3. Love to the Church. Christ says a new commandment give I unto you, that ye love one another. Here is a test of saintship that is incontrovertible. If a man's heart is right with God, it is right with his brother. If he loves God whom he has not seen, he loves his brother whom he has seen. "By this we know that we have passed from death unto life, because we love the brethren."

Christian brother, try yourself by this rule. How is your heart affected towards your brother, even though he be an erring brother? Does christian charity hide a multitude of faults? If a brother err, do you seek to restore him in the spirit of meekness, considering yourselves lest you also be tempted? If not you are using "Borrowed Capital;" you are making false pretensions to that religion which is pure. Every effort you make to raise yourself, or humble your brother, exhibits the rottenness of the heart, and shows you to men and to God as destitute of the first principle of the gospel.

☞The obituary of NANCY H. STILLMAN, published in another column, was marked for insertion last week, but was accidentally left out. All who knew her will be consoled with the reflection that she is at rest in the bosom of her Savior. Her ardent piety—her inflexible attachment to the truth—her benevolent affections, with her circumspect deportment gave her a good report of all that knew her.

PUBLICATION DAY.—We send out our paper this week two days earlier than usual. We have been induced to alter our publication day from the sixth to the fourth day of the week, so that our mail subscribers may receive it before the Sabbath. This is the best arrangement we can make at present. We trust it will be acceptable.

WESTERN ASSOCIATION MINUTES.—After the Minutes were printed, we discovered a mistake in them for which we now offer an apology. The place of holding the Association was Friendship instead of "Alfred." The Compositor thinks that he can not be blamed for this, since the manuscript gave no account of where it was held, and he supposed it was at Alfred.—The Minutes have been sent as directed.

CONGRESSIONAL.—Our city papers have not reached us as usual this week. We are, therefore, obliged to omit the proceedings of Congress.

A Word in Season.

The following extract is from a charge which was recently given at the Ordination of Mr. Fancher, McGrawville, Cortland Co., N. Y. The charge was delivered by the Rev. David Malin:—

"I charge you, Dear Brother, not to let irresponsible conventions of men interfere with your ministry. Be not dictated by resolutions instructing you in the duties of your ministerial office, emanating from Infidels, Unitarians, Hicksite Quakers, Universalists, Unionists, and men without any fixed religious sentiments, though they may be found in company with some sound members of the Christian church.

"Remember that your ordination vows are resting upon your own soul, and that you can not permit such irresponsible bodies of men to lord it over your conscience, without losing your ministerial character and influence, and jeopardizing your immortal interests, and the interests of the church of God. Preach the preaching which God bids you, and watch for souls as one who is to give account."

One thing, however, must not be forgotten, viz.: that if all ministers had ever been faithful to preach the preaching which God bids, heeding this his command, "Open thy mouth for the dumb," "irresponsible bodies of men" would not have found the pretext with which they are now furnished, to attempt to instruct ministers in the duties of their office. The Commencement of the Sabbath.

NUMBER 1.

MR. EDITOR.—In consequence of a difference of opinion concerning the commencement of the Sabbath, I would request of you the privilege of giving publicity to what appears to me to be the scriptural view of the subject.

The subject is one of importance, being intimately connected with the due observance of the Sabbath; for if we let the cares and business of the week encroach upon the commencement of the Sabbath, there will be reason to fear a great intrusion of secular thought during the whole of the day, and consequently much of the benefit which otherwise would have accrued, will be wholly or partially lost. But is it not also desirable that a uniformity of practice should prevail in our denomination with respect to the beginning of the Sabbath? Being few in numbers, does not every such discrepancy have a tendency to weaken the strength of the whole? But farther, the subject demands serious inquiry, as it stands related to the authority of God, for to that implicit obedience should be rendered. "To the law and to the testimony," then, let us bring this for trial, and whatever is there laid down let it be practiced.

In entering upon the subject it will be proper,

I. To consider the origin or commencement of terrestrial time, and its division by the Creator.

II. Whether the seventh day Sabbath was an exception to the division in its commencement.

III. The practice of the Jews from antiquity to modern times. And,

IV. The practice of various denominations of Christians since the commencement of the Christian era.

1. The sacred oracles are our sure and only guide; and they declare that "In the beginning God created the heaven and the earth." If any difficulty exists, it is in fixing the definite meaning of the term, "IN THE BEGINNING." The phrase cannot refer to God, for the scriptures assure us that he is "without beginning." Exod. xv. 18, Deut. xxxii. 40, xxxiii. 27. Neither can it have reference to Eternity; as to that there can be no beginning. Nor will it, I think, be contended, that it points out the time when Angels were created. But are we to infer that no definite meaning is to be attached to it? Certainly not. That it has a meaning, and an important one, is evident. That it refers to, and points out, the precise moment predestined in Eternity, when the Almighty should arise and with a word create our world, is certain. To that point in duration when God spoke matter into being—to that second in the circumference of eternity, when the Creator "spoke, and it was done; commanded, and it stood fast." From this point, then, earth must reckon her longitude; from this date her embryon existence; and when from this, having measured her seven millennial weeks, her tangent orb will again be immerged in the circle of eternity. From this point the inhabitants of earth must compute their time; even from that very instant of duration, when, by Omnific power, earth rose from the unfathomable abyss of nothing, and was! How august; how sublime; how meager all imitation has Moses penned time's pristine history! How totally unlike all after writers, without prologue or introduction the least, he majestically introduces to man the era of his computation! How very definite, also, his meaning!—Time then began, and from that momentous moment will date its end.

But, again, unless time commences at that very moment of duration, how can we reconcile the account given in Exodus xx. 11. There we are told that "In six days the Lord made heaven and earth, the sea and all that in them is." Now are we to understand that the Lord did not mean exactly six days? perhaps a little more, perhaps a little less? Did the inspired penman write at random? Or, did he mean just what he said? no more, and no less?—Doubtless he did. Therefore he did say, and meant to say, that "In six days the Lord made heaven and earth," &c. No longer time, and no shorter was employed. Six days—six whole days, and six days only were spent in creative operations, commencing from the very predestined moment to which reference is made in Gen. i. 1, viz.—"In the beginning"—and ending at the very point of time on the sixth day, when the earth had run six consecutive periods or days. Taking it for granted that the same person penned the passage in Gen. i. 1, and Exod. xx. 11, might he not have been charged with a discrepancy unpardonable, considering the importance of the subject? If we do not admit the phrase "In the beginning," to point out the identical moment from which our time is computed, then no more or less than six days were spent in creative operations. If time did not commence until Light was created, as some contend, then more than six days were spent in creating, which renders untrue the expression in Ex. xx. 11, as creative operations continued until the close of the sixth day.—But if time began some length of duration anterior to the creation of matter, then less than six days were employed, which also militates against the passage in Ex. xx. 11, for it must not be forgotten that all creative operations closed on the sixth.

Thus we see, that to harmonize the first of Gen. with Ex. xx. 11, time must commence at the very moment in which matter was spoken into existence, and to which the phrase "In the beginning" relates.

In a future number the subject will be investigated farther.

Yours, in the Lord,
SHERMAN S. GRISWOLD.

Religious Discussion.

For the Register.

THE TRINITY.—NO IV.

THE PERSONALITY AND DEITY OF THE HOLY SPIRIT.

I.—Personality of the Holy Spirit.

It may not be unimportant to remind the readers of the Register, that by the use of the words person and personality, when applied to God, we mean, "that the only living and true God exists in such a manner, that there is a foundation in his nature to speak of himself in the first, second, and third person, and say, I, Thou, and He, meaning only Himself."

The arguments for the Personality of the Holy Spirit may thus be epitomized:—

In the language of the Bible, the Holy Spirit is said to be sent forth—to move—to strive—to know—to search—to hear—to speak—to guide—to lead—to help—to testify—to have a mind, or pleasure—to prophecy—to intercede—to give gifts—to work in the soul of man—to work miracles—to sanctify—to quicken—to be pleased—to be vexed—to be provoked—to be resisted—and to be grieved. (Dwight, p. 373)

In support of the Personality of the Holy Spirit against the theme of representing him as the mere Attribute of God, I will annex two passages of inspired truth, and on them I will rest the argument:—

St. Matthew xii. 31. All manner of sin and blasphemy shall be forgiven unto men, but the blasphemy against the HOLY GHOST shall not be forgiven unto men.

Acts of the Apostles v. 3. But Peter said, Ananias, why hath Satan filled thy heart to lie unto the HOLY GHOST?

The Personality of the Holy Spirit being once admitted, no argument can be maintained against his Deity.

But our vindication of the Doctrine of the Trinity can not be properly closed without distinctly noticing,

II.—The Deity of the Holy Spirit.

Passing over the Baptism Commission, the Apostolic Benediction, and many other branches of the general argument for the Deity of the Holy Spirit, I hasten to fix the attention of each reader, on Acts v. 3 and 4. But Peter said, Ananias, why hath Satan filled thy heart to lie to the HOLY GHOST? Thou hast not lied unto men, BUT UNTO GOD.

A statement of what we meant by the Doctrine of the Trinity, has been made; a selected outline of the arguments for sustaining this doctrine has been given. To the mind of the writer, the evidence thus furnished, amply proves that the one only living and true God exists in three persons, Father, Son, and Holy Spirit. This is the Doctrine of the Trinity.

In the Register, a series of articles consisting of nine numbers, has recently been published, enumerating "Reasons for not embracing the Doctrine of the Trinity." To select from those "reasons" what I may judge demands specific attention, will be the design of my next article.

The sixth and concluding number, will consist of a brief summary of the whole argument, and the recording of such reflections as the nature and course of this discussion will naturally suggest,—especially at this crisis in the religious aspects of this country.

News of the Day.

A boy named Norman Flanders, lately standing on the wharf at Buffalo, fainted, fell into the canal, and was drowned.

The "Martha Washington Temperance Society," is the name of a new society, formed in this city—whose object is, the reformation of female drunkards, and to give relief to drunkards' wives and children.

The farmers in the vicinity of Troy are receiving seven and eight cents per pound more for wool, than they received at this time last year.

1516 passengers arrived at this port from foreign parts, during the week ending on Saturday last.

Over $2,100,000 have been expended on the Girard College, now being built at Philadelphia.

Pittsburg, Pa. is alive to the Temperance reform, the Mayor and most of his officers having signed the pledge. The celebrated Dravo House, the largest Hotel in the city, has become a Temperance House.

Mr. Parmenter, who once was an intemperate man, and who is completely blind, is lecturing in Vermont, on the cause and claims of Temperance.

Dr. Wm. James McNeven, the Irish patriot and companion of Emmett, died in this city in the 79th year of his age, on the 13th inst. Mr. Thomas Trainer is now the only survivor of the little band who accompanied Emmett to our shores, after the failure of their attempt to revolutionize Ireland.

A man who owed the editor of the Macon Messenger two dollars, and told him he had no money, lost his pocket-book the same day, containing about $1000.

The yellow fever was raging at Havana, on the 5th ult. Letters of that date, state that fifteen cases were taken to the hospital daily.

The mortality in New York this season is much less than in Philadelphia, as appears by the weekly reports. There were 140 deaths in the last named city last week, and only 117 in New York; a large per cent. in favor of New York, considering the difference in population.

During the month of June the N. Jersey pilots brought in 44 vessels, 37 of which were boarded out of sight of land, and took out 29. These make an aggregate of 3047 vessels hitherto in charge of the N. Jersey pilots, without accident.

Gov. Seward has issued a proclamation offering a reward of $250 for the arrest of Thos. Magan, charged with the murder of Thomas Sharp, of Saratoga.

In digging cellars for several new houses to be erected for David Leavitt, Esq., on Brooklyn Heights, a great number of human bones have been exhumed. Thirteen skeletons have thus been taken up, and three or four gold buttons.

The Franco-Grenadian Company, established at Paris, have at length overcome all governmental difficulties, and having provided the requisite funds, are about to commence operations in excavating the ship canal over the Isthmus of Darien or Panama.

A society of Reformed Inebriates has been organized at Montreal. At the close of the second meeting, twenty-two individuals gave in their names for the Montreal Society, and eight for the Society of Reformed Drunkards.

It is a curious fact, presented by the late census, that thirteen states—just one half of the whole number—contain each over half a million of inhabitants.

Saratoga Springs.—Seventeen hundred and fourteen visiters arrived at Saratoga Springs between the first and eleventh of this month.

Slave Trade in Havana.—An earnest effort is being made in Havana, among the principal inhabitants, to put an effectual stop to the slave trade in that island.

There is a British vessel in the port of Boston whose standing rigging is made of iron-wire.

Samuel S. Randall, Esq., of Albany, has been appointed (by Hon. J. C. Spencer,) Deputy Superintendent of Common Schools for this State, under the new school law of last winter.

Foreign Missions.—The New York Express announces the nomination of Edward Everett as a Minister to England, Charles S. Todd, Minister to Russia, and Daniel Jenifer, Minister to Austria.—Alb. Eve. Jour.

Emigrants.—8897 emigrants have arrived at the sheds in Montreal the present season—of which 1458 have arrived within the last twelve days; about 1900 lbs. of oatmeal were distributed to the destitute in the above period.

Death of Gov. Reid, of Florida.—The Augusta Sentinel says, that a private letter from Tallahassee, mentions the death of the Governor, on the 2d inst. He died of congestive fever, which is said to prevail to an alarming extent in and around Tallahassee.

The great Rail-Way from Bristol to London is in operation. It cost upwards of $20,000,000; is 120 miles in length, with a tunnel drilled three miles through a solid rock.

The estimated amount of Tobacco exported from the U. States, in the year ending the 30th of September last, was 119,481 hogsheads; value, $9,884,951.

The Public Lands.—The estimated quantity of public land unsold and now subject to private entry, is 118,173,441 acres.

The estimated quantity, surveyed and unsurveyed, not offered at public sale, is 103,416,863 acres.

The quantity which has been sold from the earliest period of the sales, is 86,708,724 acres.

The amount paid therefor, by the purchasers, has been $131,113,435.

The quantity granted to each State and Territory, exclusive of the 16th section, has been 3,826,836 acres.

The quantity reserved from sale, exclusive of the 16th section, has been 837,589 acres.

The estimated quantity of public land to which the Indian title has not been extinguished in the States and Territories, 735,915,699.

From the Franklin Palladium.

Among the most interesting civil causes which came on for trial, was that of Patrick McFarland vs. John McNulty. It was an action brought by the plaintiff, for the seduction of his daughter by the defendant. The character of the parties, the relation in which they stood to each other, and some of the facts and circumstances elicited on the trial, rendered it peculiarly interesting and exciting. The defendant is a Roman Catholic Priest, residing at Hogansburgh, in this country; his parochial duties have frequently called him to this town, on which occasions he has made the plantiff's house his home, up to last November.

The plaintiff is a respectable farmer, and has resided in this town about fifteen years, and is a prominent member of the Roman Catholic church. Ann M'Farland, the daughter of the plaintiff—to recover damages for whose seduction this suit was commenced—is about 19 years of age, and an only child. She is also a member of the same church, and has been for the last three our four years in the habit of frequently visiting Hogansburgh, and spending several days, and sometimes weeks at a time, in the family of Mr. M'Nulty. It was during one of these visits, that the seduction is charged to have taken place.—The cause was ably managed on both sides. For the plaintiff, Messrs. Hascall, Parkhurst, Stow and Beckwith. For defendant, Messrs. Foote, Jackson and Gillett. The Jury, after being out about one hour, returned into court with a verdict for the plaintiff of $2,500.

An Unprofitable War.—We learn from the Exeter News Letter that Robert Pratt was committed to jail in that town last week, on a charge of obstructing, or attempting to obstruct the passage of the cars on the Eastern Railroad in Hampton. Pratt not finding it easy to remove the rails, took his stand upon them with a club, and threatened wild war against the Locomotive. The Engineer, on seeing him, stopped the train—knocked the club from his hand—kicked him down a precipice—sent him off to jail—and proceeded on his route as "calm as a summer morning."

Horrid Assault.—Our letter from Cape May contains an account of a most horrid assault, committed on Saturday morning last, off the Capes, but as neither names nor particulars are given, it may not be amiss to state them.

The schooner Daniel Webster arrived at our wharves yesterday, under command of the mate, Mr. Williams, and having in custody a man, named James Crugar, who is charged with the murder of Capt. Augustus Phelps, under the following circumstances. James Crugar, his wife, and four children took passage for this city from New York, in the Daniel Webster, and during the voyage, Crugar's conduct was such, at times, as to indicate insanity. During Friday night when outside the Capes, a heavy blow came on, and the Captain was forced to lie by until it cleared. This seemed to awaken the anger of Crugar, who spoke to the captain in such a manner, that he had to be carried below. The next morning the vessel proceeded on her course, and about 6 o'clock, the mate, who was at the wheel, remarked to the captain, "If you get your glass, you can see the light house." Capt. P. got his glass, and was in the act of looking in the direction indicated, when Crugar came aft, picked up a sharp wood axe which was lying by the caboose, and springing at the captain, was in the act of striking, when the mate called out, "my God, save yourself." The captain immediately started, turned half round, and received the blow of the axe on his neck and jaw.

The mate immediately seized Crugar, who made a most powerful resistance, tearing handfuls of hair from the mate's head, and causing great trouble before he was mastered. He was finally conquered and bound, and in this state brought to the city. A brief examination was held before the Mayor, at which the evidence of Williams was given, and the prisoner committed for a further hearing this morning. Upon his arrival at the prison, he again became very unruly, and required some force to subdue him. The steamboat Sun, which arrived yesterday afternoon at 4 o'clock, from Cape May, brings the information that at the time the boat left, Capt. Phelps still survived, but in so low a state, as to forbid the hopes of recovery.—Phila. U. S. Gazette.

Fatal Accident.—An accident of a distressing nature occurred on Thursday last, at the stone quarries in Newcastle, near Sarle's Corner, opened for the purpose of obtaining materials for the new Croton Dam. It appears that the workmen, of whom we understand there are about 60 or 70 employed on the premises, had prepared for a heavy sand blast, and charged the aperture and given the alarm for the men to clear the quarry previous to the explosion; the workmen did so in the usual manner, Stephen Kelly taking shelter, as had been done before, behind a ledge of rock; but when the blast took effect, it threw out a vast quantity of stone, and one of the pieces weighing perhaps half a ton, fell on the verge of the ledge where Kelly was, broke it off, and descending on him, crushed him to death in a very short time. Immediate efforts were made to extricate the body, but although he breathed perhaps 10 or 15 minutes, the unfortunate man never spoke after the accident.—Westchester Herald, July 20.

The Confessions.—Messrs. Chambers & Knapp, of this city, have published, as most of our readers are aware, a pamphlet of seventy or eighty pages, containing the confessions of the negroes, Madison, Warrick, Seward and Brown, who were executed yesterday, for the murder of Baker and Weaver in April last; together with lithographic likenesses, taken while they were in jail. According to the statement of Madison, he was born in Virginia, the slave of Asa Brockman, and was sold when 12 or 15 years of age to a negro trader by the name of Blakely and taken to New Orleans.

He soon obtained the full confidence of his master, returned with him to Maryland, and was encouraged by him to tell "false tales" to slaves, whom he wished to purchase, and to aid him in coaxing off, or in stealing and secreting others. The slaves were told that his master was from a free state, and that they would be taken to Canada, out of the reach of their masters. To the women and girls he held out the prospect of marrying rich white men, and of living in style and splendor. Blakely, in connection with his partners, having collected from 80 to 100 slaves, started by land to New Orleans.

On their return to Washington, a plan was formed by which Madison's master was to sell him as often as he could, after which he was to run away and go back to him.—He was sold in this way to Mr. Clay, at Washington, for $1,300, and soon after joined his master in Baltimore. He was afterwards sold for $1,000, in Virginia, and again returned as before. Near Orange Court House, he states that his master robbed the vault of a merchant of a large amount of money and bills, amounting to about $100,000, and set fire to the building which was entirely destroyed. On their return to New Orleans, Madison was sold to Mr. Blanchard, and the purchase money, $900, was given by his former master to him as a reward for his fidelity.

After this, he was engaged, as he states, with a man named James Buel, a clerk of Mr. Blanchard's, in obtaining goods on forged orders. Soon after, Madison concealed himself in the store of Mr. Williams, which he robbed of $300. Afterwards, the store of Mr. J. H. Fields, of Bienville street, was robbed of $3,000; and, in company with a man by the name of Learned, $2,700 was obtained from the bank on a check altered from $200. About this time, a partner, named David Rook, was taken into the concern, and the firm turned their attention to stealing negroes, running them to Mobile and selling them at auction.

Such are a very few of the cases of negro stealing, robbery, and other acts of villainy, in which Madison was engaged, previous to his coming to St. Louis.

Here, he was engaged, with others, in robbing the stores of Mr. J. R. Scott, Mr. Goodell, Messrs. Braun & Hollander, Sinclair, Taylor & Co., and E. & A. Tracy; and here his infamous career has been brought to a close on the scaffold.—St. Louis Gazette.

Peoria, (Ill.) July 9.

Wheat Crop.—The fields are beginning to assume a rich golden tinge, and some are nearly ready for harvest. Wheat every where looks promising. It has not been at all injured by insects, and unless it should rust or blast, of which there are no indications now, there will be a bountiful crop. Since penning the above, we are informed that some of our farmers have already cut their wheat, and that the beginning of next week may be dated as the midst of our harvest.—Register.

The Sandwich Islanders, are, it appears by recent letters, sending missionaries to the heathen! A letter in the N. York Observer says:

The second church in Honolulu has raised about three thousand dollars in three years for the erection of a house of worship and school house, besides a considerable amount for other public and charitable objects. They have engaged, too, in the work of foreign missions. Six of its members had volunteered to go as missionaries to the Indians, west of the Rocky Mountains. From these, two had been selected, who had either gone or were soon to go. The first church at Honolulu sent a press and types to the Oregon Mission, with which the first printing was done in any of the Indian languages there spoken.

The Prudential Committee of the American Board have addressed a memorial concerning the outrage at the Sandwich Islands, to the King of the French, and through Mr. Baird, have had personal communications with him, and with the French minister of foreign affairs on the same subject. The attention of the government of the United States has also been called to that outrage. The result, in either case, is not yet known.

Letters from Dr. Grant, at Constantinople, to May 17th, state that the Maronite Patriarch had made a formal complaint to the Sultan, against the American Missionaries at Beyrout, for interfering with the religion of the country, and requested that they be removed." The Sultan had communicated the complaint and the request to Commodore Porter, our Ambassador at Constantinople. The result is yet to be learned. We may presume that Commodore Porter will understand and do his duty, and that the expulsion of the Missionaries will be prevented. The great European powers will be deeply interested spectators of the progress of these affairs, if nothing more. England will not be willing that the power of deciding who may have intercourse with the Druses, and other inhabitants of Mount Lebanon, shall be lodged in the hands of the Maronite Patriarch, a tool of France.

The West.—The Iowa City Star announces, under the head of "Arrival Extraordinary," the arrival, on the 24th ult., of the first steamboat that ever ascended the river as high as that spot. There were no impediments found to an easy and safe navigation of the river, except a few snags and projecting trees a few miles below the city, which it is said would be immediately removed by the citizens.—National Intelligencer.

An Hydraulic Ejectment.—"A landlord at Bagtinelles," says the Detroit, "had the misfortune to have his house occupied by twenty-three tenants, none of whom paid him any rent. But making concessions he got rid of them all except one tenacious fellow, who still held out, although the landlord offered to give him a release in full of all demands. Being desirous of avoiding litigation, the costs of which he knew must come out of his own pocket, he called upon his refractory tenant and repeated his offers: but finding him still obstinate, he went out of the room, locked the door, and ordered every aperture to be hermetically stopped up by a mason. This being done, a man at the top of the house, furnished with a sufficient quantity of water, received order's to pour a torrent down the tenacious fellow's room, by means of the chimney. This operation lasted three hours, by which time the inundation rose to the window sills. At length the family of the tenant, who were shut up with him in his watery habitation, prevailed on him to capitulate."—Galignani's Messenger.

Indictments for Libel.—The Grand Jury yesterday came into court with three several bills of indictment against James Gordon Bennett, of the New York Herald, for libels published in his paper of the 14th of June last, in what purported to be a report of the proceedings of the Court of Sessions, in the trial of James Ritchie, on an indictment for receiving stolen coffee. Two of the indictments are for alleged libels on Judges Lynch and Noah, conjointly, and one on Juge Noah alone. Bennett was sent for by the Court, to come forward and enter into bonds for his appearance to answer these several libels.—Express.

Family Manufactures, Cloths, &c.—The total value of these goods made in this State, is set down at $16,534,075. Considering the cheapness with which woolen and cotton goods are turned out by machinery in factories, the product of sixteen and a half millions worth of domestic goods is highly creditable to the industry of our country matrons and their daughters, by whose fair hands this large amount of cloth has been spun and woven. The ladies of Yates county have reported $127,000 worth of domestic goods, made by themselves, more than has been claimed by the ladies in any other county in the State. Their product is set down at $310,891. The ladies of Chatauque stands next, they claiming to have made $183,522 worth of goods.

The Railroad Bridge across the Connecticut at this place is now completed. It is doubtless the most splendid and substantial specimen in the United States. It was built by Mr. Howe, the patentee of the plan. The bridge was crossed for the first time, by the train from the West, on Monday noon, in presence of a large number of our citizens, who made the air ring with shouts at the final achievement of this great enterprise.—Springfield Gazette.

Ignorance and Vice.—A young man was convicted of manslaughter last week in our Court of Common Pleas. He is said to be one of a family of thirteen brothers and sisters, living with their mother, and all of disreputable and infamous character, not one of whom can either read or write. This in a land of free schools, thousands of churches, and a tasteful and discriminating people.—Ohio State Journal.

Catholics and the School Fund.—The secular papers are beginning to awaken to a sense of the danger to which we have been exposed by the school bill which nearly passed the Senate of this State in favor of the Catholics.

Many persons now see on examining its provisions, that it is designed to allow the principles of Romanism to be taught in schools supported by the money of the people, and to bring the children of evangelical parents under the instruction of Jesuits. The Commercial Advertiser and the New York American, have both expressed their decided opposition to this plan of Bishop Hughes. The Express has also published a strong article to the same purport. We recommend extreme watchfulness to all who are opposed to the intermeddling of Rome and her partisans with our civil affairs.—Baptist Advocate.

The Pittsburg Trade with Mexico.—The Pittsburg Intelligencer says, the trade and commerce of that city with Santa Fe, Chihuahua, and the leading towns of Mexico, are gradually increasing. Six horse waggons are constructed in Pittsburgh, loaded with assorted goods from New York and Philadelphia, transported to Independence, in Missouri, and there driven across the country to Mexico, where they are sold, and paid for in specie or the best funds.

A Fact.—Not long since, a reformed drunkard was taken very sick, and for a time was unable to speak. His friends wishing to stimulate him, offered him some liquor. He could not speak, but shook his head, and continued to as often as it was offered him. When he recovered, he requested his friends not to offer him liquor unless they wanted to hurt his feelings.—"Especially," said he, "when I am sick don't give it to me—it nearly killed me when I was well."

West Point Academy.—The Board of Visiters to the Military Academy at West Point, seem by their report to the Secretary to have been highly gratified with the condition of the Institution. The examinations in the different departments of scientific instruction, as the report states, were highly satisfactory. The Cadets appear well grounded in all the branches, and afford gratifying evidence of the ability and fidelity of their instructors.

In the department of moral and religious instruction, the Board were very much pleased with the views entertained by those to whom it is entrusted, and the pains they seem disposed to take in giving a right direction to the minds of the young men.

In relation to the fiscal concerns and property of the Academy, the Board state that the amount of money expended here by the Government for the year ending the 1st of May, 1841, applicable to the Institution, for the cost of instruction and pay of Cadets, is as follows:

Amount expended by the Paymaster,	$101,271 50
Amount expended by the Quartermaster,	26,482 80
Making together,	$127,754 30

Of this sum, $81,405 68 is for pay for Cadets, being $28 per month to each.

Out of this sum the Cadet boards and clothes himself; furnishes his own books, stationary, and mathematical instruments, the furniture of his room, washing, &c.; every thing in fact, but fuel.—Journal of Commerce.

Mount Vernon.—The Madisonian says, that this hallowed spot continues to attract multitudes of people, American citizens and foreign travelers, who visit it to pay their homage to the memory of Washington. The number of visiters each day is from 40 to 50, and those who are favored with suitable letters are received with the utmost urbanity and kindness, by the very amiable and highly intelligent Mrs. Jane E Washington. A portion of the grounds are now bearing crops; the gardens continue to be cultivated and protected by the very gracious Phil Smith, a resident there of 40 years standing, and the buildings and lawns are still preserved as nearly as practicable, in the state in which they were left by their immortal proprietor.

From the Cincinnati Gazette, July 7.

President Harrison's Remains.—The Committee, and detachment of the U. States Marines, arrived at our wharf with the remains of the late venerable President, about three o'clock on the morning of the 5th instant. About 9, the body was conveyed to the residence of Col. W. H. H. Taylor, followed by the committee, and a number of the old and intimate friends of the deceased. Although a couple of military companies were on the wharf when the body was brought ashore, and notwithstanding that many of our citizens had likewise gone down, there was neither bustle, nor show, nor parade of any kind; but instead of these, the countenance of every one, as he silently followed the hearse, bore an impress of the deep sorrow that had been re-awakened within.

The funeral obsequies by our citizens, will take place this morning.

Conviction of Madame Restell.—Last evening, about 8 o'clock, the trial of this female for a misdemeanor, in producing the miscarriage of Ann Maria Purdy, by the use of instruments, terminated in a verdict of guilty by the Jury. Public opinion responds to this verdict as a righteous one, and awards to the District Attorney, who has prosecuted it with so much zeal and ability to a successful result, his appropriate meed of praise. In his summing up speech, this gentleman spoke full three hours and a half with great eloquence and power. Near the close the Court and Jury, as also the Counsel himself, were melted into tears. It is to be hoped that the lesson of public justice thus taught her, will not be lost upon the unhappy woman on whom the vengeance of the law has fallen.—N. Y. Express.

From the N. O. Bee, July 12th.

Fires.—Since our last publication, no less than three fires have occurred. The first broke out on Saturday night about 12 o'clock in St. Peter street, (1st municipality) in the house of Mr. Holmes. It was soon extinguished without further damage than the destruction of the occupants' furniture.

The second alarm was given at 4 o'clock yesterday morning. The fire proved to be in Circus street, between Girod and Julia. Five large two story frame houses, three in front and two in the rear, were totally destroyed, by which a large number of poor families were rendered destitute.

The flames had not been subdued when smoke was seen issuing from a house in Lafayette, near the junction of that city with the second municipality. The fire originated in a grocery store on the Levee in the block on this side of Jackson street.

We presume that about 15 front houses were destroyed, together with the buildings in the rear, and the progress of the flames was arrested by tearing down the remainder of the block.

We regret to add that the intense heat and unwearied efforts of the firemen occasioned several severe coups de soliel. No less than 9 members of No. 13 were taken ill, several of whom were taken to the Hospital.

The citizens of Lafayette exhibited marked kindness and hospitality toward the different fire companies. We were unable to learn whether any insurance had been on the property consumed.

True to her Principles.—Slavery cannot exist long in the Bay State. Deputy Sheriff Pratt, of Boston, came down in the cars on the morning of the 8th inst., from New-Bedford, bringing with him on a writ of habeas corpus, a colored girl, named Louisa Fearing, about 18 years of age, from Richmond, Va., from which place she had come as a servant with a family on a visit to the North. A hearing of the case will be had before the Supreme Court on Saturday next.—Atlas.

National Debt.—The National Intelligencer estimates that the amount of debts and liabilities of the United States Government on the 1st of January next, will be $18,694,449. This does not include the $15,000,000 which is proposed to borrow for the construction of a Fiscal Bank. The amount of debt and outstanding appropriations on the 1st of January last, was $17,273,081.

English Navy.—The following is an accurate statement of the force of the English Navy:

445	ships mounting	18,286 guns
5	" in admiralty ser.	40
48	" in revenue ser. say	144
489		18,470
102	Steamers.
1	do Revenue service.
103
1	Bomb ketch.

In addition to the steamers above enumerated, those belonging to the Royal Mail Company, going to the West Indies, and part of those going to the Mediterranean, are built on the model of first class steam frigates, and are at the disposal of government in case of war.

The steamers trading to the United States and Canada, although not constructed for war steamers would yet be serviceable.

It is probable that in case of need, government could command in this way twenty first class and eighty second class steamers, and perhaps 200 tugs suitable for sea service.

Statistics of New-York City.—The new Business directory, published at 89 Nassau street, which we have noticed contains a great variety of information useful to citizens as well as people from the country. The classification of Trades and professions, extends, it is stated, to nearly a thousand divisions, and by means of the index, a Stranger in search of any particular class of Trades or Mechanics will readily find them.

The following are among the most numerous class of Trades and Professions given in the Book: Commission merchants about 500; Importers (59 classes) 500; Grocers 550; Lawyers 596; Brokers (27 classes) 314; Auctioneers 59; Hotels 58; Porter houses 161; Restorators 70; Hardware dealers 61; Hide and Leather dealers 42; Booksellers and Publishers 64; Newspapers 45; Periodicals 64; Printers 56; Druggists 83; Hatters 68; Tailors 175; Hair-dressers 62.

This directory is understood to contain the names and firms of most of the business men in the city, embracing about twelve thousand names.—N. Y. Express.

A Hurricane.—Our citizens had a taste of an Oriental Tornado yesterday. The way the wind rain and hail swept through our city about half-past 1 o'clock, was not to be beaten. It inundated all our streets, drains and cellars—swept down awnings and awning posts—stove in doors and windows—tumbled over chimneys and sycamores—scattered oil casks, dry goods boxes and brooms—crushed corn stalks and peas—riddled roses and frightened children—and shook every house to its foundations—so powerfully did it dash ahead.

In the country and on water, we fear greater mischief was done. Neither corn nor wheat field could maintain their perpendicularity in such a blow, when accompanied with such a rain. Nor could shipping last long, if they were caught napping; but as the thunder kept up an incessant din for half an hour before the blow begun, probably old sailors were prepared for it. We shall soon hear more.—Detroit Advertiser.

Hydrophobia.—We regret to learn that several instances of rabies have been encountered in this city. Ten at least of the dogs killed exhibited symptons of hydrophobia. On Tuesday of last week four men were bitten, in 22d street, near 2d Avenue, by a large rabid dog—and a colored child was bitten in 22 street, near 6th Avenue, the week previous, by a large dog belonging to the child's mother. Another man was also bitten by a rabid dog, in Attorney street, and it is to be apprehended that some if not all of these unfortunates, will be attacked with and die of hydrophobia. The dogs that inflicted the bites were all destroyed. Much difficulty has been thrown in the way of the officers and men by crowds of idle boys, and by men and women also, who have repeatedly attacked them, and tried to get them mobbed. Some of those have been arrested and confined, and it is determined to enforce the severe penalties of the law against all who violate its provisions. 604 dogs have been killed since the killing commenced.—N. Y. Tatler

Horrid attempt at Murder.—A hardened wretch by the name of Joseph Nichols, of Murray, was committed to Jail in this village, on the 6th inst., for an attempt to murder his wife on the 5th, by cutting her throat. It appears that he had lived with his present wife but a short time, before his abusive treatment compelled her to leave him, for the safety of her person.—Two days before he committed the deed, we are informed he ground a bowie knife and declared his intention to kill his wife and a Mr. Purdy with whom she was then living, who, at the time was confined to his bed with sickness. On the 5th he entered Purdy's house and inquired of Mrs. Purdy for his wife. On being told that she was in the next room, he went in and asked for Purdy, of his wife. On finding that he was in a bed-room adjoining, he made for the room, when his wife interfered, which it seems, provoked him to despatch her first. He seized her by the hair of her head, and with his knife, severed the large cord on the side of her neck, cutting it to the bone,—and, we learn, nearly severed the jugular vein, and one of her fingers.—In the struggle she folded her arms over her throat, which probably prevented his completing the work of death on the spot. Mrs. Purdy also interfered and gave the alarm, when the wretch fled, but was quickly pursued and arrested. His wife, most horribly mangled, still lingers, and it is said there is a faint hope of her recovery.—American Standard.

When I see a professor of religion caring little or nothing for religious publications, which convey the interesting news of Immanuel's conquests, of revivals, &c., I fear he takes but little interest in the Redeemer's cause.

POETRY.

From the Cincinnati Chronicle.

There's music in the mountain stream,
Whose foaming waters never fail,
And in the gentle murmuring brook,
When slowly winding through the vale;
There's music in the woodland grove,
When zephyrs sport among the trees,
And plumaged songsters tune their lay,
Assisted by the rustling leaves;
There's music in the lovely dell,
When one frail flowret fades in death,
And weeping sisters bow their heads—
Lament her fate, then yield their breath.
'Tis music which can charm the heart,
While days and moments onward roll,
And like the thought of former joys,
It's sweet, yet mournful, to the soul.
But could there be Elysian fields,
Where Earth's transplanted flowerets grow,
Where faded leaves their sisters meet,
And rippling waters constant flow,
What choral music then would rise,
When floweret met her sister fair,
And faded leaves regain'd that stem
On which they grew and flourish'd here!
Yet music of a sweeter strain
Is heard from Heaven's etherial dome;
When seraph's harp and angel's tongue
Proclaim earth's flowerets welcome home.

TOWN AND COUNTRY.

BY JOHN A DIX.

At the very moment when cities put on their worst aspect, and the country is fairest and most attractive, it may not seem altogether consistent with impartial justice to set up a comparison between them. And yet it will not be difficult, we apprehend, to hold the balance even. That cities possess some superiorities over the country, particularly at less genial seasons of the year, will not be disputed. When our friends in the interior are blocked up by mountains of snow, and the intercommunications of pleasure and business among them are difficult, if not impracticable, each man among us shovels off his twenty-five feet front of side-walk, under an enlivening sense of the fine for neglect thereof, and we pass from one extremity of the city to the other, with as little obstruction as in the heat of summer. But cities have some superiorities over the country at all seasons. They contain, in a more concentrated shape, the means of intellectual improvement. Extensive libraries, reading rooms, and book-stores are there to be found, furnishing information on almost all subjects, and in almost all languages. The perpetual contact and collision into which mind is brought with mind, quicken the intellect and keep it in constant preparation for conflict. Men are, as it were, always within pistol-shot of each other, walking the streets and laying down at night their intellectual weapons sharpened, and their harness buckled to their backs. Yet we must concede that the country has some advantage over us in certain departments of mental labor. Its shades, its tranquility, and its repose are peculiarly adapted to meditation. He, who would penetrate the depths of a subject, will more readily attain his object in its cool and quiet retreats, than in the heart of a city, with its bustle and its tumult to distract his thoughts and disturb his processes of investigation.

But assuming for the city some superiority in the particulars adverted to, how do we sink in the comparison when we turn to other views of the subject! Let us look about us, and see what is our condition now. It is midsummer: we are in the very middle of the sign Leo; and the "dog-star rages." Let us look at the thermometer—92 degrees in the shade! What a suffocating heat, and no escape from it! The rich man did not long for a drop of water from the finger of Lazarus more eagerly than we for a mouthful of air fresh from the towering Catskill or the martial Helderbergh, which we see in the distance. We close our windows and blinds and shut out the light of day, under the suggestion of a philosophical friend that light and heat are in some degree inseparable, and that if we exclude the one we get rid of a portion of the other. We sit down in this artificial twilight of our dwellings, and find life supportable. But business calls us out. We must be at our counting-rooms, our offices and our work-shops: we have a cause to try at the Circuit: some good friend in the interior has sent us money to pay taxes, or a power of attorney to procure a pension for one of the gallant spirits who shed his blood in asserting our independence, and we must see the Comptroller or the Pension Agent: we have promised to meet our friend Jenkins at his rooms, and assist him in that ugly business with which he is entangled. We are in the streets. There is not a cloud in the sky, and the sun shines out with equatorial splendor. He has just reached a point in the heavens, from which he looks straight down the street we are to walk through, leaving not a foot of shade on either side for shelter. There is no choice but to face him in all his fierceness. The pavements and side-walks are heated to the temperature of a furnace. Our soles are none of the lightest; but our feet burn as we tread these pavements of brick, which seem fresh from the baking. We pass along the street. The sun has been shining for hours on the fronts of these houses, which are exhaling, for our discomfort, the heat they have absorbed. Here comes a cart heavily laden, dragged painfully over the pavement. The horse is struggling with his load, panting at least thrice for every step he takes; and the carman is looking doubtfully for a dry spot in his red bandanna handkerchief, to wipe off the streams that are pouring down his mottled visage. An unhappy cur, with his nose muzzled under the dog-law, has just passed along. Are our Common Council ignorant of the natural history of the animal, or did they invent this torment for the express purpose of making him mad by shutting up his tongue in his mouth, and thus close the principal outlet for his surplus heat? A half a dozen laborers have gathered under this awning, for want of a better shade. They have just finished their half days labor, and are breathing a moment before they encounter the fiery ordeal, through which they are to pass to their dinner. What would they not give, of the little they have to give, if they could exchange places with one of the thousand groupes of their fellow-laborers in the field, who, at this very moment, are finishing their lunch under a tree of impenetrable shade, and are preparing to lie down for an hour upon the bosom of their mother earth, with the purest air all around, and the grass and ground and wild flowers beneath them, sending up freshness and fragrance? What a contrast to all this do we present! We have covered up the fair face of our mother with bricks and paving-stones: a few trees scattered along the streets, tantalize us with conceptions of shade, which we are not to realize; narrow patches of grass of a few feet in length, in front or rear of our dwellings, parched brown, meet the eye here and there—solemn monuments, as they are, of the broader surfaces, which we have overspread and buried alive under our contrivances to hide the face of nature.

But, the heat of the day is past, and the night is falling alike over the face of the country and the town, We begin at length to think we breathe more freely. The streets are no longer blazing with the rays of the sun; but alas! they have been gathering heat all the day long, and they are now giving it out as we pass through them, in streams as sensible as the breath of a volcano. Those, who keep or can afford to hire vehicles, have driven out of town, and are breathing the free air, or snatch hasty glimpses of the field and trees before they are lost in the darkness. These are the favored few. The lot of most of us is to pass the evening and the night where we have passed the day—in the heart of the city. And, in spite of its heated atmosphere, there is something animating in its aspect at the early hours of night—in its long lines of flickering lamps, in the numberless lights that stream from the windows of its dwellings, and in the hundreds and thousands that are seen in the streets, sitting at their porches or making the flinty pavements vocal with their tread.

But the hour of rest has come, bringing new discomforts with it. As the air begins to grow cool and fit for the renovation of our drooping bodies and spirits, we must shut it out. This is the overruling necessity of every night. The city burgess of the middle ages was not more vigilant to close up the inlets to his fortified dwelling than we to shut up our less martial tenements—he against the feudal enemy, and we against the house-breaker and the thief. But there are great occasions which call for fresh precautions. The evening papers tell us that a gang of desperate villains are abroad, and that our property and our lives are in danger. What a peering into the condition of locks and fastenings do these warnings produce! We examine every window, we lock and bar and double-bolt the street door, and shut up every opening through which the breath of night can gain admittance. The dog has his proper station assigned him. We bring forth our pocket-pistols, see that they are loaded, put fresh caps on them, and place them within reach of our bed. Thus prepared for the most desperate extremities, we commit ourselves to the care of a superintending Providence, brooding over apprehended invasions of our domestic altars by our fellow-man, and with a host of bloody resolutions at our hearts.

These, however, are eras in our lives.—We are not always thus belligerent. But in our best estate there is no lack of discomfort. We must lie down at night in steaming bed-chambers until the summer heats are over, and rise in the morning, unrefreshed, for the repetition of the same scenes through which we passed yesterday. Nor are we comforted by the frequent suggestions which spring up within us, as to the condition of him, who, in the calm and quiet retreats of the country, lays his head upon his pillow, with the cool breath of Heaven pouring in at every door and every window, thrown wide open to receive it, and sinks to rest with the assurance that, amid such evidences of the power and beneficence of the Almighty as those which surround him, no impious hand will be raised to take from him his property or shed his blood.

But of the country we will not speak, while we have at hand a friend, who discourses of it with the eloquence and fervor of a poet, and the feeling of a man.

THE WOOLLY BEAR.

"A woolly bear! a woolly bear!" cried little Robert, as he bent down to smell at a full-blown rose in his father's garden. Robert's father, being near at hand, walked to the spot, when he saw one of those fine hairy grubs which are called woolly bears, making the best of his way from one side of the gravel walk to the other.

Little Robert left the rose-bush to watch the woolly bear, whose legs moved at a rapid rate under his body, while the hairs on the creature's back were all in commotion.

"Tell me," said Robert's father, "how many hairs the woolly bear has on his back." "Oh," said Robert, "I could not count them for the world." "Tell me, then," said his father, "how many strides he takes to go across the gravel walk." "Indeed, I can not tell," replied Robert, "for he has so many legs, and moves them so very fast, that I can not tell at all how many strides he will take." "Well, then," said Robert's papa, "I will ask you but one more question about the woolly bear; can you tell me on what errand he is going, that makes him in such a hurry?" But Robert was as much at fault in giving an answer to this question as to the others.

"As you seem to know so little about the woolly bear," said Robert's father, "I will tell you something about him that may surprise you. In a week or a fortnight he will build himself a house, or rather, he will spin himself a dwelling place, in which he will shut himself up for a time, and appear as if he were dead, and then, all at once, he will come out afresh in a new suit of clothes. His furry great coat will be cast aside, and he will appear in a rich brown and white coat, and a bright orange waistcoat and trowsers, so that you would not know him in his new apparel."

Little Robert thought his father was joking about the woolly bear, but yet he hardly knew what to make of the matter. No sooner did his father leave the garden than Robert ran into the house to seek for Betty, and to beg from her a cup, or something of that kind, that he might put the woolly bear into it, and feed it there, for then he should find out whether his papa had been joking or not.

Good-humored Betty soon found a cup for the woolly bear; it was a white one, wide at the top, just such a cup or pot as we sometimes see brought to a table full of black current jam, or preserved gooseberries. Into this cup, Mr. Woolly Bear was put, with a lettuce leaf or two; he soon began to eat the lettuce leaves, and seemed as happy as a woolly bear could be.

Every day little Robert fed the woolly bear with a fresh lettuce leaf, and every day he watched him to see if he had begun to build his house. At last, the woolly bear gave over eating. It was of no use to put a fresh leaf into the cup, for he would not teach it. Soon after this, he began to spin, fastening his silky threads to the side of the cup, and to the top of a lettuce leaf in it that had become dry.

Little Robert now began to think that what his papa had said was all true, and not a joke; so he kept watching the woolly bear for a short time every day, till the insect had nearly covered himself over.—What surprised Robert the most, was, that the woolly bear pulled off the hairs from his own back, to spin them up with his web. For some weeks, the web did not alter its appearance, though the woolly bear inside it, became less and less, until it seemed covered up in a kind of husk or shell.

One morning, before little Robert had gone to the white cup to look at the web, Betty came running to him with great joy, to tell him that the woolly bear had come out of his house, dressed up in his new clothes. Robert lost not a moment, but scampered off as fast as he could to the white cup.

How surprised was little Robert at what he saw. There was nothing like a woolly bear there, but, clinging to the side of a cup, was one of the most beautiful butterflies he had ever seen. It was about an inch and a half long, with wings of a fine chocolate color, prettily marked with yellowish white streaks, in different forms. Underneath his upper wings he had another pair, somewhat less, and these, and the whole of his body, were of a bright orange color.

"Well," cried little Robert, clapping his hands with delight, "it is just as papa said it would be. There is Mr. Wooly Bear come out of his house in a new suit of clothes; he has thrown away his furry great coat, and is dressed up in a rich brown and white coat, and a bright orange waistcoat and trowsers."

At this moment, little Robert's papa came to have a peep at the woolly bear turned into a butterfly. The beautiful insect, as if glad to be alive, crawled out of the cup on to the table, and then on Betty's hand and arm, every now and then opening his wings, and showing his fine rich dress beneath it.

After this the butterfly ran about the floor and Robert laughed heartily, for he would have it that the butterfly was running after Betty. It was some time before little Robert was sober enough to listen to any serious remark; but when his papa saw his face look a little grave, as if he was thinking about the woolly bear being changed into a butterfly, he spoke thus to little Robert:—

"My dear boy, you were pleased when the woolly bear ran across the garden walk, and when it began to spin itself a dwelling, and you are still more pleased now, when it is changed into a beautiful butterfly; you have seen this wonderful change with your own eyes, and will, no doubt, always remember it. Now God, who brought about this change, is always doing things equally wonderful in every part of the world.

"Forget not, that he who made the woolly bear made you—that he made all people; and that so great is his love for mankind, that he gave his Son to die for sinners.—He has promised that after we are dead and have been laid in the grave, he will raise us up again; that these bodies of ours shall be newly formed, and that all who trust in his mercy and love, and serve and obey him, shall dwell with him in glory.

"Every promise that he has made us he will be sure to keep; but if ever, in reading his holy word, you should be tempted for one moment to think any thing too hard for God, call to mind how easily he changed the woolly bear into a butterfly."

The ways of nature, like those of God, are past man's finding out.—Baker.

THE EFFECTS OF DRUNKENNESS.

The great Lord Chancellor Bacon's opinion of drunkenness was, that "All the crimes on the earth do not destroy so many of the human race, nor alienate so much property as drunkenness."

Some go so far as to say that there are no advantages to be obtained from drunkenness, but let such read the following twenty-one attainments which are the invariable offspring of that delectable practice, and say are they not advantages?

1. If you wish to render yourself unfit for rational enjoyments, and rational intercourse, become a drunkard, and that will fully accomplish the end.

2. If you wish to become a fool, be a drunkard, for that will soon destroy your understanding.

3. If you wish your prospects in life to become dark and clouded, be a drunkard, and they will become dark and clouded enough.

4. If you would destroy your bodily health, be a drunkard, for drunkenness is the mother of disease.

5. If you would ruin your soul, be a drunkard; for the drunkard shall not enter into the kingdom of heaven.

6. If you would be a suicide, be a drunkard, for thousands have brought themselves to a premature grave by drunkenness.

7. If you would expose your secrets, as well as your folly, be a drunkard; for they will run out as the brandy runs in.

8. If you are plagued with robust health and a strong bodily constitution, be a drunkard; and you will reduce both to debility and disease.

9. If you would get rid of your money and wealth without the trouble of knowing how, be a drunkard; and they will vanish insensibly from you.

10. If, when unable to labor, you would have no resource but that of a work-house, be a drunkard; and you will be unable to provide any other.

11. If you are anxious to expel all harmony and happiness from your domestic circle, be a drunkard; and discord with all her train of evils will assuredly follow.

12. If you would have yourself always under public suspicion, be a drunkard; for, little as you may think of it, almost all agree that those who would rob themselves and families, would also rob another.

13. If you would be reduced to the necessity of shunning your creditors, be a drunkard; and you will soon have reason to skulk out of the public ways and betake yourself to by-paths, or remain within doors.

14. If you are fond of the amusement of court of conscience, be a drunkard; and ten to one but you will be fully gratified.

15. If you would be a dead weight on the community—'a cumberer of the ground,' be a drunkard; for that will render you useless, helpless, burdensome and expensive.

16. If you would be a nuisance in society, be a drunkard; for the breath of the drunkard is like a pestilential vapor, his appearance slovenly, idiotic, and ridiculous, and his example, in word and action, hateful and pernicious.

17. If you would be odious to your family and friends, be a drunkard; and you will certainly become so.

18. If you would be a pest to society, be a drunkard; and you will be avoided by every good and virtuous person, as if tainted with some deadly infection.

19. If you dread remonstrance, and if you feel a horror of being reclaimed, be a drunkard; and that will render you impervious to every salutary admonition.

20. If you would smash windows and lamps, break the peace of society, and your homes also—tumble under carts, off horses, off buildings, out of rail road cars, be locked up in the watch-house, dungeons, &c.; be a drunkard, and it is strange if you do not succeed.

21. Finally, if you are determined to be utterly destroyed in estate, body and soul, be a drunkard; and you will find that it is impossible to adopt a more effectual means to accomplish your end.

VIATOR.

HAY MAKING.

BY S. W. JEWETT.

Hay making is one of the most essential theories in agriculture, and perhaps one where the practical operation of profit and loss, is as much varied as any one process in farming.

With regard to the mowing of grass, in general, for hay, the workmen should be made to cut as low as possible, by which the crop is increased; if it be wet by dew or rain, hands should be ready to shake it out immediately after the scythe. As soon as the external wet is dried off, it should be raked and secured into cocks of seventy-five or one hundred pounds.

It may be proper here to remark, that the hard hay of a poor soil is little subject to heating, which often occurs with that on rich soil made of succulent herbage. The latter, therefore, requires longer time for its making.

To preserve as much of the sap of grass as possible, without increasing the danger of firing, is, in my view, the grand practical problem of hay making. To effect this, grass should be put immediately into small hay cocks about four feet high, not by rolling, but by laying one fork full upon another, and of as small a diameter at the base as they can be made to stand with, giving each of them a slight kind of thatching, by drawing a few hands-full of the hay from the bottom of the cock all around, and laying it lightly upon the top with one of the ends hanging downwards. This is done with the utmost ease and expedition; and when once in that state, the hay is in a great measure out of danger; for unless a violent wind should arise immediately after the cocks are put up, nothing else can hurt the hay; as no rain, however violent, can penetrate these cocks but for a very little way; and if they are put up dry, they never lie together so closely as to heat, although they acquire in a day or two such a degree of firmness as to be in no danger of being afterwards overturned by wind unless it blows a hurricane.

If there should come rain upon the cocks many times, it will be proper to give them an airing before they are removed to the barn; and more especially that portion which comes in contact with the ground. In such cases, the first drying wind, or fair day, lay them over into tramp cocks, by placing the top of the cock on the ground and putting two or more together; in this way the hay is secured until the maker wishes to remove it to the stack, yard or barn.

Clover hay should remain longer in the cock than other grasses, that all the larger stems may undergo their proper fermentation. Hay cured in this manner being rather heavy at the time of its removal to the mow, the process is every year condemned by our laborers; but we find no hay that opens more bright and sweet than that which is cured in this manner.

The old mode in which I was first educated to make hay, by spreading and turning, is not only more expensive in curing, but the value of the hay is lessened at least one-third.

Where the grass is matured and thin, the weather being good, it may be only the business of a day; but this can not be the case with a heavy burden or early mown hay; the grass being cut when full of juices, the succulent stalks require time as well as sunshine to part with their moisture. When spread and exposed to the hot sun, the leaves and exterior parts soon dry, but the interior parts of the larger growth are not divested of their moisture. If housed in this stage of the curing process, it is sure to undergo, in the evaporation, an overheating in the mow; or if it is exposed to dry by the effects of wind and sun, so thoroughly as to prevent any after damage, then the leaves and blossoms which constitute the best parts of the hay, are over dried, crumble, and are lost.

It is asserted by distillers of plants, that to procure the most oil, they must not be dried in the sun, as it not only lessens the quantity of oil, but also diminishes the flavor. When the plants are allowed to undergo a severe fermentation by being packed in heaps so as to heat, it diminishes the oil, sugar, or mucilage, also; which properties are the life-giving essentials to all the animal creation.

Most plants produce more oil when distilled full in the blow: clover should be cut in this stage; this hay is eagerly devoured by stock, and affords the most nutriment if well cured at this period, as above advised, but cattle reject it, and would nearly starve rather than to eat coarse clover that has been whitened out in the sun.

Herds-grass or timothy should be cut when nearly ripe, as the latter math and seed adds to the value of the crop; red-top may be the last hay-grass that is to be cut, as it grows in moist lands.

On our clay soils, where both timothy and clover abound, if the first part of the season be dry, and the middle and latter season be wet, it is better for the mixed crop to stand a greater length of time; because the after math may gain more by standing than the first crop will lose by seasonably cutting.

I generally let the grass ripen, that some seed may fall every other year to the ground, to prevent a degeneration, and to keep the land well stocked. To effect this, we reverse our mowing by cutting first this season the field which was the last to receive the scythe last year.

We also use as little salt as possible at the time of putting up our hay: the best time and method of feeding salt to stock in winter, is to brine the hay in the more mild or warmest days, when the stock have the least appetite; in this way we find a ready market for our poorest hay, as sheep and cattle will devour it with avidity if well brined. I am of the opinion that salt is not good but injurious to stock, if they are obliged to take much of it in cold weather. By brining the hay, say one quart of salt to five of water, for one hundred sheep, once or twice a week or less, every warm spell, it will increase their appetite and digestion, and is a preventive against the scours in sheep, and other cattle; hay also when cured in the cock is not as liable to produce the above disease as it is when half cured in the sun, and then mow burned.

I was greatly prejudiced against the horse rake, until I was frequently advised by other judicious farmers to give it a trial. We soon found it equal to two extra hands in collecting hay, to say nothing about the greater profit in avoiding the exposure to rains.

Where the grass is heavy, wet, or quite green, we follow the scythe, and spread the grass, as soon as partially wilted. We rake first one way with a revolving horse rake; sufficient help follows, with forks to put it into cocks; then the ground is all cross raked, and by this process a field of eight or ten acres may be secured in a short time. We thus gather it up as clean, as it would be if raked by hand. Thus by laying prejudice aside, (by the way, farmers are apt to have too much of it,) long enough to give it a fair trial, we have been the gainer full ten-fold.

A Pamphlet describing the merits of this highly popular and beneficial Medicine, will be given any one wishing to become acquainted with its qualities. The uniform success of this Medicine has rendered it the "Ne Plus Ultra" of the day. Medical gentlemen have had to acknowledge its benefits and yield to its sway.

DR. WATERMAN'S

RHEUMATIC AND STRENGTHENING PLASTER.

The peculiarities of this compound are owing to the immediate effects produced on the animal fibre, it being carried by the absorbants to the seat of disease or pain, without producing disagreeable sensations. As an external application it is a powerful auxiliary, and will cure, in all curable cases; such as acute and chronic Rheumatisms, Scrofulous Affections, weakness of back, pain in the side, head and limbs, affections of the Spine &c. &c &c.

This Plaster is warranted to be by far the best ever offered to the public—much superior to "Jew David, or Hebrew Plaster," and at less than half the price.

WINSLOW'S

BALSAM OF HOREHOUND.

An unparalleled remedy for common Colds, Coughs, Asthma, Influenza, Whooping Cough, Bronchitis, and all diseases of the Breast and Lungs, leading to Consumption; composed of the concentrated virtues of Horehound, Boneset, Blood Root, Liverwort, and several other vegetable substances. Prepared only by J. M. WINSLOW, Rochester, N. Y.

The known and universally admitted pectoral virtues of the Herbs from which the BALSAM OF HOREHOUND is made, are too generally known to need recommendation; it is therefore only necessary to observe that the Medicine contains the whole of their Medicinal properties, highly concentrated, and so happily combined with several other vegetable substances, as to render it the most speedy, mild and certain remedy, now in use, for the complaints above mentioned.

Thousands of testimonials will be shown, if wanted, at any time, placing the above medicines beyond reproach.

In conclusion he would only say, that he will not be under-sold on any article which he offers for sale

MORAL INFLUENCE OF GREAT CITIES.

BY REV. JOHN TODD.

Great cities, in proportion to their wealth and population, must decide the character of the nation. Let them be filled with the influences of religion, and with the waters of life, and the whole nation bathes in them; let them become corrupt—the depositories of all that is polluted in the land—and they are the great slaughter-houses of the soul, and the recruiting places of the world of darkness.

The parents who live here, and the parents who send their sons here—the absent mothers, who spend sleepless nights, praying that their children may be shielded from temptation, are not the only people who are interested in the moral character of the great city. The whole land is interested.

Here, unprotected and unsuspecting youth walks over concealed pit-falls—and what can throw a shield over him, to protect him from temptation—and what hand will grasp his and keep him from falling? Here mind is gathered, excited, restless, sleepless—and what can make it feel its responsibility to live for man and for God? What can prevent the great city from becoming an awful charnel-house—what, if not the religion of the heart—the religion of the Bible?

O! what mind will come and cool the feverish, refresh the weary, invigorate the feeble, give nerve to the strong for high and noble doing, except the breath of the Almighty! And when you think of this everchanging mass—these hopes constantly withering—when you think that out of every thirty or forty that you see thronging these streets, one must every year drop into the grave, and be forgotten—will you say that we are out of the way when we plead, that if there be one spot on earth beyond all others, which needs the religion of Christ, in all its powers, that spot is the great city?

Upon other spots sweeter dews may fall; over other spots brighter rainbows may hang; around other spots there may be more of poetry and of romance—more that seems like the garden of Eden before the serpent entered it—but at no point do the arrows of death fall so rapidly, and with such fearful certainty—upon no point of the foot-stool of God is the demoralization and death going on with such terrible power—and over no spot are the shouts of the spirits accursed so loud, as that point which we call the great city.

When the great city, in modern times, throws off the authority of God, and becomes so proud as to take its fate into its own hands, the angel of wo does not now come as he came to Sodom, with the phial of wrath in his hand—not as he paused over Babylon, with the mill-stone in his hand—not as he stood in Jerusalem, waving the drawn sword—not in the shock of war, as he hurled Nineveh from her old foundations, and trampled Jerusalem under foot; but he now comes unseen, and cuts the cords which bind men to conscience, and the judgments of God come in the shape of a hardening heart, and a seared conscience, and the city is cursed by being only a wide gate-way into the world of eternal sinning.

Oh! the city—the great city!—thou personification of all that is great, and splendid, and glorious, and magnificent among mortals—thou hast no walls to protect thee, no gates of brass to shut any thing out from thee; but, when I think of the multitudes of busy dreamers, each of whom might shine as the sun, in the firmament of heaven, to all eternity; when I think of thy wealth, which, if consecrated to God, might make the distant mountain and valley ring for joy; when I think of thy talents, which might devise and execute a highway for our God; when I think of thy fashions and follies which are the sea in which such multitudes float down to ruin; when I think of the cold graves, which hide so many of thy sons and daughters every week; when I think of that multitude of souls, so feverish, so restless, so longing for somebody to show them something good; when I think of thy sins, so great, so constantly crying to heaven for vengeance; and when I think of that long, long eternity which we must shortly meet—I tremble, and bless God that, with a feeble voice, though with the impotency of dust and ashes, I may speak to these my hearers, and beg their prayers, their sympathies, and their hearts, for the work of saving the great cities of our land. I shall try, God permitting, on a future occasion, to tell them, what they may do, and how they may do it. In the meantime, let it be written on the heart, that the man who lives and acts as a member of the great city, has a vast responsibility resting upon him. He has abundant opportunities to do good; and fearful will be his account if he neglects and wastes them. The ship in which he has taken his passage to the eternal world, is freighted with treasures which worlds could not purchase. All around are the rocks, and the quicksands, and the ten thousand dangers. This cargo can be landed safely—and everlasting songs of gratitude shall be poured upon the head of every one who is faithful; but fearfully will he meet his doom, who lived and died on such a spot, and all he did was to help men to unfit themselves for heaven.

Examples do not authorize a fault. Vice must never plead prescription.

From the New York Evangelist.

ALTAR FIRES.

"The fire shall ever be burning upon the altar: it shall never go out."—Lev. vi. 13.

This was the direction given by the Most High to the priests of ancient Israel; but is there not in it, Christian, a spiritual adaptation to thine own duties and obligations?

I saw one who had recently devoted himself to the service of Christ. He no longer insulted the majesty of God by offering "strange fire;" the flame upon the altar, though faint and flickering, was pure, and tended heavenward. Carefully did he guard that trembling flame—assiduously did he watch it, and constantly did he fan it with the breath of prayer. By degrees it rose higher, and burned more vigorously, and the light of it was seen from afar. He was pleased with its brightness, and began to feel that it might now sustain itself, and that a little less watching and care would be quite as well. So he sometimes left it for hours together—and while he was "busy here and there," about his necessary business, as he considered it, the flame had well nigh expired. He returned one year to his neglected altar—and though the darkness of night was gathering around, he could perceive but a faint and dying radiance. Alarmed, he anxiously hastened to gather the dying embers, to rekindle the flame, and supply anew the aliment needful to sustain it. The remembrance of long days of neglect flashed across his mind, and as he saw to what fearful danger he had been exposed, he trembled for himself. The alarm was salutary, for a time he was watchful, and the flame burned clear.

I looked again towards the altar. The sunshine of prosperity shone brightly upon it, and upon him who guarded it, and beneath its beams the sacred fire grew dim. The flame had died away, and the only token of life was in the scattered embers, almost extinct among the ashes; yet he whom it most concerned, heeded it not.

Yet again I looked. The night of adversity had come upon him; for the beloved of his heart, "the desire of his eyes" had been taken from him "at a stroke."—He lay in the dust, and his altar fire was disregarded. She who would have assisted him to watch and cherish it, had gone to the dead; what inducement had he now in his loneliness and brokenness of spirit to arise and watch? Thus he mourned, and almost murmured, till the Compassionate One passed that way and looked upon him. With words of gentleness, he spoke of the bitter chastisement, and of the stern necessity, in a worldly and idolatrous spirit, which had called for it from a loving Father's hand. Then in accents of encouragement he added, "He doth not afflict willingly, nor grieve the children of men." "No chastening for the present seemeth to be joyous but grievous; nevertheless, afterward, it yieldeth the peaceable fruit of righteousness." The heart of the mourner was touched and broken—but with another than earthly sorrow, and he arose from the earth in a strength not his own, resolved still to watch and labor, though bereft of his dearest earthly joy. He did more, for he offered upon that altar the incense of his bruised and crushed affections, and from it a sweet fragrance, "well pleasing unto God," ascended towards heaven.

Christian, how burns the fire upon thy family altar? Are thine own offerings, and those of all thy household daily laid there, at the time of the morning and the evening sacrifice? Are they all "pure and holy," as the ancient incense was required to be? Does the fire ever burn clear, so that an holy one like Manoah's angel, might in that flame descend from heaven to bless those who are kneeling there?

How burns thy closet fire? No eye marks it but his "who seeth in secret;" to him let conscience answer. Since the day that he had mercy on thee, what light has illumined the hallowed apartment where he appointed to meet thee? The fire that burns there was first kindled from heaven; has no unhallowed incense mingled with that pure flame? How burned it this morning? Shall the evening shades still find it bright and clear? Ah! Christian, guard it well; the fire upon that altar should "ever be burning." Never should it be suffered to grow dim, till its flame, earthly as it is, though tending upwards, shall be exchanged for the unclouded light of heaven.

C. C.

"WITHOUT GOD."

"The fool hath said in his heart, there is no God." A fool, indeed, he must be; for an idea more pregnant with all that is horrible, I confess myself unable to conceive. I do not mean its contrariety to reason; though, in that respect, the individual who cherishes it may be denominated a "fool;" but I speak of its fatal influence on all that is dear to the human mind. No God! Banish then, all confidence in the present, all faith in the future; a lawless chance presides in the universe. The glorious sun knows no fixed government; or, if it rules the day, and sheds its heavenly light around us, there is required but a contrary bias in matter, and it shivers into a thousand fantastic motes, destined but to blind. Order, whose voice is heard by the stars in their courses, is expelled from its throne, and chaos exults in their confusion. And life—life which is seen waving in the beauteous verdure of the field, which is felt thrilling and throbbing in our hearts, and seems to glow throughout the universe; life expires and sinks into torpor, or disappears in anguish and despair. No God!—I know not, then, when some of the planets shall rush from their spheres, and spread destruction wide around—I know not when some monster shall spring from the womb of nature, whose errand shall be pestilence and death—I know not when the passions of man shall be let loose, and all this confusion become worse confounded. No God! My mind seems torn from its centre, and all nature to feel conscious alarm. I see but shapeless masses and spectral horrors; I hear but the roar of elements, and am myself tossed, whirled, and agonized in the fathomless profound. No God! The thought is enough to scare reason from its throne, and to despoil the intellect of its every power.

But such is not the fact. There is a God; and the thought is the return of life, and order, and joy. There is a God; and, therefore, spring brightens into the beauty of summer, and autumn, in its season, comes with the horn of abundance. There is a God; and, therefore, night is clothed with its starry garb, and distils on our eyelids the blessing of repose; and day comes with the rod of its power, unveiling the face of nature, and opening the sources of joy. There is a God; and, therefore, love still warms our spirits, and animates us yet more and more. There is a God of the present; and, therefore, our earth runs its course through the heavens, and marks its periods of revolution until all the purposes of beneficence are accomplished.—And God is no less a God of the future, inhabiting eternity; and never shall the light of his countenance cease to smile on creation, until the voice from his throne is heard to diffuse happiness which eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, nor the heart of man conceived.

How delightful the consideration, that such a Being there is—One who has given us all things richly to enjoy, and at whose right hand are pleasures for ever more—One with whom is the fountain of life, and without whom all is death! Without whom, did I say? Without God? Surely, the idea is impossible. By him, all that is, was made—by him, all that is, subsists—in him we live, and move, and have our being.—His eye is on the smile of the child, and his glance on the tenderness of the mother. His are the tones of a friend, and his the voice of a parent. Of him, and to him, and by him, are all things; existence without him, is, therefore, impossible; nature had its birth in his smile, and his smile alone perpetuates its course. He willed it, and we came into being: he wills it again, and we die.—Rev. G. Legg.

THE SPIRIT OF GOD SPEAKS TO ALL.

My friend, art thou young, full of hope and lofty expectations? Doth life seem all a fairy land, covered with a fresh verdure, lit by a golden light, and crowded with a a sweet perfume? The spirit of God speaks to thee. It speaks in the history of human nature, in the ruin of confident hopes, in the sad disasters, the broken careers, the baffled projects, the weary and sad hours of millions, who have trod earth's pilgrimage before thee. It speaks to awaken thee from thy dreams, to call thy young affections, thy vigorous thoughts, thy warm desires, to the contemplation of the beauty of holiness—the power of religion—the bliss of heaven!

My friend, art thou old? Dost thou look back upon a weary life of change? Are the friends of thy youth gone? Is thy step feeble, thine eye dim, thy body weakened? Art thou almost ready to exclaim, all is vanity? Well then, the Spirit of God speaks to thee. It speaks in the events of threescore years and ten. It tells you that the fashion of earth passes away. It points to your opening grave, and bids you think of a better world and prepare your soul for its Maker's presence.

My friend, art thou a parent? Hast thou a parent's hopes, a parent's fears? Desirest thou the welfare of thy offspring? Oh! how solemnly speaks the Spirit of God to thee. It speaks in that little band of immortal spirits around you. It tells you how by every careless word, by every irreligious act, by the worldliness of your life, you are perhaps bringing on them destruction as terrible as it is sure. It bids you think as a father should think, fear as a mother should fear; and to remember God hath no retribution more fearful than that laid up for a faithless parent.

My friend, art thou a man? Hast thou an immortal soul? Does thy heart never beat against the sides of its prison house, that its longing desires may be released?—Is thy mind never moved by quick stirring thought? Art thou pressing ever onward and upward? Art thou conscious of thy powers? Knowest thou that thy capacities are boundless, and wouldst thou satisfy them? The Spirit of God speaks to thee. It bids thee fill thy hungry soul with heaven's truth, warm thy affections into an everlasting love of holiness, and busy thy mind in making all things work together for good. Thus speaks, thus burns, the Spirit of God. And now wilt thou, youth—and thou, age—and thou, father—and thou, mother—and thou, man—wilt thou quench the Spirit of God.—Rev. T. B. Fox.

FOREIGN MISSIONS.—It has been suggested that a great point with Missionary Societies should be to educate pious natives—that is, such as apparently have the necessary talent—for the office of the Christian ministry; and the main point of value in such an education is, that the education should be in the English language—for this simple and plain reason, that if the English language is acquired, the whole of English theology, in its almost endless variety of books, is at once within the reach of a person so prepared; and it is equally evident, that without a knowledge of others than his own language, it is necessary that theological works should be translated into it before he can understand them. The time, the labor, the expense of such translations, is an effectual bar to prevent such an accomplishment. If our great missionary societies had commenced twenty years ago on that plan of educating native preachers of talent in the English language, what a multitude would there have been, at this time, of men, inured to their own climate, with means of information, by reading our own theology equal to English missionaries.—London Patriot.

ARTESIAN WELLS.

BY WILLIS GAYLORD.

The practice of boring the earth to a great depth for the purpose of obtaining water, has become very common both in Europe and in this country, and the success which has almost uniformly attended undertakings to raise water to the surface in this way, would seem to render the practice proper whenever water is with difficulty procured, or the geological position of the strata such as to warrant the boring.

The theory of Artesian wells is easily understood. The crust of the earth is deposited in layers, some of which are porous, filled with cavities, and pervious to water, while others are impenetrable by that fluid. These layers are bent, broken, or contorted; in some places having one inclination, and in other places a different one, and in some places having been wholly removed. Now it is evident that where a porous strata reaches the surface, if the place of cropping out is its most elevated part, as it frequently is, whatever water is received at this point must descend the porous strata, until it finds some method of escape to the surface at some lower point, or failing in this, to remain in the deepest part of the porous strata, confined by the impenetrable strata above. Sometimes by a dislocation of strata, this descent of water to what would have been the natural place of escape, is interrupted, and the effect of an impervious dam throwing the water upwards or backwards to its source, is produced. In either of these cases if a hole is bored into the strata containing the water at any point lower than its source, the water will rise to the surface, and forming a constant stream, constitute what is called an Artesian well. From the nature of the case, it will be found that such wells or springs are only reached at great depths; a point, however, mainly depending on the inclination of the strata holding the water, and the distance from the place where the water was received.

Artesian wells have been made in Albany, New York, various places in New Jersey, and at the great Salines of Onondaga county. This method of procuring water, in the hands of skilful men, promises to become of still greater utility, and not only be important in an economical point of view, but lend essential aid to a more correct understanding of the structure and condition of our globe. "Artesian wells are the most available, and of the most use in low and level districts, where water can not be obtained from superficial springs, or ordinary wells of water."—(Buckland.) Much difficulty was formerly experienced in procuring good water in or near London, but Artesian wells are now common, and in a great measure remedy the deficiency, as they promise to do in New-York. These wells are sunk through the London clay formation in that of the plastic clay series, a depth of from 400 to 700 feet, where the water rises to the surface, and in those about Brentford a few feet above that point. It has been found, however, that as the number of perpetually flowing wells in that basin increases, the water rises with less force, and may be expected, as they are multiplied, to eventually cease flowing.

Some of the most celebrated Artesian wells are those of Perpignan and Tours in France, some of which throw a column of water some 40 or 50 feet above the surface; and M. Arago in his valuable memoir on Artesian wells, states that the water rushes up with so much force, that a cannon ball placed in a pipe of some of these wells is violently ejected by the ascending stream. In Wurtumberg the warm water of an Artesian well is used to warm a paper manufactory, and prevent the freezing of water on the wheels; and at Stuttgard it has been successfully employed in the warming of green houses.

The most important Artesian well yet formed, is the one just completed at the barrier Grenelle, near the great slaughter houses of Paris, and where much inconvenience has been suffered for the want of water. The boring has been going on for several years, and the whole expense is stated at 160,000 francs, or about $30,000. The city of Paris paid the expenses to the depth of 1200 feet, when finding no water, it was proposed to abandon it. A committee of the Institute waited on the Government, and proposed that the boring should be continued under their direction, stating that even should no water be eventually obtained, the advantages in a scientific point of view, particularly that relating to the internal temperature of the earth, would fully justify the continuance of the boring.—This perseverance has been amply rewarded, as in the fore part of the present year, a fine spring has been struck at a depth of about 1,800 feet, which rises to the surface and forms a beautiful thermal fountain of the greatest value. A series of experiments have been constantly conducted in this boring to ascertain the rate of increase of temperature as the earth is penetrated, and the result would seem to be in accordance with other observations made at great depths, namely, that after a certain point below the surface has been reached, (above which the temperature is continually variable,) there is a constant and regular increase, indicating that a high temperature must exist at no great depth, when compared with the whole diameter of the earth.

The borings which have been conducted by the State or by individuals at Salina, in New York, have probably had more important results than any other ones made in this country. It is true the depth is not as great as those in the Kenhawa wells, but they have done more in determining the character of the strata containing the salt water, and the improbability of finding rock salt in them, than in the other case. The numerous borings made in these Salines, extending over a space of some four or five miles, would seem to prove that the salt water or brine occupies a basin excavated from the red shale, of a limited extent east and west, but extending north and south for several miles, further perhaps than has generally been supposed. This excavation has been mostly filled with diluvial materials, pebbles, gravel, &c., and the whole may be considered as filled with brine to the level it reaches in the various borings, which is not far from that of the Onondaga lake, a body of water occupying a slight depression in the centre of the salt reservoir, from the brine of which it is separated by a body or strata of compact impervious marl.

A MOTHERS' EARLY EXPERIENCE.

MRS. ALLEN—I have read your valuable journal during the past year with deep interest, and although there may be thousands in our privileged and enlightened country, far more adequate to the task, yet I feel constrained to add one to the list of mothers whom you number among your correspondents. I have long and deeply felt the responsibilities which rest upon the Christian parent; yet I have nevertheless suffered my domestic cares to absorb most of my time, of which a great proportion was the proper and natural claim of my children.

When I assumed the marriage relation, I found myself unfitted for the discharge of the duties it involved, by an erroneous system of education, combined with many and peculiar trials, such as sometimes shadow the orphan's lot; for I had been the victim of sorrow and oppression, from my childhood, and Grace had not wrought its perfect work within me. With a morbidly sensitive disposition induced by circumstances, heightened by a recourse to reading, indiscriminately, works of fiction, or whatever light reading presented itself, as a relief from life's burthens—perhaps it is not surprising that I became, for a season, the victim of circumstances. Had I been guided by the counsel of a judicious friend, in my choice of books, doubtless my mind had received an entirely different bias, and my life would have been redeemed from many an error—from many a sad remembrance. Alas! how many of the severest trials we are called to encounter, have originated in the neglect, or mismanagement, or both, perhaps, of parents, or those who are expected to supply their places.

I saw and deplored my deficiencies, and resolutely determined to overcome all difficulties—but I found them far more numerous than I had anticipated. My husband's business always gave us a large family—while his circumscribed means increased my perplexities. Cut off from the enjoyment of the society I valued, with little leisure for a resort to books, my undisciplined mind became a prey to vexations and discouragement—and at times yielded to such a degree of excitability, that the recollection is a source of abiding penitence and humiliation.

I saw or fancied friends estranged—perhaps my manners had become repulsive—had taken the hue of the distempered mind. It was not difficult to ascertain the origin and character of this sad disease; and having done so, it was plain the only remedy must be within myself. Still I wanted resolution to resist the tide of circumstances and of feeling which bore me on.

Surrounded by prattling childhood, my mind was wrought even to agony, in view of the manner in which my maternal responsibilities were being fulfilled. We were remote from schools—my own time was engaged in domestic avocations. To instruct them myself, I considered impossible. I was eaten up of care already.—Should I attempt it, it must be at the sacrifice of domestic order and comfort—and how could I hope to benefit them seriously by such odd scraps of time, as by dint of great exertion, I might be able to redeem? I became extremely unhappy. Sometimes I was admonished by hints, or openly, for my neglect. Once I was told, "your children have the first and strongest claim upon you—you cannot neglect them, but at a fearful peril." I was grieved and troubled, but not persuaded.

I finally aroused to more just views of the subject by several circumstances, in conjunction with the influence of the Mothers' Journal. I had always been ready to admit the fact that my children had the first and strongest claim upon my attention. I now began to conclude, that perhaps some domestic matters might give place a little, and I soon found that it would be far easier than I had imagined, to bestow upon them considerable attention—and that, too, without sacrificing the character of a good housewife in its legitimate import. I found I had been a slave to [illegible] appearances, which had little to do with the true interests or comfort of my family. And when my eye fell upon a superfluous article of dress or furniture, which had cost me the sacrifice of precious hours, or days, or weeks, perhaps it carried to my heart a bitter pang. I felt that I had miserably squandered a great portion of my best earthly inheritance—time of more value than wealth, for money could not purchase it. And when I turned a glance into the neglected garden of my own heart, I was indeed effectually aroused, and felt that it was time for action. I dared not dream away the remnant of existence. I believed that by a strong effort of principle, I might yet retrieve my moral energies, and I have been assisted to make the effort. Partial success has smiled upon my exertions, although they have been subjected to many hindrances, and sad interruptions.

The paralyzing hand of sickness has been laid upon us—the number of our little flock has been diminished—a part have been recalled to the presence of Him from whom we received them—where, as we humbly trust, they will be literally taught of God. May the others be spared to inherit immortality through faith in Him "who is the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever."

Notwithstanding these afflictive dispensations of Providence, I cannot suffer myself to be discouraged. I needed severe discipline: I have received it from His hand who doeth all things well, and I believe it is good for me that I have been afflicted." It is enabling me to meet the ills of life with greater fortitude, and to receive its blessings in a spirit of deeper thankfulness.

I think too it has led me to feel more deeply the obligations which I owe my family—particularly the children which have been spared to us. Strange that I should ever have been willing to delegate so precious a trust to others. The conscientious mother exerts a greater degree of influence over her little children, than any other person can do. Whose anxiety and faithfulness shall equal hers for her offspring? Whose eye of love shall be like hers, in detecting the secret springs of action, or the dawning dispositions to good or evil, which infancy develops? Whose prayer shall exceed hers in fervency for wisdom to direct? Or who, like her, shall feel the necessity of unwearied application in the acquirement of virtue and knowledge, that she may be able to impart it to the child she loves?

Does any affectionate mother say, "I gladly would assume these duties, but for me it is impossible—I have no time?"—Dear sister, we never know what we can accomplish until we make the trial. The case indeed demands decision and immediate action. But let the heart become enlisted in this cause, and many other subjects will lose much of their seeming importance, while many will dwindle into insignificance. We are under a sacred obligation to God, and to our children, to do all for them that we are capable of doing; and if we are wise, we shall be able to redeem a valuable proportion of our time to devote to them.—It is not a small matter—the influence exerted upon the mind of the child, will be traced in the character of the man: nor is it too much to suppose it will have a bearing upon the destiny of the immortal spirit.

I acknowledge that society has claims upon our attention which must not be neglected. So far as is convenient, we should respect its customs—yet we are under no obligations to ape its follies, to follow in the wake of its fashions, or its dissipating amusements.

Perhaps the plea of indolence might sometimes be substituted for inability from other causes.

Many serve mammon for their children's sake. Wealth, it is true, may give them consequence in the opinion of many; but a virtuous and well disciplined mind, stored with useful knowledge, is a treasure to its possessor, to its friends, to society, and to our country.

Alas! are we, rational and immortal creatures, placed here to toil after baubles, vanities which perish with the using, and treasures of yellow dust, which, when our race of life is run, must all be left behind—and to neglect our children, who are born to live forever?

The above remarks have not been intended for those whose situation in life places them above the necessity of exertion for obtaining the same end at which I have wished to arrive; neither for those whose poverty, and want of early advantages, seem to preclude the possibility of their ever being able to superintend the education of their children. Yet I would gladly say something for the encouragement of those weary and disheartened ones, whose situation may be similar to what mine has been; for I think there must be many such, who only need "a word in season" to induce them to seek, and to find a "more excellent way." May we not hope to hear from some such hereafter, through the medium of the Journal? In such a case, I will endeavor again to resume my humble pen—and may we not hope to be able mutually to strengthen and sustain each other in the performance of our duties, so that hereafter our children may "rise up and call us blessed?"

NOTICE.

AN EXAMINATION of the Students of De Ruyter Institute will commence on Monday, the 9th of August, and continue three days. On Wednesday evening there will be an EXHIBITION at the Presbyterian Church, commencing at half past 6 o'clock, P. M. All who feel an interest in the school are respectfully invited to attend.

☞The great length of our Congressional News this week, has prevented us from furnishing our readers with our usual variety of intelligence.

"Prepare to meet thy God."

This admonition is to every one that is not reconciled to God by the atonement of the Lord Jesus Christ. Every moment is bringing you nearer the time when you must come into audience with the Deity. On every hand your fellows are falling victims to the destroyer. To day they live in all the enjoyment of mental and physical vigor. To-morrow shuts them from the world and all its varied scenes, and fixes their unalterable destiny in the eternal world. Haste, then, the preparation while life prolongs its precious light. Haste, ere the Holy Spirit takes its flight. Haste the preparation, lest death find you unprepared to meet God in peace.

"Judge not according to the appearance, but judge righteous judgment."

1. Because appearances may be deceptive. No man is prepared to judge correctly on any subject, or of the conduct of any man, or set of men, until he has before him all the evidence that can be adduced for or against. The first view of a subject may, or may not be correct. A representation may be so made, as to convince all unacquainted with the matter that it is incontrovertible, every feature of which may be wrong. A plausible argument does not necessarily imply a probability of correctness, neither where there is a probability in an argument, is it certain that the argument is true. Consequently all who judge from first appearances only, are as liable to judge wrong as right. And if it be a matter touching the conduct or character of men, there is great injustice done; or if it be a matter affecting the interests of the soul, then great danger is incurred.

An endless variety of circumstances tend to give a wrong coloring to almost every subject that is presented to the mind. In morals and religion the heart naturally inclines to reject every thing that savors of purity, and requires self-denial. In business matters self-interest blinds the mind, and controls the conduct. In matters of common concern, men may be governed by interested motives, and fail of discovering that which is most important for them to see, and discover things to the prejudice of others that do not exist. The envious man cannot endure the prosperity of others, therefore he is prepared to give their motives and conduct the darkest coloring they will bear. Men who are known to be governed by supreme love to self, and intolerance to others, are not to be credited when they make any representation of matters in which they or their enemies are concerned. It is impossible for such to act disinterestedly, even tho' they so cloak their schemes as to hide themselves from the observation of the ignorant, yet the well-accustomed eye can detect the plot and him who laid it. If he bring a thousand witnesses, alike interested with himself, to give his word the form of truth; yet to those who know his arts, all efforts to hide the truth are vain. And he who will judge of a matter from the representation of such, fail of "judging righteous judgment."

2. The mind is sometimes unprepared to judge. All men know that a mind prejudiced for or against a measure, is unprepared to judge rightly of it. A man can not be convinced against his will. Light, as glowing as the meridian sun, may beam on his optics in vain; his sightless balls refuse to see.—Evidence, that cannot be gainsayed, is presented in vain. Reason urges her plea with no avail. And it is equally futile to attempt to convince him that one thing is right and another wrong. Such a man fails of judging righteous judgment. He judges simply from the appearance, as presented to his prejudiced mind.

Men should judge righteous judgment, because doing otherwise they either do injustice to themselves or others. If they misjudge relative to the requirements of the gospel, and thereby refuse compliance with them, they endanger their own interests.—If they misjudge the motives or conduct of men, they do them injustice, by imputing that to them which they do not allow; and before judgment is given, both sides must be examined with impartiality. Before we decide against men, we must be sure that we have all the evidence that can be adduced, and not decide according to a prejudiced representation. This all will do who acknowledge the sacred rule of doing to others as they would be done by. In matters affecting the interest of the soul, men can not be too careful in judging. Their happiness beyond the grave depends upon giving the subject of religion an impartial investigation, and in deciding upon things as they are. A neglect to examine the claims of God, upon all men will result in a wrong course of conduct; and this, in endless disappointment. Judge, therefore, not according to the appearance, but judge righteous judgment.

Anti-Mormon Almanac, for 1842.

We have received a copy of the above named work. Its design is to show that "Mormonism" authorizes the crimes of Theft, Robbery, High Treason and Murder. It also exhibits the number of the sect, their views, character of their leaders, &c.

Suicide—CLARK ROGERS, of Fabius, put an end to his existence on the morning of the 21st ult. He had exhibited symptoms of insanity for some time. The fatal act was accomplished with a gun barrel loaded with a slug of lead about an inch in length, and a piece of steel about four inches in length. This load he discharged by means of a hot iron. The charge entered the lower part of the chest, and come out at the back of the neck. He died instantly.

General Conference.

The Annual session of the S. D. Baptist General Conference will be held with the first S. D. B. Church in Alfred, Allegany co., N. Y., commencing on the 4th day of the week before the second Sabbath in Sept. next. The several Benevolent Societies of the denomination will hold their sessions during the week. We trust that all who come up to these convocations will be prepared to act for the interests of the Redeemer's kingdom.

For the Register.

Meekness.

There is not in all the fine traits of character which adorn the lives of Christians, one which more readily finds an avenue to the heart, secures the good will and commands the respect of others, than meekness. There is not in sacred Writ a virtue more sincerely regarded, more highly commended and more happily approved. Rashness, anger, malice, pride and revenge are therein most seriously reprobated, and fearfully denounced, as the proceeds of an unregenerate heart, and the fruits of an evil spirit.—But meekness is classed with the celestial graces of the Holy Spirit. It is represented as one of the characteristics of regeneration. The Holy Scriptures abound with specimens of this virtue exhibited in the lives of holy men. Of such was Moses.—Indeed, we have not so brilliant, so perfect and beautiful a display of this grace, in all the biographical sketches of history, excepting the life of the Messiah, as is set forth in the conduct of Moses. And this appears more conspicuous in consideration of the circumstances in which he was placed.—How did he feel, and what an interest did he manifest in the welfare of his brethren, when at the command of God he left the flocks of Jethro, and proceeded to the land of Egypt to become an instrument in the hand of God in their deliverance from the iron yoke of Pharaoh. He chose rather to suffer afflictions with the people of God, than to enjoy the pleasures of sin for a season. When, after their exit from Egypt and arrival at the Red Sea in the wilderness, they murmured and cried against Moses, saying, "Because there were no graves in Egypt, hast thou taken us away to die in the wilderness? Is not this the word we did tell thee in Egypt saying, let us alone that we may serve the Egyptians?" But hear what was the reply of this great and good man. Behold the effusions of his meek and quiet spirit. His words are appropriate to Christians in all ages, and in all circumstances, in which they are led to murmur, and to question the goodness of Providence. "Fear ye not, stand still, and see the salvation of the Lord, which he will shew to you to-day." Those acquainted with the history of this eminent servant of God, cannot be insensible of the repeated provocations he received from that people which the Lord declared were stiff necked; neither can have escaped their notice the gentle reproofs and patient forbearance, which, toward them he exhibited. But we pass to other examples.

How was the behavior of Job whom God declared to Satan, was a perfect and upright man? Amidst all his deprivations and afflictions, he maintained his integrity, meekly acquiescing in all the hand dealings of his Maker, awaiting all the appointed time of his affliction till his deliverance came.—He knew that, though worms should destroy his body, yet in his flesh he should see God. At the suggestion of his wife to curse God and die, what was his reply? Thou speakest as one of the foolish women speak.—What! shall we receive good from the hand of the Lord, and shall we not receive evil?

But of all the examples of meekness exhibited by any being which was ever clothed with humanity, none ever equalled those of our Savior. What does his whole life manifest but one continued train of the virtues? And among all, what one shone more resplendantly than meekness? Yes, he was meek, mild, and gentle in public instruction, and private devotion. He was mild and calm in his reply to his parents on being informed of their careful search for him. He was meek at the tomb of Lazarus. He was meek in the house of the Pharisee. He was meek in his sermon on the Mount.—He was meek in the performance of the miracle at the marriage in Cana. He was gentle with Nicodemus. He was humble at the well of Jacob. He was meek in the garden of Gethsemane. He was meek when Judas betrayed him with a kiss! He was meek when Peter cut off the ear of the servant of the high priest. He was meek in bearing his cross up Calvary's bloody summit. He was meek and did not retaliate when the merciless Jews reviled, spit upon, and buffetted him! He was meek when they crowned him with thorns! He was meek when they maliciously nailed him to the cross. He was meek when they maliciously nailed him to the cross. He was quiet when they cruelly scourged and mocked him. He was meek when he bowed his head and died! And finally, in his unmerited grace, unfeigned love, illimitable goodness, and wonderful condescension in leaving the Heaven of Heavens, the blissful seat of revering angels, and coming to this earthly ball, the dark abode of sin and misery, to enshroud himself in a clay tenement, the habitation of wretchedness, for thee! O rebel man! to suffer, bleed and die! He was MEEK! If then, he who is the second mentioned in the God-head, the mighty Maker of heaven and earth, was humble, and poor, and meek, why canst not thou be meek, O frail, sickly, mortal man? Thou who art a feeble worm of the dust, where is thy power? and what canst thou do to save thyself from prowling enemies around, and the unfathomable abyss below thy feet?—What hast thou to be proud of? Art thou thine own architect? Hast thou made thy frame? Devised, projected, arranged, and set in order, and in living, moving operation the various bones, muscles, organs and tissues, the mighty hydraulics, and the wonderfully curious and delicate apparatus, mental and physical, of which thou art constituted? If then, gentle reader, we are not our own, nor aught we claim to possess is ours, if the meek are blessed, and are to inherit the earth, if the proud are to be burned up, that there be left neither root nor branch, (Mal. iv. i.) if the heavens shall be rolled together as a scroll, and the elements shall melt and be consumed; if "the wicked shall be turned into hell with all the nations that forget God; in short, if our happiness, temporal and eternal, our salvation, our interest, our honor, our all, and moreover the interests of Christ's kingdom, depend upon our submission to God, let us be meek.

Congressional News.

From the New-Yorker.

WASHINGTON CORRESPONDENCE.

Wednesday, July 14.

In the House of Representatives last evening the bill appropriating $139,666, for the payment of Navy Pensions, was passed. This morning the bill "making appropriations for the purchase of Naval Ordnance, and Ordnance Stores, and for other purposes," was passed. It appropriates $600,000.

The resolution of inquiry relative to the McLeod case was taken up for the morning hour, and advocated by Mr. Young of New York in an eloquent and able manner. He dissented from the course of the President in his letter of instructions to Mr. Crittenden, as interfering with the jurisdiction of the State of New York, and expressed his hope that the course of justice in the trial of McLeod would not be retarded.

Mr. Fillmore from the Committee on Ways and Means, reported "a bill, respecting duties and draw backs;" which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the State of the Union.

The bill of appropriation for a Home Squadron was taken up in Committee, but passed for the present without action.

The Speaker laid before the House a message from the President, submitting a report from the Secretary of the Treasury, in reply to the call for information as to the seizures of American merchantmen by British armed cruisers.

On motion of Mr. Fillmore, the House again resolved itself into a Committee and took up the bill "making appropriations for various fortifications, for ordnance, and suppressing Indian hostilities." After various amendments and debate, the Committee rose and reported progress and the House adjourned.

The Fiscal Bank Bill was then taken up, and Mr. Tappan offered an amendment, that nothing in the bill should be construed into an admission that Congress has no constituted right to repeal the charter. This he advocated in a long constitutional argument. He then at the suggestion of Mr. Buchanan, withdrew the amendment for the present, to give place to those which would consume less time.

An amendment offered by Mr. Clay, of Ala., and amended by Mr. Clay, of Ky., was debated at some length, and passed, providing that in case the Bank suspend specie payment, its bills shall not be received during said suspension, which shall be adjudged a cause of forfeiture of charter.

Mr. Benton moved to strike out the clause of the bill prohibiting Congress from establishing any other bank during the existence of this, except the banks of the District of Columbia, whose capital to be limited to $5,000,000.

This was lost: Yeas 19, Nays 25.

Mr. Benton moved an amendment to strike out the clause fixing the rate of interest to be received by the bank on its loans to 6 per cent., and inserting 5 per cent.; which was rejected. Yeas 17, Nays 26.

An amendment offered by Mr. Clay of Ky., as a substitute for one by Mr. Clay of Ala., after some debate, was adopted, providing that in case the suspension takes place during a recess of Congress, it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to provide otherwise for the safe-keeping of the public money until provision is made for this purpose by Congress.

Mr. Clay of Ala. offered an amendment to strike out 12 per cent., as the interest to be paid by the Bank on its liabilities whose payments have been demanded for the time of its suspension, and insert 25 per cent. This was rejected: Yeas 19, Nays 25.

Mr. Clay of Ky., from the Committee on Finance reported the House bill, authorising a loan of $12,000,000. He expressed the hope that it might be immediately acted on as it was required by the wants of the Treasury, and hoped it would be passed this week.

Mr. Merrick reported the House bill "to revise and extend the charters of certain banks in the District of Columbia."

Mr. Calhoun said to-day that the Opposition would probably be able to finish their amendments by Saturday night. Thus there is some progress making on the bill. The House are accomplishing much business under the one-hour rule, suggested by one of its most laborious and worthy members, Mr. Warren of Ga.

Thursday, July 15.

In Senate, to-day, Mr. Wright presented the resolution of a meeting of citizens of New York City, held at the Park in that city, a few days since, soliciting the interference of this government for the release of the American citizens, now British prisoners of state at Van Dieman's Land. On his motion the resolutions were ordered to be printed and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. Tallmadge presented a memorial of citizens of New York City, and one of citizens of Richmond, Oswego Co., N. Y., for a Bankrupt Law.

The resolution of Mr. Buchanan was taken up calling for a list of removals from office since 4th of March, 1841, with the amendment offered by Mr. Mangum, calling for a list of the removals and appointments from the 4th of March, 1829, to 4th of March, 1841.

The amendment was agreed to. Mr. Benton expressed his desire of speaking on the resolution, and at his request it was laid over.

An interesting debate here occurred, which was commenced by Mr. Clay of Ky., who said he would be very glad if Senators would consent unanimously to take up the Loan Bill from the House, as the necessities of the Treasury required its immediate passage.

Mr. Calhoun objected, as they were engaged on another subject—(the Bank Bill)—which he wished to finish first.

Mr. Clay explained the necessity of it. He stated the estimated amount of expenditures for the present year would be twenty-four millions of dollars independent of new appropriations. This was two millions per month, and from a statement from the Treasury of the 13th inst., he had learned that there was on hand but nine hundred thousand dollars, being barely a provision for a fortnight's supply of the wants of Government, and thus the immediate passage of the Loan Bill was required.

Mr. Calhoun said he preferred another expedient, which he intended proposing: the temporary issue of Treasury Notes, which would relieve the Government much more speedily than a loan.

Mr. Clay was entirely opposed to this, and went for an old-fashioned loan, that the people might see how much they were in debt. He referred to their tardy transaction of business, and the advance of the House.

Mr. Calhoun said it was effected by assailing the liberty of speech, and by a most dangerous rule which placed the right of debate of the minority in the hands of the majority.

Mr. Clay thought the public would not complain of it at all, and for one he was ready to resort to similar means for the transaction of their business when necessary. The great grievance to the people was the unnecessary protraction of debate, and it would be no grievance if, by such a measure, they did the business before them, and returned home in two months and a half.

Mr. King was amazed, when most of the time had been consumed by the Senator and his friends, that he should attempt to force a gag-law on them. Let him attempt it—(Mr. Clay—I will)—and he might prepare to stay here till next winter. He wished the Bank Bill to be disposed of first, and said his friends would finish their amendments and be prepared for the question on Monday next. But the other side did not wish to take it now, until some of their absent friends returned; and yet they were accusing them of delaying the bill

Mr. Benton rose to back his friends, and opposed all gag-laws or previous questions, particularly to cut off amendments. They could finish their amendments and be ready for the question Monday night.

Mr. Clay said the Senators had made a proposition which they knew could not be acceded to, one of their friends being necessarily absent, on account of indisposition in his family. He advised gentlemen to keep good humor, and abstain from bullying and menacing, because if existing rules did not serve for the transaction of business, he was ready according to the Constitution to make the necessary ones.—He gave notice that when the Senate came out of Executive Session he should move to take up the Loan Bill.

After further remarks by Messrs Calhoun and Linn, against taking up the Loan Bill, the debate was cut off by the expiration of the morning hour.

The Senate then went into Executive Session, and so remained during the day.

In the House, the Fortification bill was argued and amended at great length, in Committee of the Whole. No action was taken on it.

It is understood that the following appointments were confirmed by the Senate to-day:

Col. Chambers to be Governor of Iowa.

Mr. Montgomery, Postmaster at Philadelphia.

Mr. Riddle, Postmaster at Pittsburgh, Pa.

Friday, July 16.

In the Senate, after some unimportant morning business, Mr. Clay of Ky. asked to be indulged in taking up the Loan bill. He thought its discussion need not consume more than a day—the Treasury Note bills of the former Administration had been despatched in that time—and the Treasury had now pressing need of the funds—there was not enough in it to last a fortnight—and he trusted this bill would be taken up without dissent.

Mr. Calhoun objected that this bill proposed to create a permanent debt, while he preferred to issue more Treasury notes.—Mr. Wright objected that this bill was but an entering wedge for the Land Distribution bill, to which he was hostile. Mr. Allen of Ohio was also averse to hurrying this bill through ahead of other business.

Mr. Clay reminded Mr. Calhoun that the Treasury Note system was that of the last Administration; the friends of the present had always preferred a Loan as more open and manly, but they had not obstructed the passage of Treasury Note bills. He asked like courtesy now. He finally called the Yeas and Nays on the motion to take up; when, after further debate, on the suggestion of Mr. King of Ala., the opposition gave way, Mr. Clay withdrew his call, and the Loan bill was taken up without a division.

Mr. Clay, in a brief and forcible speech, exhibited the necessity for the passage of this bill. The Appropriations for the current year were $24,210,000. The War Department had called for $2,500,000 more as indispensably necessary; and about $1,500,000 more were required to fit out a Home Squadron, supply Ordnance for the Fortifications, &c., and pay the Naval Pensions, making in all over $2[illegible]. To meet this the entire means of the Treasury for the current year, (Treasury Notes included,) were but $20,780,000. This left a deficit of over $7,000,000. But $6,000,000 now would be required to pay Treasury Notes falling due before the 1st of March next; so that the actual deficiency of the Revenue was over the $12,000,000 which this bill authorized the President to borrow if needed.

Mr. Clay proceeded to show that the money was to be borrowed only when the President should find it necessary, and only so much as should be required; that it was payable after three and within eight years; and he trusted that the friends of the late Administration would not prevent those of the present from liquidating and paying off the debt outstanding when they came into power. In answer to a doubt expressed by Mr. Wright that so much would be needed, Mr. Clay stated that the receipts from Customs for the first half of 1841 had fallen below the lowest estimate, being only $5,708,000.

Mr. Wright still feared that this measure was intended to facilitate the Distribution of the Proceeds of the Public Lands. To prevent that, he moved an amendment, providing first that no part of this Loan shall be made until "after the application of all the money in the Treasury, and all the accruing Revenue from Customs, Lands, and all other sources," to the wants of the Government. Secondly, that none of it shall be applied to the redemption of Treasury Notes not yet due. On motion of Mr. Clay, this latter clause was struck out—Yeas 27; Nays 22—and then after another spirited debate, the rest of the amendment was rejected: Yeas 23, to [22 Oppo. and Mr. Henderson of Miss.] Nays 26, [all the Whigs but Mr. H., and Messrs. Rives and Graham, absent.] The Senate now went into Executive Session, and soon after adjourned.

In the House, Mr. Garret Davis of Ky. moved the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State, the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, and the Postmaster General, do severally report to this House, at the next session of Congress, the number of persons employed in the public service, in any manner, in their respective Departments, or in any business directly or indirectly connected with such Departments, either in or out of Washington city; and that they also report the duties required by law and performed by all such persons; what portion of their time is required in the performance of such duties; what is their compensation severally; and what reform and retrenchment may be reasonable and practicable in diminishing the number of persons so employed in the public service; excepting all soldiers, marines, and sailors, and their officers in the service of the United States from the operation hereof.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury do report to the House of Representatives at the next session, in what medium or currency the several pension agents, since March, 1829, have paid the several pensions within their agencies.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury do, at the next session, report to this House what sums shall have been paid into the Treasury in virtue of all laws limiting the pay or other emoluments of any officer or other person in the employment of the Government of the United States.

Mr. Cave Johnson, of Tenn., offered the following amendment to the resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to lay before the House a list of all the officers of the Government who derive their appointments from the nomination of the President and concurrence of the Senate, who have been removed from office since the 4th of March last, denoting in such list their names and grades, and dates of their removals, and the persons appointed in their place; also a like list of the names of those whose term of service being limited to four years were not renominated to the Senate, and a like list of the names of those nominated in their places.

And be it further resolved, That the Secretary of State, the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of the Navy, the Secretary of War, and the Postmaster General be directed to report to this House the names of all persons removed from office, or the employment of the Government, (other than those appointed by the President and Senate,) and the names of those appointed or employed in their places since the 4th of March last.

After an hour of wrangling, appeals, motions to amend, calls for the Previous Question was ordered, and first taken on a proposed amendment to the amendment moved by Mr. Botts, of Va., which was divided as follows:

"That they also report the names of all officers removed under similar circumstances since the 4th of March, 1829, to the 4th of March, 1841."

And it was decided in the affirmative: Yeas 188, Nays 4.

So the first branch of the proposition was adopted.

And the question was then taken on the second branch of the proposition, to wit:

"And also to inform this House why they have not removed faithless and incompetent officers with greater despatch than they have done."

And it was decided in the negative: Yeas 34, Nays 145.

The question was now taken on Mr. Cave Johnson's amendment as amended, which was adopted: Yeas 120, Nays 78.

And then the whole batch was likewise adopted: Yeas 128, Nays 71.

The House now went into Committee of the Whole on the Fortification Bill, and Mr. Cushing of Mass. spoke in reply to a former speech of Mr. Rhett of S. C. His drift was to show that the McLeod difficulty had arisen under the former, not the present Administration. He was followed by Messrs. Rhett of S. C., Pickens of S. C., and McKeon of N. Y., each treating of McLeod, the Caroline, War with England, &c. &c. Mr. C. Brown of Pa. moved to to insert $20,000 for the repair of Fort Mifflin on the Delaware. He complained that the Cabinet which had been forced on the late President Harrison contained no Pennsylvanian. He was called to order for this expression, declared out of order, an appeal taken, argued at length, and the decision of the Chair sustained. Mr. Brown then concluded, and Mr. Watterson of Tenn. took the floor, and spoke an hour about blue lights, Gov. Strong, &c. Before he had got along to the Hartford Convention, he was called to order by the Chair, and obliged to go back to the Fortification Bill. He concluded by avowing his opposition to the bill.

Mr. Wise also made an able speech against the bill as unnecessary at this time. He thought the existing appropriation would last till January. Mr. Fillmore forcibly replied. After some further conversation, Mr. Proffit moved that this bill be taken out of Committee at 2 o'clock to-morrow, and demanded the Previous Question, which was seconded, and the Main Question ordered by 77 to 71. The Main Question was then put and carried: Yeas 77 [all Whigs;] Nays 76 [59 Opp. 17 Adm.] So the House agreed to take the bill out of Committee at 2 to-morrow.

Saturday, July 17.

The Senate have been to-day occupied in the discussion of the Loan Bill from the House, which has been retarded by debate and amendment in almost every possible form, it being the evident design of the Opposition to encumber it with amendments so that it may go back to the House, and thus to withhold supply for the Treasury, which was stated by Mr. Clay, Chairman of the Finance Committee, to be required immediately—there being on the 13th inst. but nine hundred thousand dollars on hand: not enough to last a fortnight.

Mr. Calhoun presented resolutions of a meeting of citizens of Virginia, expressing their opinion of the extra session, declaring it uncalled for by the wants of the nation, injudicious and subjecting the country to a useless expense; that the Bank question had not been at issue before the people in the late Presidential contest, that a U. S. Bank was unconstitutional and injurious, that it was their duty to wage an interminable war of repeal against it; and also against the Distribution bill.

Mr. Calhoun said he needed not to express his concurrence in these sentiments, and took occasion to say that if a Bank was established, he should go for its repeal, as being unconstitutional and incompatible with the liberty of the country.

He then referred to an article in the Intelligencer of to-day in favor of the application of the previous question in Congress, and stating that it was applied and supported by Mr. Calhoun in 1812, when the bill declaring war with Great Britain was hurried through the House in one day. A conversation here arose as to the facts of the case, and with reference to the previous question, between Messrs. Clay and Calhoun, which was marked with much humor on both sides; and after each having spoken two or three times, they concluded it was best to drop the subject which had occupied them so pleasantly.

The Loan bill was then taken up, and Mr. Allen offered a proviso that after the money authorized to be raised under the bill had been applied to the actual wants of the Treasury, the remainder should go for the defence of the country.

This motion was rejected, after some debate.

Mr. Woodbury moved to strike out "twelve millions," (the amount of the bill,) and insert "six millions."

This was advocated by Messrs. Woodbury, Calhoun, Wright and Young, and opposed by Mr. Evans, and rejected: Yeas 21; Nays 26.

Mr. King moved to strike out "twelve" and insert nine millions. This was advocated by Messrs. King and Benton, and opposed Mr. Clay of Ky. It was then rejected: Yeas 20; Nays 27.

Mr. Benton moved to strike out the clause empowering the President to borrow money for purposes "which in his opinion the exigencies of the Treasury may require," and insert a provision that the money be borrowed which "may be necessary to satisfy appropriations made by Congress."— This being briefly supported by Mr. Benton, was rejected: Yeas 21; Nays 27.

Mr Sevier offered an amendment, as an additional section to the bill, prohibiting the re-issuing by the Secretary of the Treasury, of any Treasury Notes hereafter redeemed at the Treasury. This, after a debate by Messrs. Huntington, Sevier and Allen, was rejected: Yeas 21; Nays 27.

Mr. Calhoun said he had an amendment which he wished to offer, to strike out the provision for a loan and insert Treasury Notes, on which he wished to make some remarks. He was much fatigued, (it being then near four o'clock,) and would be glad that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. Clay said he would with great pleasure yield to the desire of the Senator, but from a deep sense of duty to the country, he must decline so doing, and insist that the bill pass to-day.

Mr. Allen then moved an adjournment, which was negatived: Yeas 21; Nays 25.

Mr. Wright renewed the motion for the amendment offered by Mr. Sevier, slightly modifying it so as to prohibit the re-issuing of Treasury Notes received at the Treasury, or the issuing of others in their stead.

This, after debate by Messrs. Buchanan, Clay and others, was negatived.

The bill was then read a third time, and the question being on its passage, Mr. Calhoun still intimating a desire to speak on the bill, on motion the Senate adjourned at a quarter past five o'clock.

In the House, Mr. Arnold of Tenn. moved a reconsideration of the vote adopting the resolution to stop debate on the Fortification Bill to-day at 5 o'clock. The motion was carried, and the vote reconsidered.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, (Mr. Winthrop in the Chair) and resumed the consideration of the Fortification bill—and after a debate by Mr. Underwood and others, the Committee rose without action on the bill.

A resolution was adopted, to stop the debate on said bill, Tuesday next, at two o'clock.

Monday, July 19.

In the Senate, petitions from various portions of the Union were presented for a General Bankrupt Law and for a National Bank.

The Loan Bill, which was laid over from Saturday for the purpose of affording Mr. Calhoun an opportunity of speaking on it, was taken up, and that gentleman addressed the Senate at some length in opposition to the bill, as providing more than is required by the wants of the Government, thus producing a surplus in the Treasury which would countenance the idea of Distribution, and promote prodigality in the expenditures of the Government. He professed to be willing to grant a necessary supply to Government, but preferred the form of Treasury Notes, as being much more convenient and economical. He opposed the bill as being the entering wedge to that system of measures contemplated at the present session, by this Administration, which complied with the wishes of the cliques of Wall st. whose desries could not be better carried out by the Senate, if it was composed of delegates from them, than as now, by the representatives of the twenty-six States.

Mr. Clay of Ky., briefly replied, showing the inconsistency of the Opposition in refusing to unite in supplying this deficiency in the Treasury, a debt from Treasury Notes now outstanding to the amount of ten millions of dollars, which was of their own creation. This was the first refusal, and he called on the country to mark it, to vote for supplies of Government, since the last war.

Mr. Benton spoke at length in opposition to the bill. It was believed, although difficult to judge of his position on this particular subject, as he limited his remarks not to this narrow circle, but embraced almost every political topic, condemning the policy of convention of Congress at this Extra Session, going against a National Bank, &c. &c.; this speech being avowed in the exordium of his constituents.

The question on the passage of the bill was then taken, and carried by the following vote: Yeas 23; Nays 20.

Thus the Loan bill was passed.

A message from the President was received, informing the Senate that the act of 1838 prohibiting hostile incursions of citizens of the United States into foreign territories has expired by its own limitation, and recommending a renewal of the same.

The Bank bill was then announced as the unfinished business, and the Senate adjourned.

In the House, the Fortification bill was taken up in Committee of the Whole, and advocated by Messrs. Proffit, Fillmore, Randall and Dawson of Ga., and opposed by Messrs. Wise and McKay. Without action on it, the House adjourned.

Tuesday, July 20.

In Senate to-day, petitions and memorials were presented for a National Bank and for a Bankrupt Law.

The resolution of Mr. Buchanan was then taken up, which, as amended, calls on the President for a list of removals and appointments of public officers since the 4th of March, 1829.

Mr. Benton entered into a general discussion of the subject of removals, condemning the course of the present Administration, and particularly the proclamation of the present Secretary of State, prohibiting the inteference of officers in the freedom of elections, declaring it unconstitutional, and entering into an examination of the details of particular cases of removal in which he conceived injustice had been done.

The resolution was adopted.

The Bank bill was then taken up, and Mr. Nicholson offered an amendment giving the States the power to tax the Branches, like the State institutions. This was advocated by Messrs. Nicholson, Benton, Clay of Ala. and Sevier, and opposed by Messrs. Clay of Ky. and Huntington. It was then rejected: Yeas 21; Nays 27.

Mr. Walker offered an amendment to limit the discounts of the Bank to foreign and domestic bills of exchange, having not more than 180 days to run. This was advocated by Mr. Walker and opposed by Mr. Clay.

The amendment was lost; Yeas 9; Nays 28.

Mr. Smith of Conn. prior to offering of these amendments, spoke for about two hours and a hours and a half, in a Constitutional argument against the bill. He referred to the resolutions of the Legislature of his State, instructing him to vote for a Bank, and expressed his belief that they were not binding on him, but that by a Representative, discreation was to to be used.

The bill was then put over with the understanding that the amendments were to be finished to-morrow, and then the bill ordered printed, and the time set to take the question on its passage.

Mr. Huntington, from the Committee on Commerce, reported the House bill to extend the limits of the port of New-Orleans, which, on his motion, was laid on the table.

The Senate then adjourned.

The House were occupied till twelve o'clock in the discussion in Committee of the Whole, on the Fortification bill. At that hour, according to previous resolution, the debate ceased, and they proceeded to vote on the various amendments. The bill was passed in Committee, and then taken into the House and passed by Yeas 148; Nays 66.

The bill was then sent to the Senate, and there referred to the Committee on the Militia.

The Loan bill has received the signature of the President.

Wednesday, July 21.

The action of Congress to-day will be hailed with joy throughout the land. In the House, the bill making provisions for a Home Squadron was passed, together with action on other matters of interest; and in the Senate, the amendments on the Bank bill were finished, and the bill is now ready for its passage.

In the House of Representatives, Mr. Winthrop, from the Committee on Commerce, made a report in favor of revising the Tariff, with a resolution appointing a Committee of nine to sit in the recess of Congress, to collect information, and report at the next Session a proper system of duties. The resolution was advocated by Messrs. Ingersoll and Nisbet, and opposed by Messrs. Pickens and Wise.

The morning hour having expired, the resolution was laid over.

Mr. Sergeant, from the Select Committee on the Currency, reported a bill to incorporate the subscribers of the Fiscal Bank of the United States, and a Bill for the repeal of the Sub-Treasury act; both of which were referred to the Committee on the state of the Union.

Mr. Underwood, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, reported a bill to revise and extend the Charter of the banks of the District: Referred to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. Barnard, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported a bill "to establish an uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States," with a resolution declaring the inexpediency to act on it this Session.

Mr. Barnard and Mr. Milton Brown, members of the Committee, expressed their dissent from the resolution; and on motion of the latter gentlemen, the resolution was laid on the table, by a vote of Yeas 118, Nays 81.

The Home Squadron bill was taken up in Committee of the Whole, (Mr. Gilmer in the Chair,) and after a short debate the bill was reported to the House, where it was passed: Yeas 184, Nays 81. It provides for two sloops, two small vessels, and appropriates $789,310.

In the Senate, after the presentation of memorials for a Bankrupt Law, and against a Bank of the United States, a Protective Tariff, and Distribution, the bill providing for the extension of the time of completion of the Sixth Census in two districts one in Louisiana and one in Kentucky—was passed.

The bill changing the place of trial of Gen. Gratoit from Missouri to the District of Columbia was taken up, and after some debate, laid over without action.

Mr. Merrick, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, reported a bill making further provisions for the lunatics of the District; also a bill to continue in force for ten years the Mechanics' Relief Society of Alexandria.

The Fiscal Bank Bill was then taken up, and after being discussed at some length, the following amendment was adopted:

Mr. Berrien moved a provision that three Directors be appointed by the President, to hold their places until superceded, as soon as $10 shall have been paid on each share; and when $6,500,000 have been received, that the Bank commence operations.

This was adopted: Yeas 27; Nays 22.

The amendments having been finished, the bill was reported to the Senate, when, on motion of Mr. Clay, of Ky., it was laid on the table and ordered to be printed, preparatory to its passage.

The Home Squadron bill from the House, was referred to the Naval Committee.

Mr. Berrien gave notice of a motion to-morrow, to take up the Bankrupt Bill.

The Senate adjourned at half past 4 o'clock.

Thursday, July 22.

In Senate, to-day, Mr. Wright presented a memorial of citizens of New-York adverse to a Bankrupt Law. Mr. Tallmadge presented a memorial of citizens of the same City for such a law. Various others of the same character were presented.

The resolution of Mr. Clay, of Ala. offered yesterday, was adopted, calling on the Secretary of the Treasury for the amount of customs received on imports bearing a less duty than 20 per cent, in the several years of '37, '38, and 1839.

The resolution of Mr. Benton was adopted, calling on the President for the result of the investigation of the Commissioners on the action of the Contractors on the Public Buildings.

The resolution of Mr. Henderson was adopted calling on the Secretary of the Navy for an opinion in relation to the most eligible spot on the Gulf of Mexico for the location of a Navy Yard.

The bill to change the place of trial of Gen. Gratoit was taken up, and after considerable debate, was lost.

Agreeably to notice yesterday, Mr. Berrien moved that the Bankrupt Bill be taken up. The motion was carried. The bill was taken up and read by sections. Several amendments were offered, accompanied with a running debate of but little interest with regard to the details of the bill.

Mr. Nicholson moved an amendment to include Banks within the provisions of the bill. On this no action was taken. The Senate then went into Executive Session.

In the House the resolution reported yesterday by Mr. Winthrop from the Committee on Commerce, to appoint a Select Committee of nine Members, not more than one from any State, to sit during the recess of Congress, and collect information for the purpose of reporting at the next Session, a proper system of duties, was taken up and debated during the day, by Gilmer, Cushing, Nisbet, Wise and others, entering into the general subject of the Tariff, and partaking of a degree of excitement, especially between Messrs. Wise and Nisbet, with whom it assumed a personal character.— Without action on it, the House adjourned at about 3 o'clock.

Friday, July 23.

In the Senate, the Bankrupt Bill was taken up at an early hour. Mr. Nicholson's amendment, subjecting Banking Corporations to the provisions of this act, was the first question, and was advocated by Messrs. Benton, Woodbury, Williams, Walker and Smith of Conn. and opposed by Messrs. Sevier, Berrien, Bayard and Clay of Ala. Mr. Bayard moved that Banks owned wholly or in part by States be excluded, which prevailed: Yeas 24; Nays 22.— Mr. Benton prevailed on the Senate to lay the bill on the table for one day in order to have the amendment printed; but Mr. Clay of Ky. gave notice that he should move to take up the Bank bill to-morrow, and appealed to the friends of the Bankrupt bill to take it up again, and go on with its consideration now. His motion to take up prevailed: Yeas 26; Nays 22.

Mr. Tappan of Ohio, asked an adjournment: Lost—17 to 23.

Mr. Wright moved to strike out certain privileges allowed to married women and minors: Lost—17 to 29.

Mr. Young of Ill., moved that those holding funds in trust for aliens, be excluded from the benefits of voluntary Bankruptcy: Agreed to.

Mr. Prentiss of Vt., now made a long and powerful argument against the general principles of the bill, as too favorable to Debtors at the expense of Creditors. When he had concluded, the question was taken on engrossing the bill for a third reading, which prevailed: Yeas 27; Nays 22.

And the Senate adjourned.

In the House, the whole day was spent in a preliminary wrangle on the subject of the Tariff. The first question was on postponing to next week the resolution of the Committee of Commerce, proposing the appointment of a Select Committee of Nine to sit during the recess and collect such facts as would throw light on the proper adjustment of the Tariff. After a long debate, in which Messrs. Rhett of S. C., King, of Ga, and Kennedy of Md., were chief speakers. Mr. Merriwether of of Ga. moved that the resolution lie on the table, which, was negatived: Yeas 88, Nays 113—(nearly a party vote.) The Main Question was now moved (cutting off the motion to postpone) and carried: Yeas 101, Nays 100. And the Main Question being taken, the resolution was adopted: Yeas 106; Nays 104—[Yeas 99 Adm', 5 Opp.; Nays 20 Adm., 84 Opp.]

Mr. McKeon of this city, who had voted in the majority, now moved a reconsideration, and immediately asked an adjournment.— The House refused it—87 to 115. Mr. McK. then spoke at length in support of his motion, and Mr. Stokeley of Ohio, earnestly replied. Mr. Proffit moved the Previous Question, pending which motion the House adjourned.

[Mr. Pickens had previously asked the House to adjourn over to Monday, but so general was the expression of disapproval that he withdrew his motion.]

Saturday, July 24.

In the House of Representatives, to-day, the vote was reconsidered, by which the resolution reported by Mr. Winthrop from the Committee on Commerce, was adopted, providing for the appointment of a Committee of nine members to sit during the recess of Congress, to collect information at the principal ports of entry of the United States, relative to a proper system of duties to be adopted, and to report thereon at the next session of Congress. The resolution was then laid on the table.

The resolution reported some days since from the Committee on Naval Affairs, calling on the Secretary of the Navy for information with regard to the practicability of establishing lines of steam vessels from various ports of this Country to Foreign ports, was taken up.

Mr. Irwin of Pa. offered an amendment to inquire also into the expediency of the purchase of a site for the erection of a Naval Depot and Yard on the Ohio or Mississippi rivers. Mr. Irwin advocated the amendment at some length, urging the necessity of suitable provision for the defence of the Country against the invasion of any Foreign power. Without concluding his remarks he was cut off by the expiration of the morning hour.

The Revenue Bill, providing for the levy of a duty of twenty per cent. ad valorem for a limited time, on articles now exported duty free, was taken up in Committee of the Whole, Mr. Cushing in the chair.

Mr. Fillmore, in a brief and comprehensive speech, laid before the Committee, by statistical statement, the condition of the Treasury, and the imperative need of the passage of the bill to supply its wants.

After a short session the Committee rose, reported progress, and the House, at half-past twelve o'clock, adjourned.

In the Senate, Mr. Tallmadge presented petitions of citizens of New-York City and other places in New-York, and also of Reading, Pa. for a Bankrupt Law.

The resolutions of Mr. Phelps, submitted yesterday, were adopted, calling on the President for information concerning our commercial relations with Sardinia.

The Bankrupt Bill was then taken up, the question being on its passage.

Mr. Tallmadge, with his accustomed ability and power, at some length advocated the passage of the bill, as loudly demanded by the five hundred thousand bankrupts throughout the country, to whom no inducement is now held out to industry and effort to recover from the pecuniary misfortunes, and to place themselves and their families, not only above want, but in a situation to discharge their debts, as their full and entire earnings were now grasped by the merciless hand of the creditor; and thus the country deprived of their productive industry.

Mr. Buchanan at some length opposed the bill, declaring it a most painful duty, and avowing himself favorable to a Bankrupt bill of the right kind, which would avoid the objections to this. He would go far a Bankrupt Act which should depend on the agreement of a majority of the creditors, in number and amount, to free the debtor on delivering up all his property, of which a dividend should be made, and the claims of all the creditors, on receiving their equal proportion, to be annulled. This would require but a judicial recognition, and could be carried out with much more ease than the bill before them, as it would avoid all the lengthy forms of law contingent on the execution of this.

Messrs. Walker and Berrien strongly advocated the bill, and Mr. Buchanan farther opposed it.

The question was then taken on its final passage, and carried: Yeas 26; Nays 23.

Thus the bill was passed.

News of the Day.

Another Runaway Slave Affair.—Last week the barque Kazan, Leckie, master, arrived here from Mobile, with a slave, who had stowed himself away on board, unknown to the officers and men. The owners of the vessel, Messrs. A. & C. Cunningham, forthwith sued the fugitive gentleman for his passage, which they charged at seventy dollars, and had him arrested by constable Clapp, who committed him to jail. The colored people got wind of the matter, and manifested some excitement about it which terminated in their peacefully bailing him out. In the mean time, too, the abolitionists were on the qui vive, and, by S. E. Sewall, Esq., obtained a writ of habeas corpus to bring the slave before the Supreme Court to be released, but he had been bailed out before the officer, Col. Pratt, reached the jail with the Supreme Court precept. He has, therefore, nothing more to do than to railroad and steamboat it to Canada, and become one of Queen Victoria's loving subjects.—Boston Post.

A Judge Indicted.—The Alton Telegraph states that the Hon. T. W. Smith, one of the Judges of the Supreme Court of Illinois, John A. McClernand, Esq., a Representative in the Legislature, and a Dr. Merriman, have been indicted by the Grand Jury of Sangamon county—the first for sending a challenge for a duel, the second for accepting, and the third for carrying it. The penalty is a fine not exceeding one hundred dollars, and besides, the person convicted is rendered incapable of holding or being elected to any office in the State.

Another Slave Case.—Rose, a colored girl from Mobile, was brought before the Supreme Judicial Court at Boston on Saturday, on a writ of habeas corpus, having come to that city in the service of a Mr. Ticknor, from Mobile. Her good friends who sued out the writ, contended that she was not old enough to judge for herself whether she would run at large or stay with Mr. Ticknor, but the judges held that no one was so capable of judging in that matter as herself She preferred the latter, and the writ was thereupon dismissed.

A man died on one of the flat-boats on the N. Orleans levee, on the 6th inst. of a disease which baffled his physician. A post mortem examination took place, and upon examining his brain, it was discovered that an insect about an inch long, known by the name of a centipede, or hundred legs, had crawled into his ear, causing thereby a most excruciating death.

Song to the Stars.

Silent stars! do you look down
From Your high and azure throne?
Earth's mild beauties do you see,
Mountain, river, rock and tree!
Do you hear the various sounds
With which our rolling world abounds!
The wandering wind of many tones;
Now loud it roars, then low it moans!
Do you hear its music sweet,
As its breath the young leaves meet,
Gliding o'er the clustering vine,
Sweeping through the shadowy pine!
O! its voices are to me
Sweeter than all minstrelsy!
Silent stars! I do not know
Why I always love you so.
On me does your beauty shine
With a harmony divine.
Through the clear and tranquil air,
Looking down so pure and fair,
That I feel you are my friends,
And your light a quiet sends
To my sad and youthful heart,
That I would not have depart,
Like a voice of hope and peace,
Bidding my childhood's sorrow cease. K.

TOWN AND COUNTRY.

BY WILLIAM HOWITT.

[Concluded from last week.]

Cheap Pleasures of a Country Life.

To the real lover of the country there needs no great events, no exciting circumstances to effect his happiness. The freshness of the country, and the profoundness of its quiet, are to him full of happiness. The whole round of the seasons, the passage of every day, the still walk amongst fields and woods, and by running waters, are to him sources of perpetual pleasures. "When the winter is over and gone," he sees with joy the increased light amongst the breaking clouds and dispersing fogs; he feels with delight the milder temperature; he passes by, and observes the first bursting from the warm southern banks of green, luxuriant plants, —the arum, the mercury, the crisp chervil, the wrinkled leaves of the primrose, the blossomed branch of the apricot, and peach on the sunny walls of the cottage, and the almond in the garden and shrubbery, like a tree of rosy sunshine, ere a leaf is yet seen; these things he sees with a feeling that has more true delight in it than ever was known to city drawing-room or palace. To me, the most ordinary walk in the country is, and always has been a luxury. I remember what joy these things gave me when a boy, and now they give me again a boy's heart. I remember the enjoyment I experienced, when an old sportsman used to take his gun on his arm on a Saturday afternoon, when my village school made holiday, and led me up long lanes, between high mossy banks, where the little runnels come rushing and chiming along, between high, overhanging hedges; and through wide, still, shady woods; and across fields deep with greenest grass, and bright with sunshine, and all the glory of spring; and every where pointed out to me the nests of birds, each built in its peculiar situation; the robin and the yellow-hammer on the bank; blackbirds and throstles in the hedges, or under the roots of some old tree overhanging a stream, or set amongst the boughs of the young fir-trees in the plantations. I remember how I used to delight in the depth of rich grass and flowery weeds in the open fields and along the sunshiny hedges; in the hedges themselves, all clad in their young leaves, sprinkled with glittering morning dews, and perhaps waving with the utmost prodigality of hawthorn bloom. I remember, too, with what earnest delight I used to gaze on the bushes of the wild-rose briar, and admire the singular beauty of its finely-cut and emerald-green leaves, amongst which the white-throat framed its gauzy nest. All this I remember; and while I think of it, I seem to hear the lark singing in the clear air above me, as he used to do, with a

Joy we never can come near;

and now I see more clearly what it was produced such an effect upon me. It was that beauty, that wide-spreading, cheering, heart-strengthening beauty—which God hath showered on the face of the earth, to make us feel his presence in his works; and to learn to love him as we go along the most solitary paths, and to rejoice in his goodness, where the world comes not between us and the perception of it. It was that beauty, which is indeed a revelation from heaven, that then made itself felt in my young heart, and has only grown more dear to me every year and every day, and I trust has not been wanting of all that good effect which it is intended it should produce, by weaning us from worldly pleasures, by bringing us to feel habitually the presence of love, and providence, and divine purity, as we go along in solitude and thought; in short, in keeping alive in our hearts the freshness of their feelings and the strength of their better hopes. All this I remember, and it is like the light of a perpetual summer morning in the far-off horizon of memory; and, I say, all these delicious feelings have gone with me through life, and do, and will, go with all those who love nature with a filial love.

The first glimpses of spring have in our eyes and hearts an indescribable charm.— There is a freshness and a mellowness in the earth then, after the frosts and rains of winter, that give a beauty to it that it possesses at no other period of the year. I never see it, and smell the odor of the upturned soil, without seeming to feel renewed our ancient kinship with the earth whence we sprung, which gives us such manifold blessings all our natural lives, and takes us to its peaceful bosom when we lie down wearied, wasted, and heart-worn.— When the laborer cuts his ditches, and piles up his banks anew, there is a beauty in the dark, clear, smooth earth, which his spade cleaves so shiningly. As the children of the village hunt over the steep banks for violets or snail-shells, or the early robin's nest, your eye is made conscious of the beauty of those banks, with their crumbling mould and springing plants. As the drainer cuts his drain in the green-sward of the meadows: as the ploughman turns up the broad lea, all is rich and beautiful. And then, as the hedges and trees clothe themselves in their new and delicate foliage; as the winds come singing sonorously; as the grass and flowers spring beneath your feet; as April now smiles out joyously and bright, and now broods still and beneficent, with a gloom in its sky so unlike the gloom of autumn or winter—a gloom casting a dark shade on the distant landscape, while, in other quarters, the light comes bursting, and gushing through the thinner places of the clouds; and fields lie hushed amid light mists, and scattered with a silvery dew in such a living, prolific greenness, that you feel that the birth of millions of flowers is rapidly maturing; that violets must be springing in legions along the hedges and in the copses; and that the old, yellow English daffodil is nodding in tufts in village crofts, and over the margins of mossy wells.

At such times, so deeply do we feel the entrancing influence of spring, that we cannot help breaking out into an affectionate apostrophe in praise of her:—

All sadness from my heart is gone—
All sadness, and all fears,
Till I forget that thou art one
Who metest not our years.

And then, when May comes in, and we walk abroad some fine, sunshiny, breezy, yet balmy day—balmy in hollows and dells, and along southern uplands; fresh blowing on the ridges of the downs—breezy in the forest glades; and hear the ringing notes of the blackbird and thrush, and the lark calling to high heaven itself in uncontrollable joy; and see peasants out in fields and gardens, women, from the lady of the hall to the dame of the cottage, drawn out to be genial lookers-on, and directors in the renewal of flower borders, in the sowing of seeds and the planting of shrubs, and see old men sitting on stone or wooden benches on the warm side of the house, or leading some little child by the hand down the lane,—two links come strangely together from the extremities of the chain of human life; one not having yet arrived at the troubles of humanity, the other past them; yet what a wide, dark, care-land lying between them!—to see groups of children scattered here and there over the happy fields, tracing the hedge-sides, or the clear streams, or running to secure the first cowslips, while their clear voices come ringing from the distant steeps and hill-tops, why—there is happiness to the nature-loving and man-loving spirit, that is as far beyond the power of human expression, as God's goodness is beyond mortal comprehension.

There is a season of early spring marked by a succession of flowers that has something in it to me more tenderly poetic than any other part of the year. It is that between the appearance of the snow-drop and the cowslip, with all the intermediate links of the crocus, the violet, the pimrose, the anemone, and the bluebell. They have, in themselves, such delicate grace, and are surrounded in our minds by so many poetic associations, and they mark the fleet passing of a period of so much anticipation, that they are seen with a delight at their re-appearance, and a regret that they must soon be gone by. Then, too, they have the world almost all to themselves.— They are the few beloved children of the early time. All their more gorgeous and joyous kindred are still slumbering in the earth. They come forth and salute us amid the naked landscape, amid wild, chilly winds, and beating rain. When the cowslip disappears it is no longer so; all is greenness and sunshine; a thousand blossoms hang on the forest bow, or flutter on the earth; and the delicacy of our perceptions is lost in the profusion of beauty.

But then, in that calmer season, when May has put on all its wealth and splendor; when the fields are deep with grass, and gold and purple with flowers; when the hawthorn is a miracle of beauty and sweetness, perfuming the whole air, what paradises of delight are gardens—warm, flowery, odorous—happy with the hum of bees: and old orchards, where you may witness what Coleridge so feelingly describes in a noble blank-verse letter to his brother:—

As now, on some delicious eve,
We in our sweet sequestered orchard plot
Sit on the tree crooked earthward; whose old boughs,
That hang above us in an arborous roof,
Stirred by the faint gale of departing May,
Send their loose blossoms slanting o'er our heads!

And thus it is through every season. In June and July, the glow and perpetual beauty of the country; the abundance of grass and flowers; the charm of river sides, of angling in woodland streams; the magnificence of thunder-storms; the breaking out of coolness and freshness after them; the delights of running waters; bathing and sailing; the fragrance of fields and gardens; the beauty of summer moonlight; the picturesque cheerfulness of hay-harvest; the enjoyment of rich mountain scenery; rambling amongst the brightness of morning dews, along valleys, past the outstretched feet of health hills, lying on some moorland slope, conscious of all the singular hush and glow of noon; watching all the varying lights and hues, listening to the varied sounds of evening in glens, now basking in the yellow calm sunshine, now deep in gloom; amid towering crags, by the dash of waters, or on some airy ridge that catches the last glow of heaven, taking in a vast stretch of scenes that defy alike the power of pen and pencil.

Ah! slowly sink
Behind the western ridge, thou glorious sun!
Shine in the slant beams of the sinking orb,
Ye purple heath-flowers! richlier burn, ye clouds!
Live in the yellow light, ye distant groves!
And kindle, thou blue ocean! So my friend
Struck with deep joy may stand, as I have stood,
Silent with swimming sense: yea, gazing round
On the wild landscape, gaze till all doth seem
Less gross than bodily; a living thing
Which acts upon the mind, and with such hues
As clothe the Almighty Spirit when he makes Spirits perceive his presence! Coleridge.

And then the corn-harvest, with all its happy human groups, and rich colors; the calm, steady splendor of autumn days; the deepening silence of the decaying year, its returning storms and pictorial tints; the very gloom and awfulness with which the year retreats sending the spirit inwards.— In all these scenes and changes, the soul of the lover of Nature luxuriates: and even finds beauty and strength in the stern visitations of winter. He goes with Nature in all her rounds, and rejoices with her in all. There needs for him no great event, no combination of stirring circumstances; it is not even necessary to him that he be a poet, or painter, or sportsman; if he have not the skill or faculty of any, he has the spirit of all. For him there are spread out in earth and heaven, pictures such as never graced the galleries of art. He sees splendors and scenes painted by the hand of the Almighty, for whose faintest imitations the connoisseur would pay the price of an estate. To him every landscape presents beauty; to him every gale breathes pleasure; and every change of scene or season is a new unfolding of enjoyment. He knows nothing of the heart-burnings and jealousies which infest crowded places. He is not saddened by the sight of wickedness, or the experience of ingratitude and deceit. He is exempt from the ennui of polished society; the sneers of its unkindly criticism; and the hollowness of its professions. He converses with the Great Spirit which lives through the universe, and fills the hearts that open to its influence with purity, humanity, the sweetest sympathies, the most holy desires, and overshadows them with that profound peace, and that inward satisfaction, which are themselves the most substantial happiness.

That these are no vain imaginations, but positive realities, scattered abroad for universal acceptance as much as the blessings of air and sunshine, we have only to open the works of our best writers to be convinced of;—to see how the expression of their happiness breaks from them continually. It is this overflowing and irrepressible gladness of a heart resting on nature which gives such a charm to the writings of White and Evelyn, and good old Izaak Walton. And the poets—they are full of it. Listen to them, and then consider the nobility of their views, and the lofty purity of their souls, and then admit the power and depth of that influence which lives in Nature and speaks in Christianity.

So shalt thou see and hear
The lovely shapes and sounds intelligible,
Of that eternal language which thy God
Utters; who from eternity doth teach
Himself in all, and all things in himself.
Therefore all seasons shall be sweet to thee,
Whether the summer clothe the genial earth
With greenness, or the redbreast sit and sing
Betwixt the turfs of snow in the bare branch
Of mossy apple-tree, while the night thatch
Smokes in the sun-thaw; whether the eve drops fall,
Heard only in the traces of the blast;
Or if the secret ministry of frost
Shall hang them up in silent icicles,
Quietly shining to the quiet moon. Coleridge.

And for the cordial, substantial, heart-filling contentment which is gathered from the quietness of rural life, hear what Sir Henry Wotton, a most accomplished man, who had seen much of court life, says:—

Would the world now adopt me for her heir:
Would beauty's queen entitle me the fair;
Fame speak me Fortune's minion; could I vie
Angels* with India: with a speaking eye,
Command bare heads, bowed knees; strike justice dumb,
As well as blind and lame; or give a tongue
To stones by epitaphs; be called "great master"
In the loose rhymes of every poetaster—
Could I be more than any man that lives,
Great, fair, rich, wise, all in superlatives;
Yet I more freely would these gifts resign,
Than ever fortune would have made them mine:
And hold one minute of this holy leisure
Beyond the riches of this empty pleasure.
Welcome pure thoughts! Welcome ye silent groves!
These guests, these courts my soul most dearly loves.
Now the winged people of the sky shall sing
My cheerful anthems to the gladsome spring;
A prayer-book now shall be my looking-glass,
In which I will adore sweet virtue's face.
Here dwell no hateful looks, no palace cares,
No broken vows dwell here, no pale-faced fears;
Then here I'll sit, and sigh my hot love's folly.
And learn to effect a holy melancholy:
And if contentment be a stranger then,
I'll near look for it but in heaven again.

Such are the pleasures that lie in the path of the lover of country; pleasures like the blessings of the gospel, to be had without money, and without price. There are many, no doubt, who will deem them dull and insignificant; but the peace which they bring "passeth understanding," and we can make a triumphant appeal from the frivolous and the dissipated, to the wise and noble of every country and age.

WISE SAYINGS.

We know little of the causes of things, but may see wisdom enough in every thing; and could we be content to spend as much time in contemplating the wise ends of Providence as we do in searching into causes, it would certainly make us better men, and no worse philosophers.—Baker.

It is an excellent rule to be observed in all disputes, that men should give soft words and hard arguments; that they should not so much strive to vex as to convince each other.—Bp. Wilkins.

True eloquence is good sense, delivered in a natural and unaffected way, without the artificial ornament of tropes and figures. Our common eloquence is usually a cheat upon the understanding; it deceives us with appearances instead of things.—Baker.

In heat of argument men are generally like those tied back to back; close joined and yet they can not see each other.

Men, like watches, are to be valued only for their goings.

A man of ingenuity may go a great way in the field of learning by himself. Heraclitus, the philosopher of Ephesus, had no master or tutor, but attained to great knowledge by his own private study and diligence. Though this can be no rule, it is an example to those who have not the advantage of a guide.—Baker.

The greater the difficulty, the more glory in surmounting it. Skilful pilots gain their reputation from storms and tempests.—Epic.

Our passions are like the seas agitated by the winds; and as God hath set bounds to these, so should we to those; so far they shall go and no farther.

Antigonus, in a battle, being told that his enemies exceeded him in number, asked the reporter against how many he reckoned him?

That which is known to three persons is no secret.

Children's Department.

POLITENESS.

BY MRS. L. M. CHILD.

It is a graceful habit for children to say to each other, "Will you have the goodness?"—and, "I thank you." I do not like to see them, [illegible] few things I dislike so much as a miniature beau, or belle. But the habit of good manners by no means implies affectation or restraint. It is quite as easy to say, "Please give me a piece of pie," as to say, "I want a piece of pie."

The idea that constant politeness would render social life too stiff and restrained, springs from a false estimate of politeness. True politeness is perfect ease and freedom. It simply consists in treating others just as you love to be treated yourself. A person who acts from this principle will always be said to have "sweet, pretty ways with her." It is of some consequence that your daughter should know how to enter and leave a room gracefully; but it is of prodigiously more consequence that she should be in the habit of avoiding whatever is disgusting or offensive to others, and of always preferring their pleasure to her own. If she has the last, a very little intercourse with the world will teach her the first.

I believe nothing tends to make people more awkward as too much anxiety to please others. Nature is graceful; and affectation with all her art, can never produce any thing half so pleasing. The very perfection of elegance is to imitate nature as closely as possible; and how much better it is to have the reality than the imitation. I shall probably be reminded that the best and most unaffected people are often constrained and awkward in company to which they are unaccustomed. In answer, the reason is, they do not act themselves; they are afraid they will not do right, and that very fear makes them do wrong. Anxiety about the opinions of others fetters the freedom of nature. At home where they act from within themselves, they would appear a thousand times better. All would appear well if they never tried to assume what they do not possess. Every body is respectable and pleasing so long as he is perfectly natural. I will make no exception—nature is always graceful. The most secluded and the most ignorant have some charm about them, so long as they effect nothing; so long as they speak and act from the impulses of their own honest hearts, without any anxiety what others think of it.

Coarseness and vulgarity are the effect of education and habit; they can not be charged upon nature. True politeness may be cherished in the hovel as well as in the palace; and the most tattered drapery can not conceal its winning charms.

As far as consistent with your situation and duties, early accustom your children to an intercourse with strangers. I have seen young persons who were respectful and polite at home, seized with a most painful and unbecoming bashfulness as soon as a guest entered. To avoid this evil, allow children to accompany you as often as possible, when you make calls and social visits. Occasional interviews with intelligent and cultivated individuals have a great influence on earthly character and manners, particularly if parents place a high value upon acquaintances of that description. I have known the destiny of a whole family greatly changed for the better, by the friendship of one of its members with a person of superior advantages and correct principle.

THE TRINITY.—NO V.

THE DOCTRINE OF THE TRINITY DEFENDED AGAINST MISCELLANEOUS ATTACKS.

The REV. DR. BEMAN, of TROY, has invented a machine by which persons may be rescued from a burning building, while those who manage the machine may remain perfectly secure from the scorching flame and the suffocating smoke. May Heaven assist that same benevolent brother or some other individual to mature a plan by which we may combat with error, and being safe ourselves, may successfully attempt the rescue of those who are in peril.

The general rule is—"Speaking the truth in love;" may the God of truth direct us in making such specific applications of this rule as will be best adapted to the varied circumstances in which we are placed.

Against the arguments for sustaining the Doctrine of the Trinity, we find, among others, the following objections:—

That the scriptures refer supreme Divinity exclusively to the Father; that Christ is never called God in a sense which implies supreme Divinity; that Christ acknowledged God the Father to be his God; that the Holy Spirit is not a distinct person.

For answers to these objections, the reader is referred to what has been written in the preceding numbers; and also to the fact, that Jesus Christ possessed a human nature, and also inferiority of office.

The truth respecting the human nature of Christ, will aid to explain such expressions as this—"Therefore God, even thy God, hath anointed thee with the oil of gladness above thy fellows." That relating to his inferiority of office will explain this—"Then shall the Son also himself be subject to him that put all things under him, that God may be all in all."

It is also objected that 1st John v. 7, "For there are three that bear record in heaven,' &c., is spurious. This has not been claimed in the preceding argument. By this omission the writer does not intend to concede his claim to the authenticity of the text; but it was his choice not to make use of it in the present discussion, and to leave the defense of it in abler hands. In defense of the authenticity of this disputed passage, the REV. DAVID HARROWER, formerly of TRENTON, Oneida co., N. Y., has written ably. He has well embodied the testimony and arguments of his predecessors, for sustaining that text. (See "Trinitarianism Defended," printed by Wm. Williams, Utica, 1822.)

The REV. NATHANIEL EMMONS, D. D., who never was known to shrink from attempting to meet any difficulty which he found in the path of theological inquiry, in his sermon on 1st John v. 7, does not so much as condescend to notice that any objections had ever been made against its authenticity. Having had years to consider the subject after the publication of his sermon, he has left it in the hands of the criticising world without one word (so far as yet known to the public) of explanation concerning the original omission which has caused hundreds of theological readers to enquire—'Why is it so?'

Considering the Doctor's known style of writing, and the section of country in which he toiled for quite a number of years—more than half a century—his opinion concerning the authenticity of the controverted passage, and also his view of all the objections which Anti-Trinitarians are disposed to urge against its authenticity, could not have been more forcibly expressed than by this his expressive silence.

That the natural construction of 1st John v. 7, does teach the Doctrine of the Trinity, is sufficiently evident from the zeal which the opposers of that doctrine have long manifested to prove the passage spurious.—By the way: One thing is worthy of special notice as we pass, viz:—Those who allege the spuriousness of 1st John v. 7, say that the text was interpolated by some one who was anxious that the Bible should contain one plain and concise statement of the Doctrine of the Trinity,—yet they strenuously contend that the natural construction of the language of the passage is far from expressing that doctrine, while all admit that we must interpret a document in accordance with the known intention of its author!

Sometimes we find fault-finding criticisms on the common English translation of some of those passages on which Trinitarians rely; to the mere English reader a discussion of these matters could not be interesting.—Those among our readers, who, in addition to their own knowledge of the original scriptures, wish some aid in disposing of these questions, will find their enquiries met in STUART'S Letters to CHANNING.

For a mere tyro-linguist to attempt to shed some 'new light' on questions relating to the correct translation of inspired passages from Hebrew and Greek, after Moses Stuart has given the world the results of his labored and protracted investigations of those questions, would be an affair a little too ludicrous to appear in a religious journal.

It is sometimes objected that we do not give an affirmative definition of what we intend by that distinction in the Godhead, which we designate by the word "persons." To this I reply in the language of STUART to CHANNING:—

"In regard to this distinction, we say, it is not a mere distinction of attributes, of relation to us, of modes of action, or of relation between attributes and substance, or essence, so far as they are known to us. We believe the scriptures justify us in these negations. But here we leave the subject. We undertake (at least, the Trinitarians of our country, with whom I am acquainted, undertake) not at all to describe affirmatively the distinction in the Godhead. When you will give me an affirmative description of underived existence, I may safely engage to furnish you with one of person in the Trinity. You do not reject the belief of self-existence, merely because you cannot affirmatively define it: neither do we of a distinction in the Godhead, because we cannot affirmatively define it." (Stuart's Letters to Channing, pamphlet form, 1819, pp. 36, 37.)

It is objected, also, that the doctrine of the Trinity militates against the doctrine of the Unity of God. What is the Doctrine of the Trinity? It is this: "The Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, are three in respect to their personality, and but ONE in respect to their nature and essence." What is there here which opposes the Unity of God? Indeed, does not the very expression, Unity of God, convey to the mind something more than merely the sentiment, that there is one God, as opposed to polytheism? Repeatedly try this expression,—Unity of God—Unity of God. In addition to the fundamental doctrine of the Christian religion—that there is one God, does it not also embrace this idea—viz:—That there are some properties of the Divine existence, which to superficial observers may seem to be opposed to the Divine Unity, yet, when properly viewed, are found perfectly consonant with it? If it be thus, then the phrase, Unity of God, does contain in itself a suggestion of the doctrine of the Trinity. It is my full conviction that Trinitarians in general, thus use it. I find that I do myself, though I was not fully conscious of it until quite recently.

Objections against any branch of the system of revealed truth, can be most effectually obviated by a concise statement of that truth, and by a summary view of the prominent evidence for its support. If such a work has been accomplished in the four preceding numbers, an amount of positive evidence for the Doctrine of the Trinity has been briefly stated, which no criticism, no cavil, no objection, no nice question about the translation of a passage, can possibly weaken. If the truth is advocated by direct and sound arguments, they cannot be shaken by any attacks however adroitly managed.

In taking a retrospect of what I have written, I perceive that I have virtually anticipated objections, or have answered those which have previously been made, or in some way have precluded the necessity of any formal answer to them—to an extent far beyond my own consciousness of so doing at the time. Hence, I find the less to do now. Besides, I am disposed to leave many blanks for common sense and piety to fill.

NATURAL THEOLOGY.—The theology of nature sheds powerful light on the being of a God; and even from its unaided demonstrations, we can reach a considerable degree of probability, both for his moral and natural attributes. But when it undertakes the question between God and man, this is what finds it to be impracticable. It is here where the main helplessness of nature lies. It is baffled in all its attempts to decipher the state and prospects of man, viewed in the relation of an offending subject to an offended sovereign. In a word, its chief obscurity, and which it is wholly unable to disperse, is that which rests on the hopes and the destiny of our species. There is in it enough of manifestation to awaken the fears of guilt, but not enough again to appease them. It emits, and audibly emits a note of terror; but in vain do we listen for one authentic word of comfort from any of its oracles. It is able to see the danger, but not the deliverance. It can excite the forebodings of the human spirit, but cannot quell them—knowing just enough to stir the perplexity, but not enough to set the perplexity at rest. It can state the difficulty but cannot unriddle the difficulty—having just as much knowledge as to enumerate the problem, but not so much as might lead to the solution of the problem. There must be a measure of light, we do allow; but like the lurid gleam of a volcano, it is not a light which guides, but which bewilders and terrifies. It prompts the question, but cannot frame or furnish the reply. Natural theology may see as much as shall draw forth the anxious interrogation, "What shall I do to be saved?" The answer to this comes from a higher theology.—Dr. Chalmers.

THRONE OF JUDGMENT.

We are not alone in this world; for God surrounds us, and the Eternal Majesty is upon the throne. We live in a kingdom governed by God, and it is not the flag of anarchy which is suspended in the clouds above us. It is the banner of the all-glorious and righteous King. Either God exists not, or he is a God of holiness, justice, and order—who hates the wicked, punishes transgression, and cursing the sinners with the sin, casts them both from his presence. The deposer of the universe has his laws, to which he keeps his court of justice where he brings guilt to light—his day of trial, when he passes sentence—and his book, according to whose irrevocable sentence he decides. For transgressors he has his chains and his prisons, his cells for confinement, and his place of punishment, and his reapers at the last day, as well as his executioners, Satan and his host. Thus there is a tribunal behind the clouds, which is represented and mirrowed in the forms of earthly jurisdiction. "The Lord shall endure for ever; he hath prepared his throne for judgment; and he shall judge the world in righteousness, he shall minister judgment to the people in uprightness. Righteousness and judgment are the habitation of his throne. The Lord is known by the judgment which he executeth; the wicked is snared in the work of his own hands."

That court of judgment concerns us all without exception. "For," says the Apostle Paul, "we must all appear before the judgment-seat of Christ, that every one may receive the things done in his body, according to that he hath done, whether it be good or bad." But who will be able to stand before that judgment-seat, who has felt even the least inclination to sin? Who can promise himself a favorable sentence from that Court which judges according to this maxim—"Whosoever shall keep the whole law, and yet offend in one point, he is guilty of all." Our cause seems to be in great danger before that tribunal; because, apart from Christ, there is nothing more certain than that it will irretrievably be lost. Many men, when they behold this state of things, hasten to anticipate the condemnation of God by humble self accusation. But it will not avail. Many have banished entirely the idea of eternal justice from their souls, and pronounce sentence on themselves. But wo to those rebels! Others who feel guilty, and seem to stand already before the bar of that awful tribunal, take refuge in lies, and seek to make excuses. Some resemble criminals pursued by warrants of the law. They know the danger in which they stand, and look for safety in flight, or seek hiding-places amid the noise and bustle of life. Others are evil-doers, who long have remained undiscovered, but to whom some passer-by having cried, "We know you!" a heavy misgiving, and a dull sense of insecurity ever since have weighed down their souls. Many hasten calmly and peacefully to meet the judgment; because they do not measure themselves according to the law by which they shall be measured above, but according to a law of their own. Thus, there are different ways in which men prepare themselves for the awful tribunal of Almighty God; but the day will come when they appear alike, when the fugitives shall be caught, the liars confounded, and the hidden ones be brought to light. Then we shall see all assembled before one throne—in the presence of one Judge—and standing before one open Book. Then every mask and every veil shall fall from our faces. Each shall behold his own life in the light of truth, and each shall receive his last and irrevocable sentence, which shall decide his fate for ever!—Martyr Lamb.

THE SAVIOR PRAYED FOR ME.

"Neither pray I for these alone, but for them also that shall believe on me through their word." It was, as if all the myriads of believers, ever to exist on earth, were before the Savior's mind, and for them all was offered, that amazing expression of his tenderness and love, the prayer contained in the eighteenth chapter of John's gospel. I am a believer, and cannot doubt that the Savior then prayed for me. Then 1st. I am not beneath the deep interest of his infinite mind. My guilt might well have ensured the loss of it; but his mercy reaches the depths to which I have fallen. And this was deep interest. He was just about enduring the agonies of Gethsemane.—That dreadful eclipse of the light of his Father's face was drawing on, covering everything with the deepest gloom and darkness. The cross also, and its unutterable anguish was just at hand. All this was before him and brought a dreadful pressure on his mind. The concern for me must have been great, or it would have been overwhelmed by the powerful emotions which now agitated his bosom.

And more. It was interest expressed by prayer. And such prayer! Jesus saw my wants and perils, the dreadful law of God unsheathing its sword—Satan laying his deep and judicious plots, the world's temptations—the destinies of eternity! All was before him. He could not but pray earnestly; he could never have prayed otherwise.

2. What a motive and encouragement is here to seek the spiritual blessings asked for me in that prayer. He prayed that I might be kept from the evil that is in the world, the evil of my own corrupt and deceitful heart, the allurements of Satan and an ensnaring world, evil of every kind that should threaten my best welfare. With what courage ought I to fight temptation, when I think on that prayer. With what animation should it encourage me to reform the evil temper of my own heart, and to contend against everything that would mar the beauty of Christian character, and injure my spiritual welfare. Can I faint while the animating thought is ever fresh and near—the Savior prayed for me?

He prayed that I might be one with him, as he is one with the Father; that is, that there might be an assimilation of my moral character with his; and hence an holy and eternal union of agreeing minds, mingling like kindred drops; productions of course, of the most pure and elevated bliss. What a motive is here to cast off from my character every thing that is unlike Christ, to pant after and put on every grace he approves. Under such an impulse, can I not employ my highest energies in comforting myself to the lovely likeness of the Son of God?

He has prayed that I might be "where he is, that I might behold his glory." This is the final and grand consummation. This means my attainment to heaven. This is the highest point of benevolent desire. Redeeming love could go no farther. What an incentive is that prayer to every form of care and bearing on my fitness for heaven? What hateful passions cannot I boldly attack? What form of sin shall not look odious in my eyes, and summon my assault upon it, since its destruction was aimed at in my Savior's prayer?

And if he prayed for me that I might be kept from the evil of the world, that I might be one with him in holy and moral character, and gain eternal life, is not that prayer the pledge that no needed grace and aid on his part, shall be wanting to sustain and give success to my endeavors? He has prayed for me, and will he leave me to the unaided efforts of my own weak hands?—Will not a praying friend be also an helping friend? Is not this prayer for me the strongest possible encouragement for me to cast myself upon him for all the aid I need in gaining all the blessings which he so benevolently desired I might attain. Why should I not carry this animating and affecting thought with me through all the temptations and trials of this mortal state, and by it find a stimulus

> "To high endeavor, and to glad success,
> The strength to suffer, and the will to serve."

SIN SEEN FROM CALVARY.—When we learn that to reconcile the Most High to sinners, the humiliation that the sufferings of his only begotten Son were essential; that for his atonement it was essential that He who was in the beginning, who was with God and who was God—God over all, blessed forever—should come in the likeness of sinful flesh, should humble himself, and be obedient to death, even the death of the cross; when we learn that the cup should not pass from Him unless He drank it, do we not learn that nothing short of an INFINITE SACRIFICE for sin is an adequate declaration of the infinite abhorrence with which sin is regarded by a Being of infinite purity; of which all former demonstrations of His wrath against it were but comparatively faint indications? And if this be so, is it not plain, not merely how our conceptions of God's abhorrence of sin are impeded by our slow hearts and blunted moral sensibilities here; and how they must be continually advancing, as our knowledge of the worth and dignity of the sacrifice in which this hatred was embodied, is augmented; and that this knowledge—the whole height, and length, and breadth, and depth, of which, surpasses all finite capacity—must be receiving unceasing additions through the progress of the infinite duration that awaits us?

This must be so. Nor can we doubt that those higher spirits that stand before God's throne, and enjoy that vision which is promised to the pure in heart; who have lived in the light of God's purity since the first dawn of created being, and have witnessed or executed all the awful manifestations of His wrath against sin, since it first appeared among the works of his hands,—we can not doubt, I say, that they find in His last judgment against it,—when He awoke the sword against the man that is his fellow, and was pleased to bruise and to put to grief the son of his love,—new evidence of the holiness before which they veil their faces while they adore it; and they turn from all other monuments of his anger—from the burning cities of the plain—from a deluged world—from the immitigable and unending torments of rebellious angels—to CALVARY—the spectacle of their Creator of all worlds, visible and invisible, in mortal agony of sin; and find in the contemplation, matter to deepen all their apprehensions of infinite malignity of sin, of God's holy hatred of it, and his righteous determination to punish it.

"A TIME TO DANCE."—"A TIME TO DIE."—The first victim of the pestilence was H—— E——. She was the youngest of three daughters in a family, every member of which was impenitent. On Sunday, February 7th, she returned in the state to her father's, to make preparation for a ball during the week. On Monday she was engaged with her sisters in the usual labors of the family. She seemed the picture of health; was unusually talkative and happy. She remarked to her sisters the independence she meant to assume on the evening of the ball. "You," said she, "are to be dressed in white, but I shall appear in black." On Tuesday, the pestilence seized her—Thursday she died. Oh the reverse! On the evening of the ball, the joyous Harriet lay in her white shroud, a corpse; and the wooing sisters kept vigils in black.

The day of her funeral was exceedingly stormy. The wind howled the death dirge. I preached to a solemn audience from the words of Balaam, "Let me die the death of the righteous." The grief of the family was excessive. On taking the last look of the deceased, the sisters wept aloud.—They called on their departed sister in the piteous moanings of despair. It was all in vain, death would not release his prey.—We conveyed the body to the grave, there to remain till the trump of God shall awake the sleeping dust.—Pastors' Jour.

UNCOMFORTABLE DISCIPLES.

You will find some such in every church. They are not happy. We wish it was deep sorrow for their sins that made them unhappy; or deep solicitude for perishing souls; or deep concern to see God so much dishonored as he is, in this guilty world. But these are not the causes of their troubles. If they were much troubled about these things, they would lose sight of their own sorrows. They would forget themselves.

Envy makes some of the disciples uncomfortable: They see others enjoy what providence has placed out of their reach. They would like to have Naboth's vineyard and Mordecai's honors. They [illegible] of their own blessings [illegible] they fix on other men's [illegible] ing their hearts at home [illegible] enjoyment of what [illegible] constantly sending [illegible] after what belong [illegible] sad repinings over [illegible] ferior lot in life [illegible] ceedingly uncom[illegible]

So do some [illegible] are afraid their [illegible] undervalued. [illegible] hear any one pr[illegible] praise they [illegible] of giving the [illegible] brush. They must [illegible] a sneer. If they [illegible] as "the least of all [illegible] their jealousy would [illegible] are constantly finding [illegible] have been neglected or [illegible] their pastor or some of their [illegible]—Constant use has exceedingly sharpened their power of discerning things of this sort, and so has exceedingly augmented their skill and power in making themselves miserable.

Some are uncomfortable, as their complaining shows, by reason of the small amount of their spiritual consolations. But they spend their strength in lamentations over their sad condition, instead of spending it in spiritual efforts to regain departed religious joys. Their sighs are sent into the ears of man in quest of his sympathy, and not into the ears of God for his aid. Hence these lamentations are clouds without water.

> Were half the breath thus vainly spent
> To heaven in supplication sent,
> Their cheerful song would oftener be,
> "Hear what the Lord hath done for me."

Some seem to regard it as a kind of merit to reiterate to others the sorrowful tale of their spiritual troubles. They exhaust that strength in the display of their uncomfortable condition, which, if employed in active christian duty and close communion with God, would cause light to rise in obscurity and their darkness to become as the noonday.

Uncomfortable disciples are very sure to make other people uncomfortable. It is always a trouble to see any one in trouble. The pastor instead of feeling an animating impulse in his work from a scene of spiritual joy and engagedness in duty, must witness sorrow that some unworthy passion has awakened, and have his spirit chafed by the recital of troubles which would vanish before an active zeal in doing good.—The animated and active in the church come in contact with icebergs when thrown among such disciples as have been described. They are chilled. The holy fire of their own bosoms burns less brightly by contact with such cold, cheerless, comfortless beings.

Comfortless disciples are so skillful in turning every thing done for them into snow and ice, that it is rather discouraging attempting to build a fire for their benefit. They baffle every effort to lead them out from those cheerless polar regions where they choose to reside. We have known some to receive the most decided advantages from being left entirely to themselves, to be comfortless since they would be so, to be cold since they would not leave the frigid zone, to receive no expression of sympathy since in fact stood in no need of it. Thus being bereft of all earthly comforts, they have been roused by that fact from their icy condition, have been thawed out by the heat excited by self-exertion, with God's blessing, and have, hence become very comfortable and comforting disciples.—Boston Recorder.

FEAR HATH TORMENT.—Fear proceeds especially from an evil and defiled conscience. No sooner had Adam incurred the latter by his disobedience, than he was afraid, and fled from the face of God. A guilty conscience is like a dangerous and poisonous imposthume in the individual, which finally prepares him for the flames of hell, unless healed by the blood of Christ, the only remedy. This alone, appropriated by the power of the Holy Spirit, brings peace. But as the renovation of the children of God here upon earth is progressive, this part of it is peculiarly so, and is more obvious when trying circumstances occur, than at other times. Besides which, as Moses said—Psalm xc. 8—in the seasons of visitation, God places our "transgressions before him, and our secret sins in the light of his countenance." He begins at some after period to reckon with his servants, and to set before their eyes what they have done—Psalm xcix. 8—"Thou answeredst them, and thou forgavest them though thou tookest vengeance of their inventions." Perhaps they are not sufficiently aware of the greatness of their guilt—its abominable and culpable nature, and the aggravating circumstances which attend it. They have not been rendered sufficiently contrite, humble, and heart-broken on account of it—they have not duly accused themselves before God. They have been desirous of excusing, if not in some measure of justifying themselves. Their hatred to sin is not perhaps sufficently powerful. Their desire for deliverance, and their gratitude on account of it, not enough ardent. They must be made to ascend higher, and to descend deeper. Their self knowledge must receive an addition, and their view of the real nature, extent, necessity, and preciousness of divine grace, must become brighter. Their conscience must be rendered more tender, their walk more circumspect, their looking unto the Lord more fixed, their abiding in Him, and his [illegible] in them more intimate, and themselves more fit for every good work, by faith [illegible] Jesus. The potter takes the clay [illegible] hands, and purifies and en[illegible] one degree to an other. The [illegible] of God is from faith to [illegible] strength to strength. The [illegible] which at first was but thirty- [illegible] sixty-fold, and at last increase [illegible] In the blade the ear is [illegible] latter shoots pleasingly forth [illegible] and fills itself with [illegible] ripens both in the sunshine [illegible] storm. The child becomes a [illegible] youth a man and a father in [illegible] whom as the Head, they grow [illegible] in all things. Such is the conduct [illegible] heavenly Father with his people, [illegible] they may be holy and without blame [illegible] him in love.—Jacob wrestling with the Angel.

WHEN I AM AWAKE I AM STILL WITH THEE.

These were the words of David, the sweet Psalmist of Israel. He had known what it was to be cast down and forsaken of his God, in consequence of sin, but now his sins are forgiven, and he is enabled to lay himself down and sleep sweetly for God was with him. And as the light of opening day dawned upon him, he is led to exclaim with holy admiration and praise "When I am awake I am still with thee." Let us for a moment contemplate the state of the Psalmist as here expressed. God was with him, which implies safety.—When a friend stronger than ourself is with us we feel much more safe, even in danger, than alone. But O, how secure are they who feel that Jehovah is near! Surely they need not fear what man can do, for who can sink, or even fail while the Lord is near and a present help in time of trouble. But it is also a happy state. We feel ourselves happy in company of our superiors, especially if they are interested in our enjoyment and welfare. But O how infinitely superior is the presence of the glorious and ever blessed God. His holy presence constitutes the bliss of heaven itself, and where He lifts up the light of His countenance there is heaven begun, and happy, yea, unspeakably happy is that man that can say from a feeling and abiding sense of the love of God in his heart, when I awake I am still with thee." O how pleasant thus to awake in the morning, how sweet the thoughts, how fervent the prayer, how melodious the song. Let us so live as to enjoy this safe and happy state continually.—Fayetteville Luminary.

DISGRACEFUL END.—Mankind are made rational creatures; and the design of God is that they should obey him and be happy. When therefore, any run to great lengths in wickedness, folly and dissipation, and bring disgrace and misery upon themselves, and in a moment of desperation lay violent hands upon themselves, and hurry into an awful eternity, their earthly end, alone, is inglorious. But when those who have such a vitiated fancy and taste, as to sacrifice at the shrine of fashion, waste the energies of the mind given for a higher purpose, put the body in pain, destroy health and hurry down to a premature grave, their end is reproachful and ignominious.—Morning Star.

Common swearing argues in a man a perpetual distrust of his own reputation; and is an acknowledgment that he thinks his bare word not to be worthy of credit.

Lerning is preferable to riches, and virtue is to both.

Use of Adversity.—That affliction when it comes upon us either in the shape of bodily indispostion, or extreme poverty, blighting calumny, unfits us for service of God, is the complaint which is usually made by those who are visited with it in the prime of life; while many an aged disciple, who is completely disabled by his infirmities, is apt to wonder why he is still preserved in life, when his usefulness apparently gone. But is he, who considers that the greatest usefulness in glorifying God, will see at a single glance, that there is no ground for such thoughts in either. In regard even to present usefulness, and without reference to the future service for which affliction may be preparing them, they may glorify God as much by patient suffering as by active service, & may thus in the highest degree be useful to those who are around them. The mere consideration of their sufferings may impress many a salutary lesson on the minds of others, especially of the young; while the active and consistent exercise of their Christian graces, in such circumstances, may afford an example of religion in sustaining power, such as is admirably fitted to commend it to the acceptance of their friends. Thus, even the aged sufferer, disabled as he is from active duty, may be a powerful witness for Christ; and although he has no prospect of being restored to his former sphere of exertion, he occupying with good and beneficial effect, the post which the Lord has assigned to him. If it be true, as unquestionably it is, that even an old blind beggar is not without his moral use in the world, how much more certain it is, that the aged apparently disabled believer, even in his greatest infirmities, is a blessing to his family and friends; for how can he be more useful to them, or how could he better glorify God, than by exhibiting as he does in the hour of greatest need the worth and value of that divine religion which comforts him in all his tribulations, and smooths his path to the grave; which enables him to rise above the love of life and fear of death, and to rejoice with joy unspeakable and full of glory, and bear his testimony to the love and faithfulness of his Lord throughout the whole course of his protracted trials! Such a man is not useless, though his limbs be inactive, his memory faded, all his faculties impaired, yet his moral feelings are strong with him; his faith is firm, his hope is heavenly, his heart is full of peace and joy; many another heart feels that the aged sufferer makes a deeper and more salutary impression on it, than all the learning and eloquence of the schools. An aged believer was wont to say, when reduced to extreme poverty, and wholly disabled by a paralytic stroke, "I seem to myself and others to be a useless burden on the world; but I know and believe that God must have something yet to do by me or in me, otherwise I should not be here."—Buchanan.

THE REGISTER.

De Ruyter Institute.

The Summer Term of this Institute closes to-day. The examination has given the fullest evidence of the success and ability of the Teachers, and, so far as we have been able to learn, they have gained the entire confidence of the scholars. And we are informed by many of them that they have never spent a more pleasant and profitable term in this or other schools than the one which now closes. Perfect harmony and good order have been preserved throughout, and nought has occurred to mar the strictest friendship between Teachers and Students. The teachers have shown themselves every way qualified for their several departments, and their system of managing and teaching have been such as to gain the hearts of the Students, and secure them the greatest success in their several studies. Those who have patronized the school, we are sure, will have no occasion to regret it; and we are happy to announce to them that the Trustees have secured the further services of each of them; and also that they will secure other competent Teachers as they may be needed.

We are sure that we are not saying too much when we assert it as our opinion, that superior advantages are not held out by schools of this order to those now offered here. We have had some acquaintance with other schools, and we know of none that offer equal advantages with this at so little expense, including Tuition, Board, &c. Nothing is now required but the hearty co-operation of the friends of the Institute with the Trustees and Teachers, to place this school on an equality with others in numbers as it already is in advantages.

The next Term will commence on the second Friday of September.

The Traitor.

Night had spread her sable curtains around the city of ———, inviting its busy inhabitants to the chambers of repose. All things around wore the appearance of quiet, save the hurried tread of some as they hastened to seek repose from the busy cares that had from early dawn chained their attention. The stillness of the night was uninterrupted save by the gentle breeze as it played among the leaves of the Olive and the Locust, or as it more fiercely whistled by the turreted domes of the grandees; when a small band might be seen issuing from the Prætorium, or hall of justice, secretly wending their way to the nearest gate of the city. One might suppose from their warlike appearance that it was a banditti of brigands on an errand of vengeance. Their swords and spears, glittering ever and anon in the moon's pale beams, as they emerged from behind a copse of wild olives, or the mansions of the rich, might have awakened in the beholder convictions of the deadly purpose that hastened them on. They heeded not the watchmen of the city, nor were they anxious to avoid the presence of those who guarded the gates. A sign of recognition was passed as they emerged from the outer gate, and hurried on their course.

On the mountains that skirted the city on the east, at the pale "noon of night," might be seen a lone band with the broad canopy of heaven for their covering. Some of them were seeking repose on the cold ground, while one alone was filled with the greatest anxiety, continually casting his imploring eyes to heaven, and in an agony of grief pouring out his soul to Him who rides in the storm. The chilling winds stiffened the wearied limbs of his companions as they stretched themselves on the cold ground; but the deep anxiety of his soul caused the purple sweat to stand upon his lofty brow, or trickle down his care-worn cheek to the ground. The day he had spent in the city assiduously laboring to relieve the needy, and instruct the ignorant; nor did he cease his task until compelled by weariness to leave the bustle of the great emporium, and seek repose in the shades of the forest. Day after day found him on his errand of mercy, pouring the balm of consolation into the wounded heart, and by whatever means he might, teaching the right way to happiness. And when the labor of the day closed, he retired to some obscure place where he might contemplate the work before him, and seek renewed vigor to aid him in his labor of love. Thus might he be found, nerved up to the greatest possible anxiety, and as it were unconscious of all around him, when an armed host suddenly approached his lone retreat. At the still "noon of night," such an array of swords and spears, might have appaled the stoutest hearts; yet his soul, conscious of integrity and overflowing with benevolent emotions, shrunk not at approaching the fearful host, and he cried, "Have ye come out as against thieves and robbers? Why this array of arms? Why this martial host? Has aught revolutionary or factious fallen from my lips?" The armed host, conscience smitten at the horrid task in which they had engaged, fell back amazed, when one of artful mien and brazen front, with a traitorous kiss saluted him as a token to the host to sieze and hail him before a mock tribunal, then awaiting his approach. The trial, the conviction by false testimony, the execution followed each other in rapid succession, ere the spell that bound the Traitor's heart had allowed him to contemplate his daring act. Once he stood among the followers of him whom he had now delivered to be slain. He saw his meekness and labor of love. He was daily a witness to the benevolence of his Master, when he raised up the bowed down, and caused the destitute and afflicted to rejoice. He was instructed into his motives and objects, and was entrusted with the small pittance that supplied their daily wants. But yet the divine teachings that daily sounded in his ears, and the meliorating influence that ever attended them, were alike unheeded. His heart was captivated with the small treasure with which he was entrusted, and the overweaning desire to add to this induced the horrid deed. He had already learned that the holy teachings of his Master offended those who ruled in the city, and that he could not do them or himself a greater service, than to deliver him into their hands.—But now that he saw him condemned and dead, his awful crimes filled his horror-stricken heart with dismay; and the conviction that he had delivered the holy, the benevolent and disinterested, to death, drove him in a phrenzy to consummate his life of crime, and hastened him to join the company of devils in the abodes of despair.

Reader, we have referred you to the Lord Jesus Christ, who died to save your ruined souls. And your ready thoughts will at once remind you that a worse traitor than Brutus, was he who could thus deliver him to death. His divine teaching, his just requirements, and the holy precepts of his Gospel, have often greeted your ears. His holy spirit with his word have alike convinced your understandings, and perhaps induced some of you to make professions of discipleship. All things excellent and true conspire to convince you that Jesus is worthy of your hearts and lives. And none can dispute that his claims to these are most equitable and just. And to finish our tale, we say that a worse traitor than ourselves cannot be found, if after enjoying the goodness of God always, we refuse him our hearts and affections, and seek to please ourselves with other things. He is the greatest Ttaitor that denies the Lord Jesus Christ, and will not walk in his ways, and submit to his direction. Ungodly professor! careless sinner! in the traitor's doom, you read your own.

ARRIVAL OF THE ACADIA.

FIVE DAYS LATER FROM EUROPE.

The Royal Mail steamship Acadia, Capt. Riory, arrived at Boston at 2 o'clock on Monday morning from Liverpool, which port she left on the 20th July, at noon, arrived at Halifax at 11 A. M. on Saturday last, and left at 4 P. M. on the same day for Boston, making the passage in 12 days and 14 hours from Liverpool, and 34 hours from Halifax.

She brought 72 passengers to Halifax, landed twelve there, and took 7 more for Boston.

Among the passengers in the Acadia, is Samuel Swartwout, Ex-Collector of the port of New-York.

By this arrival we have received Liverpool papers to the 20th and London to the 19th ult.

There is no later intelligence from China.

The London Journal of Commerce intimates that the French government are about to send a flotilla to Texas, in order to obtain satisfaction for the insults offered to M. Saligny, the French Minister to that Republic.

The Bank of Marylebone, a joint-stock establishment, had concluded to wind up its concerns.

An application is about to be made to the Pope to elect a resident Cardinal in Ireland.

Russia is showing great activity in her arsenals. Several war steamers are building of large size.

The Sheffield Patriot states, that during a heavy thunder storm on Thursday week, "hundreds of small fishes descended with the rain. Many of them were alive."

There had been a terrible hail storm on the 15th ult. It began at Brighton, fell heavily in various parts of Sussex, destroying in one conservatory alone, at Henfield, 3000 panes of glass, the hail stones falling of the size of eggs. It then crossed the centre of Kershire, and proceeded in a curvilinear course, went across the eastern part of the island.

Advices from Trebisond, 17th ult., quoted by the Malta Times, mention a rumor of a great victory obtained by the Anglo-Indian troops in Affghanistan. The evacuation of the fortress of Ghorian is confirmed.

The Rurich papers states that the eastern part of that canton and nearly the whole Saint Gall have been recently devastated by a severe storm. In parts the crops and vegetation were entirely destroyed, large trees were uprooted, barns swept away, and houses so much damaged as to be rendered uninhabitable.

London, July 19.—Twelve o'clock.—The Money Market is very firm this morning, and the prices of both English and Foreign securities have advanced, which is no doubt to be attributed mainly to the influx of money proceeded from the payment of the dividends, which the public are now investing.

From the Liverpool Times, July 20.

THE RESULT OF THE ELECTIONS.

The elections are now completed with exception of two Irish counties, viz. Kerry and Wexford. The numbers (exclusive of these two counties) are as follows:—

	Reformers.	Tories.
English Borough	175	166
English Counties	22	137
Ireland	57	42
Scotland	31	22
Total	286	368

As no doubt is entertained of the return of the four Reform candidates at Wexford and Kerry, the number of the Reformers may be fairly stated at 290, which, in a House of 658, leaves the Tories a majority of 87.

The majority, we must acknowledge, is considerably more numerous than we anticipated It will probably be somewhat reduced when Parliament assembles, by the unseating of several of the Conservatives who have been returned for Irish cities and borough, owing to the most outrageous decisions of the advisers of the returning officers. There will also be a great number of English members unseated by election committees, though it is impossible to tell at present how this will affect the balance of parties. But even supposing that the Liberty party should gain something considerable by the result of the committees, there will still be a majority in favor of the Conservatives of between 60 and 70 votes, a majority amply sufficient for the purposes of Government. Much as we regret that the result should he against the present Ministers, yet we believe it is for the interest of the country that their opponents, having a majority, should have one sufficient to enable them to conduct the business of the country. With such a majority, the whole resonsibility will rest upon them, if they should misgovern the country, and if they can govern it better than their predecessors, they will be fairly entitled to the praise. As far as the political Government of England and Scotland is concerned, the new Administration will probably differ very little from the present one, and its foreign policy may also be expected to be very much the same. Its commercial policy will, however, be directly opposed to that of the present Government and to the interests of all except the privileged classes, and it will find no small difficulty in keeping its own friends in Ireland in any thing like order.

A ministerial paper informs us that an important event is going to take place. A "National Conference of Ministers" of all "Religious Denominations" is to be held at Marchester "commencing Tuesday, August 15, 1841."

Dreadful Outrage at Waterford.—A monster, named Morgan, three times deliberately fired a pistol, loaded with slugs at a crowd of boys and girls who were shouting, "Wyse and Barron for ever!" "Down with the Tories." Eleven of the poor children were wounded, and three of them are not expected to recover.

Congressional News.

From the New-Yorker.

WASHINGTON CORRESPONDENCE.

Monday, July 26.

The House of Representatives were to-day engaged in the consideration of the Revenue Bill in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. Lawrence of Pa. in a sound and practical manner, spoke for about half an hour in support of his motion of Saturday, to exclude from the proposed advance of duty "tea and coffee." He held that these were necessaries of life, which entered into the consumption of the laboring as well as the affluent class of community, and that a duty of twenty per cent. should not be levied on them, to be wrung from the sweat of the poor man's brow, but should be taken from the rich on the luxuries, wines, silks, &c. which would not be felt.

The bill was opposed by Messrs. Atherton, Rhett, Campbell and Ward, who entered into an exposition of the economical pretences of the Administration, charging it with extravagance, and deception of the people.

Mr. Adams spoke nearly an hour in support of the bill, entering into the history of the Compromise and the general subject of the Tariff. The House adjourned, without action, at three o'clock.

In Senate, Mr. Sevier presented certain papers of a Choctaw Indian now in this city, praying for a confirmation of certain land titles to that tribe: which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. Clay of Ky., presented the petition of many respectable business men of the City of Washington, for the renewal of the Charters of the Banks of the District: which, on his motion, was laid on the table and ordered to be printed.

The Fiscal Bank Bill was taken up, the question being on agreeing to the remaining amendments of the Committee: most of which were adopted.

Mr. Clay opposed the amendments prohibiting the directors of any office of discount and deposit from receiving loans from the Bank.

It was also opposed by Mr. Huntington and advocated by Messrs. Clay of Ala. and Sevier, and then rejected: Yeas 25; Nays 24.

Mr. Clay of Ky., opposed the amendment prohibiting discounts of paper of which a member of Congress is maker, drawer endorsers, or acceptor.

Mr. Walker moved to amend it by prohibiting the discount of notes for members of Congress. This was advocated by Messrs. Buchanan, King, Walker and Cuthbert, and opposed by Mr. Clay of Ky.: after which it was adopted: Yeas 25; Nays 21.

The amendment limiting the entire liabilities of any direction of an office of discount and deposit, to ten thousand dollars, was advocated by Messrs. Benton and Cuthburt and was adopted: Yeas 27; Nays 24.

Several other amendments than those mentioned having been concurred in, the amendments of the Committee were disposed of.

On motion of Mr. Clay, amendments were adopted providing for the payment of subscriptions to stock in certificates of stock issued under the Loan bill.

Mr. Huntington renewed his motion made in Committee to make the lowest denomination of notes of the Bank five dollars instead of ten.

Mr. Bayard moved a modification, giving Congress the power hereafter to make the lowest denomination ten dollars.

The amendment gave rise to a warm debate, in which it was advocated by Messrs. Huntington and Bayard, and opposed by Messrs. Woodbury, Tappan, Buchanan, and Sevier; after which, it was rejected, by an equal vote: Yeas 25; Nays 25.

Mr. Walker offered his printed amendment, striking out the clause giving the President the power to appoint three Directors of the Bank, and inserting a provision for the annual appointment of four Directors by Congress—two by each House, to be elected at the same ballot, by the greatest number of votes. This was advocated at some length and with much earnestness by Mr. Mr. Walker, and briefly opposed by Mr. Clay. It was rejected: Yeas 7; Nays 35.

The bona fide amendments were now offered, and political and party feelings were vented in some propositions of a remarkable character, on the part of the Opposition.

Mr. Linn moved a provision that no person who was President or Director of the old Bank when its Government Directors were excluded from examining its affairs, or who concurred in the exclusion, or in the measures of the Bank, producing ruin and pressure in 1833 and '34, shall ever be a Director in this Bank or any of its Branches. It was rejected: Yeas 15; Nays 28.

Mr. McRoberts moved a provision, that no one who was a director of the old Bank, when the Committee of the House of Representatives was refused leave to examine the Bank, shall ever be eligible to the place of officer of the Bank, or any of its branches; nor shall any person be re-eligible, who, during his term of service shall have voted for any wilful invasion of the provisions of the act, and that every person on becoming a director shall take oath that he has not concurred in any wilful violation of the act; and that false swearing in this respect shall be deemed wilful and corrupt perjury, and be punishable therefor. This was lost: Yeas 13; Nays 28.

Mr. Benton offered an amendment that all laws applying to money in the Treasury of the United States should be applicable to money in this Bank. This was opposed by Mr. Clay as unnecessary—a provision of this character existing in the bill. It was negatived: Yeas 21; Nays 27.

Mr. Smith of Ct., moved a proviso that no loan should be made to any individual incorporation of a larger amount than ten thousand dollars, when an application for a less sum, on good security, is pending or rejected. This was rejected: Yeas 21; Nays 28

Mr. Morehead inquired if gentlemen had completed their amendments, if so, he would move an adjournment, as he intended speaking to the general merits of the bill.

Mr. Benton moved a prohibition of any member of Congress, while a member or for ten years after, to be stock-holder in the Bank, or to be in any way employed by it. This motion was negatived: Yeas 22; Nays 29.

Mr. Tappan moved an additional section at the end of the bill, asserting the power of Congress to alter or repeal this charter at pleasure. This was rejected: Yeas 21; Nays 28.

Mr. King moved a proviso, prohibiting the President and Vice President of the United States, the Heads of the Executive Departments, and Judges of the Supreme Court, from receiving loans or discounts.—This was rejected: Yeas 23; Nays 27.

The amendments were now gone through and a number of the latter ones, many of the opposition refused to vote at all on them.

Mr. King proposed that the bill be ordered to be engrossed to-night. This would cut off all lingering, useless amendments, and leave the general question open for discussion.

Mr. Calhoun took the same view, speaking much of the desire of the minority to hasten business.

Messrs. Clay and Morehead declined cutting themselves entirely off from amendments now, but would agree if the other side concurred in it, to take the final vote on the amendments, if any, and on the main question at twelve o'clock to-morrow.

The Senate adjourned at five o'clock.

Tuesday, July 27.

The Senate have to-day been arduously and successfully engaged in the transaction of that business to the completion of which the people are looking with so much interest. The Bank Bill has been engrossed to a third reading—which is equivalent to its passage—an important amendment of Mr. Clay's having been adopted.

The morning business was first completed, among which was the introduction of a bill by Mr. Preston, to amend the act to carry into effect the treaty with Mexico.—Mr. P. briefly explained its object and necessity, and on his motion it was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. Southard presented a letter from the Rev. Mr. Bingham, of the Sandwich Islands, with which a copy of the Bible, in their language, was presented to the Library of Congress.

Messrs. Young and Buchanan offered Abolition petitions, which were not received, the question of reception being laid on the table.

The Bank Bill was then taken up, and Mr. Morehead spoke for upwards of two hours in an able and at times unusually eloquent manner, in favor of a Bank of the United States, entering into our financial history from the foundation of the Government to the present time, referring for authority for a bank, to Washington, Jefferson, Crawford, Jackson, Hamilton, &c.—He exhibited profound political research, and an extensive and critical financial knowledge. He closed with an eloquent appeal to the Whig party to meet the expectations of an anxious people, in carrying out the measure before them.

Mr. Calhoun briefly replied, and made explanations relative to his position with regard to the Bank Question in 1816 and 1831, to which reference had been made.

He was followed by Mr. Allen, who bitterly opposed the Bank, and reiterated his previous declaration, that the very day the bill received the signature of the President, and become a law, he should bring in a bill for its repeal.

Mr. Benton moved to postpone the bill indefinitely, and spoke on this at some length. He subsequently withdrew his motion.

Mr. Simmons moved a reconsideration of the vote, by which the amendment of Mr. Huntington was yesterday rejected, limiting the least denomination of notes of the Bank to five dollars.

The motion for reconsideration, after discussion by Messrs. Benton and Smith of Ia., was carried by a vote of 27 Yeas to 23 Nays.

The amendment was then adopted, as previously modified, giving Congress power hereafter to limit the lowest denomination to ten dollars: Yeas 27; Nays 22.

Mr. Clay expressed his desire that the question be taken to-day. In the state in which the bill now stood as regards the branching power, they knew they could not pass the bill. The vote would be 26 against and 25 for it. He dwelt at length on the importance of union among the friends of the general principles of the measure, and a concession and compromise in its details, for the purpose of creating the Agent which was so imperatively demanded by the best interests of the country. In this spirit he offered an amendment to the 16th fundamental rule, providing that the directors be empowered to establish one or more competent offices of discount in any Territory, District or State of the United States, with the assent of such State; and when established, the said office shall only be removed by the Directors prior to the expiration of the charter of the Bank, with the previous assent of Congress; provided that the assent of any State should be presumed which does not, at the first Session of its Legislature after the passage of this act, assent or dissent to such establishment; and that whenever it should be deemed by Congress necessary and proper for carrying into execution any power granted by the Constitution, to establish an office in any State whatever, it shall be the duty of the Directors to establish such an office accordingly.

Mr. Clay made some further remarks advocating the proposition as a medium ground on which those who took different views as to the branching power, might meet.

Mr. Rives expressed his regret that he could not vote for the proposition of his friend, and that, from conscientious scruples, he should be reluctantly obliged to separate from him on this amendment. He contended that there was no principle of compromise in it, but indirectly it asserted the same power as the bill itself, of establishing branches when deemed necessary by Congress, independent of the assent of the States.

The amendment was advocated by Messrs. Simmons and Preston, and opposed by Messrs. Calhoun, Walker and Buchanan, together with the alternate debate of Messrs. Clay and Rives. The question was then taken, and the amendment concurred in, by the following vote: Yeas 25; Nays 24.

Thus the amendment was adopted by a majority of one—two Senators, Messrs. Clayton and Henderson, being absent.

The question was then taken on the engrossment, and was carried by a precisely similar vote of 25 to 24.

The Senate adjourned at about 5 o'clock. In offering his amendment Mr. Clay expressed the opinion that the President would give his signature to the bill with the amendment but he had had no communication whatever with him. The whole discussion and especially the remarks of Messrs. Rives and Clay, was listened to by a crowded Senate with much interest.

The House have to-day been occupied in a discussion on the Revenue Bill, and adjourned at 3 o'clock without action.

News of the Day.

Defeat and capture of a colored troop of banditti.—The following account is copied from the St. Louis Argus of July 23.

Great battle in the Indian country.—Large numbers of Indians, negroes and mongrels from Florida have been placed upon the borders of Arkansas and Missouri. By a gentleman direct from Fort Leavenworth we learn that some 600 negroes from Florida and runaways from Choctaws and Cherokees and from the whites, united with a few Indians, and perhaps a few white men, have been gradually associated in the fastnesses west of Arkansas. Not long since they marched high up Red River and camped for the purpose of hunting buffalo. They built a very tolerable Fort with logs, surrounded with a ditch, to protect themselves against all dangers. They caught but few buffalo and therefore to supply their wants invaded the possessions of the Choctaws and carried off cattle, poultry, grain, &c. The Choctaws followed, but finding their numbers and fortifications an overmatch they retired and sent to Fort Gibson for the U. States Dragoons. Captain Moore of Company D., was sent to capture them with three companies of Dragoons, but after arriving on the Red River he found their entrenchments too strong and their number too great to venture an attack. He accordingly sent to Fort Towson and was re-enforced with a fine company of infantry and a couple of pieces of cannon.

The cannon were shortly brought to bear upon the works, and soon made the splinters fly and the logs move so queerly, that the refugees, at a signal, rushed outside of their fortifications and to form upon the Prairie in front of their works. Ere they fully succeeded in doing so, Captain Moore and his gallant dragoons charged upon them at full gallop. The carnage that ensued is represented as terrific—the dragoons routed them in all directions, and, after putting large numbers to the sword, succeeded in capturing the whole body. The conduct of the dragoons is represented as worthy of all commendation as regards both skill and bravery. The bravery and numbers of the refugees availed absolutely nothing against the irresistable charge of the mounted dragoons.

This decisive blow will give security to that exposed portion of our frontier, and convince the refugee negroes and Indians that our dragoons may not be trifled with. The loss of the dragoons was unknown to our informant—he said an express brought the news to the Fort.

Late from Florida.—We are indebted to a passenger, per schooner Empire, from St. Augustine, arrived at this port, for the following: "Official information was received in town on the 26th instant, stating that the Indians despatched by Coachooche to bring his men, had retured with 15 warriors, and 60 others were on their way.—Colonel Worth, to test their sincerity, informed them that if their statement was true they should be well treated: if otherwise, showing them 15 pieces of cord, they might select for themselves.—Charleston Cour.

Insects in Chalk.—Professor Ehrenberg has made remarkable discoveries in the course of his various experiments on chalk. He found that a cubic inch possessed upwards of a million microscopical animalculæ, consequently a pound weight of chalk contains about ten millions of these animalculæ! From these researches it appears probable that all the strata of chalk in Europe are the product of microscopical animalculæ, most of them invisible to the naked eye.

Naval Sham Fight.—The Norfolk Herald states that the visitors at Old Point Comfort had recently an opportunity of witnessing the exercises of the crew of the Delaware 74, lying at anchor about two miles off. The operation of a regular fight with blank catridges was gone through, the cannon firing from every part of the ship and the intervals filled up with the rattling of musketry from the tops and quarter deck. The exhibition was as novel as it was terrific to those unaccustomed to such sights.

Negro insurrection timely suppressed.—Yesterday morning news reached this city by the steamboat Clipper No. 1, Captain Laurent, that a contemplated insurrection on the part of the slaves was providentially discovered in West Feliciana. The news, though not in a very definite shape, spread with rapidity through the city creating much excitement.

From Captain Laurent and other sources, we have been able to gather the following information in relation to the subject:

On Friday night last, the overseer on Robert J. Barrow's plantation, in West Feliciana, happened to go to the door of a negro house and heard several of the slaves discussing a contemplated insurrection, to take place on the night of the first of August.

After satisfying himself of their design, he withdrew unperceived, and early on Saturday morning had them all arrested—They confessed to the existence of the plot, implicating several negroes on the adjoining plantations. The alarm spread like electricity; in a short time some forty or fifty negroes were arrested. The citizens of Bayou Sara were preparing to try the prisoners when Captain Laurent left on yesterday morning.

From all that can be learned, the conspiracy extended throughout the greater part of this State and the State of Missippi, and the watch-word of the wretches to be "no quarter." It is said that some white men were the leaders in the diabolical scheme, and that two of them have been taken; but of this Captain Laurent did not inform us. The intelligence by the next boat will be important. We trust to the vigilance and proper spirit of our fellow-citizens in Louisiana for a correct course of action on the occasion. Let punishment commensurate with the crime be promptly visited on the heads of the guilty.—N. O. Picayune.

Union College.—At the late Commencement of Union College, held on the 27th ult., the degree of A. B. was conferred in course upon eighty young gentlemen.

The honorary degree of L. L. D. was conferred upon Charles Lyell, F. R. S. (Eng) George Bancroft, Samuel Jones, A. Bruyn Hasbrouck, and Ralph Barnes Grindrod, of Manchester, (Eng.)

The honorary degree of D. D. was conferred upon the following gentlemen:—Rev Erasmus D. McMasters, President of Hanover College, Indiana, Rev. Charles White, Owego, Rev. Noah Levings, of Albany, Rev. David Moore, of Staten Island, Rev. John Prondfit, of Rutgers College, and Rev. Jared B. Waterbury, of Hudson, New-York.

In the course of the two preceding days orations were delivered before large and highly gratified audiences by Benjamin F. Butler, William Kent and George Bancroft.

A Philadelphia Quaker.—A certain 'Friend' whom we very well know, was recently at a distant place of summer resort. He stepped into a Post Office one morning, and while there, the post master asked him whether he knew any English people staying at the hotel. "Why does thee ask?" said the Quaker. "Because," said the postmaster, "here are half a dozen letters directed to England by the next steamer, and as the postage to Boston is not paid I cannot send them. If I can not find the writers of them, they will be forwarded to the dead letter office in Washington." Our 'friend' looked at the letters. They were all double, and he remarked—"they appear to be family letters, and no doubt will be most welcome if received, or may cause great anxiety if they should not be." "I cannot help it," said the postmaster. "Well, I can, if thee cannot; what is the postage?" "For six double letters three dollars."—"Well here is the money; thee will please mark the letters 'paid,' and send them to Boston." And with this injunction, the Philadelphia Quaker left the Post Office—his pockets not quite so heavy as when he entered, but his heart, we are sure, a great deal lighter.—National Gaz.

Cause of the Milk Sickness.—Dr. Seaton of Jefferson county, has in press, a pamphlet entitled an "Inquiry into the causes of the Milk Sickness." Dr. Seaton has lately taken a tour through the regions of Indiana where it prevails, for the purpose of obtaining for himself the symptoms of the disease and investigating its causes. He attributes it to arsenic, which he finds scattered in great abundance, in the form of arsenical iron pyrites throughout every section where the milk sickness prevails.

An atrocious Murder.—The murder of of the unfortunate girl, Mary Cecelia Rogers, noticed in another part of our paper is of such an atrocious character as to demand that it be taken forth from the ordinary police Reports to be made a matter of especial attention, in order if possible to arouse inquiry as to the murderers. This girl has been seen by most persons who have walked by the Cigar store of Anderson in Broadway, where she was somewhat conspicuous as a vender of Cigars, whence she obtained the sobriquet of "the Cigar girl." This girl was missed by her friends for some days, who advertised for her at last in the public prints, but on Thursday last, her body was found in the water near Hoboken, by some persons passing in a sailboat. The discovery of the body bearing evident marks of violence, aroused inquiry, and the Coroner's Jury, while they bore testimony to her general good character, also came to the conclusion that she was murdered.

Nothing as yet is certainly known of the manner of her death. According to the New Era, she was crossing the river to Hoboken in a small boat with a young man who was paying her honorable attention, and having got half way over, another boat in which were 5 most complete rowdies and soaplocks came along side, and who forced her into the boat and pushed off, up the river, and when an opportunity presented, and they were concealed, as they imagined from observation, violated her person and afterwards, to prevent their infamous and diabolical acts from coming to light, threw the unfortunate victim of their nefarious and unruly passions overboard.

The Courier well remarks, it seems incredible that men could deliberately plan and commit a murder for such a motive, yet the facts inevitably lead to the conclusion, that this is one of those unnatural instances of horrid crime, which sets all reason at defiance. Ten days have now elapsed since its commision; hitherto the tracks of its ferocious perpetrators have not been discovered, and the blood of the hapless female will probably pass unrevenged, unless the public authorities evince more than ordinary activity.—New-York Express.

Latest from Jacksonville—Confession of Town the Bank Robber—The mail arrived from Jacksonville at half past 4, bringing letters to a friend, from which we have derived the following particulars in relation to the late robbery of the Bank.

On Saturday night, the 19th, H. D. Town the Teller of the Bank, made a full developement of the facts connected with the robbery, to Col Mather, and said that the destruction of the books was resolved upon in a moment of desperation, at the loss of character consequent upon the discovery of a long series of depredations upon the funds of the institution. This course commenced soon after he went into the Bank—three years since—and which he had great difficulty in concealing from the former Cashier.

He became more adroit as he proceeded in his frauds, and was able to deceive the present Cashier who had unbounded confiidence in him. Town averred most solemnly, that the whole sum used by him was a little less than $1000, which will be the only deficit. The money taken from the vaults of the Bank was all recoverd by Col Mather on Monday night. It was buried in three places:—A part of it in the Damond Grove; part of it north of the town on the barrens; and the gold in the stable lot. The process of robbery was commenced on Friday night, and ended on Sunday night. In his confession to Col. Mather, he implicated no one else, nor did he at any time afterwards. He assigned as a reason for destroying the Books of the Bank, that had he not done so, they would have established his past frauds; and that if he had been immediately arrested he never would have made any disclosures. During the week subsequent to the robbery he accused nobody, and when any body was named as the suspicious person, he would say that he believed they were guilty.

To show the excitement which prevails, it is stated that some of the citizens who followed Col. Mather, rode 60 miles in five hours—first to overtake him, and then to return and give the news that he was on his way back.

Throughout the whole affair, Town acted with perfect indifference, and even after his arrest he wrote a note to his wife "not to be uneasy—that he was innocent, and that a righteous God would assert it," &c.

He was, up to the time, highly esteemed, and but a short time previous was a candidate, before the Parent Board, and came within one vote of being elected, Cashier of the Bank.—Great sympathy is expressed for his family and friends.

In a letter written, on the 21st, he says: "I have need of friends, though I do not deserve them."—St. Louis Republican of July 24th.

Disastrous effects of the Temperance reform in Ireland.—The following unusual information is taken from a letter written by a gentleman of Dublin to the Leeds Mercury:

"Our public hospitals bear abundant evidence of the improved health of the people. I was informed lately by young surgeon that the want of broken limbs, &c. is severely felt, as subjects of young practitioners; also there is a greatly increased difficulty in getting bodies for dissection. In our largest hospitals there has been one case of delirium tremens, (whiskey fever) for several months past, and that a doubtful one; although formerly it was not uncommon to have twenty or thirty at one time. Deaths from fever have also much decreased.

The editor of the Portland Advertiser, says,—"Our collector presented a bill to a constable in this city, a day or two since for payment, which he declined, offering as an excuse, that the temperance reform had ruined his business."

In Missouri, laws have passed restricting the sale of Yankee Clocks, so as to amount to a prohibition. Jonathan is to conscientious to break over the laws—he steps round them, by leasing his clocks for ninety-nine years.

The Home Squadron Bill, which has passed the House of Representatives, appropriates $789,310 for two frigates, two sloops, two small vessels, and two armed steamers.

The bark Cutter 32 days from Pernambuco, went ashore during the storm on Friday night coming into New York, and it feared will be a total loss. She had 1500 bags of sugar insured in England for about $20,000, which will probably be a total loss. The vessel and freight are insured in New-York.

One of the young ladies in the Lowell factories, a correspondent of the Lowell Offering, who has been for several years employed in the mills, has lately been elected to the station of Preceptress in one of their Publick Schools, and has entered upon her new duties.

A lady, while passing through the market in Phila. on Saturday, had her dress set on fire by a boy with some matches, which was not subdued until it was nearly burnt off and she very seriously injured by the flames. In her alarm she ran into a jewelry store, where Mr. Monier rendered her much assistance, and subjected himself to some pain by getting his hands burned. Her burns were not considered dangerous.

What will not a Mother do to save her child.—We learn that on Friday last, as a child of Mrs McGee, of Westminister, aged five years, was at play about the well, it climbed upon the curb, and was precipitated head foremost into the well, which was about 20 feet deep. Mrs. McGee, missing the child, and hearing the cries from the well, although in very poor health & having a child only five weeks old, descended and secured the unfortunate sufferer, who was clinging to the stone in the wall and crying for help. Such daring and bold acheivments, although of rare occurrence, show what a mother will do to save a suffering child.—Bellows Falls (Vt.) Gazette.

Effect of the Temperance Cause on a Cargo.—The Halifax (N. S.) Herald contains the following paragraph; The Spanish brig Beatriz arrived at this port lately from Porto Rico, with a large cargo consisting of 124 hhds. Molasses, 152 bbls. Sugar, and six pipes of old Rum. The Sugar and Molasses sold, and sold well; the Rum, however could not command a price. It was at length offered at one shilling per gallon, in bond, which it could not obtain. An offer of it was then made for the payment of the duty on it, at which it was refused in the Halifax market, and yesterday the Beatriz sailed from this port, taking back to the West-Indies the six pipes of Rum which she had brought into this temperance place.

A man in Baltimore thought that he would sleep on the roof of a shed during one of the late very warm nights. Before morning he rolled from the eaves to the pavement, a distance of thirty feet, and injured himself so badly that his life is despaired of.

The Boston Journal speaks of the interesting religious services by Mr. Taylor, on the Cunard steamboat wharf, on Tuesday evening, in which the officers and crew of the Caledonia participated. Capt. M'Keller is said to be a religious man with a kindred crew, and the vessel is said to be the best in point of discipline of any of the steamers. When in port he generally marches his crew to Church, in person; and at sea, avoids all unnecessary work, taking especial pride in rendering those under his command comfortable.

President Lamer arrived at Galveston, Texas, on the 18th ult. to despatch, as was said, Com. Moore with two armed vessels to the coast of Mexico, to co-operate with the Yucatanese and Federalist against Vera Cruz, in consequence of the indignity lately offered to Judge Webb, as Minister.

The Troy Budget says, we learn that Mr. George Reynolds, a farmer, residing in the town of Berlin, in this county, expired suddenly while laboring in a field, yesterday morning. His death was probably occasioned by the state of the weather or imprudence in diet.

Sudden Death.—We are pained to announce the sudden and untimely death of Dr. CHARLES H. MITCHEL, who died on Saturday morning last, from as it is supposed, the rupture of a blood vessel. For a week or two previous to his death, he had not enjoyed his usual health, but partially recovering, on Friday, he, in company with several of his friends, went on a fishing expedition, and was in the water until night. On the following morning, he arose and dressed himself, and attended to the business about the premises as was his habit. At about 8 o'clock, he went into his house and proceeded to his bed, when he was instantly seized with a cramp which rendered him senseless. He breathed about ten minutes and expired, with scarce a groan.

The loss of this young man is much deplored.—His reputation as a physician and surgeon was highly flattering for one of his years—particularly as a surgeon were his services held in the best repute. He has performed with skill and success, some difficult operations; but at the age of 29, he has been stricken down by the relentless hand of death. He has left a wife and two young children to mourn their loss.—Chenango Telegraph.

Not to be Beat.—A getleman left Cleveland city Ohio says the Herald, on Wednesday evening, July 7th, at 5 o'clock, in steam boat Cleveland, and at half past 11 o'clock on Saturday the 10th, found himself quietly walking up Temple street, New Haven,—a distance of nearly 800 miles—which was passed over in the incredible short space of about 66 hours including about 4 hour stops. Time as follows:

Cleveland to Buffalo,	15 1-2	hours
Buffalo to Rochester,	9	"
Rochester to Syracuse;	10	"
Syracuse to Albany,	12	"
Albany to New York	11	"
New York to New Haven,	5	"

Death in a Mother's Arms.—On Friday last, a poor, miserable, wretched beggar woman was observed sitting on the curbstone in Baltimore street. She was sick, and had in her arms a sick infant, about eight months old, which was without scarcely a garment to shelter it from the scorching sunbeams. In this situation the mother was observed for sometime watching intently the little innocent, as it pillowed its head upon her care worn breast. Time passed on, and there sat the wretched mother, her eyes were swiming in tears, fixed upon the dying pledge of her affection, until its moment of dissolution came,—the parting struggle was soon over, when it fell back in the serenity of death upon the tattered bosom of its beggared mother. Never were the feelings of parental love more strongly exhibited than in this poor woman. She was an evidence that though poverty might sever the world's freindship and sympathy, yet it could not cut the golden links of natural affection. We learn that the child was burial, and the unfortunate woman conveyed to the Alms House.—Balt. Clipper.

Diarœa.—People need not long be troubled with that disorder, so generally prevalent at this season commonly known as the summer or bowel complaint, when the very simple and unusually certain remedy therefore may be found on every man's dinner table, in the shape of Salt and Vinegar. Two spoonsful of the former, dissolved in a half gill of the latter, and swallowed at a drought, will in most cases effect an instant cure. The second dose, if needed, will assuredly accomplish it. We are ready to give our certificates to Dr Pickle in the premises, for we witnessed the proof. Quod erat demonstrandum, which is as much as to say, in Dutch, "it hasch been tride." This recipe should be published annually, every summer.—Nantucket Enquirer.

Hot Weather.—Friday last was the warmest—no, Hottest day we have had for several summers. Some thermometers rose to 102 deg, though 93 was warm. In the afternoon and evening of that day we had gentle showers, since which the temperature has been fine.—Poughkeepsie Telegraph.

The weather during the week has been highly favorable for the crops and for hay making in which our farmers have been engaged. The crop of hay in this vicinity will be very fair, and will be finely cured. The number of grasshoppers in the interior have been doing some damage to hay and grain, and in some cases to the potatoes.—Bangor Whig.

Melancholy Death by Drowning.—We were pained to learn that on Thursday night last the steam boat Telegraph was lying at the wharf at French Creek, a man by the name of Goodman, who was taking some swine to Kingston market was thrown from the boat, by one of the animals running against him, & notwithstanding there appears to have been almost every facility for recovering him at hand he sunk and was drowned. Great excitement prevailed at the moment among those who witnessed the accident, which is the reason assigned for his not being rescued. A son of Mr. Goodman, a lad of about 14 years old, was present & witnessed the melancholy scene. The body had not been found when our informant left. The deceased was about 40 years of age, and has left a family to deplore their loss.—Suckets Harbor Journal.

Melancholy Stage Accident.—On Thursday evening, July 15th, as the stage was passing through Bristol, N. H. about eleven o'clock it was suddenly upset, to the injury of several passengers and the death of one.

The road was very narrow in that place, and a steep offset below, so that the stage was literally turned bottom upwards. There was no guard rail; and the horses being a little startled by a noise in the bushes on their other side, bore off, so the hind wheel sunk in a sandy brink so much as to cause its overthrow. There were sixteen passengers, four of whom however were children, with much heavy baggage on board. The outside passengers were thrown about thirty feet, and some seriously injured. To those whose who were inside the compression was fearful. By the assistance of the people from the neighboring village they were soon rescued from their perilous condition without very serious injury except one case. The little girl, four years old daughter of Mr. Pierce, of the Hamilton Printworks in this city, was found lifeless in the stage. No external injury could be discovered and her death was supposed to be caused by compression. Mrs. Pierce, with this and a younger child, was on her way to Pymouth, to spend a few weeks, in the country, under her maternal roof. But that place always dear while a mother lives became a house of mourning, and the visit, so pleasant in anticipation, was only to take the last look of a lovely daughter. The afflicted attach no blame to the driver, or any concerned; and they speak in the highest terms of the kindness of physicians, and the people of the neighborhood.—Lowell Courier.

Singular Affair.—Two or three weeks ago, Capt. Henry, of the Athenian, reported that an engagement had occured between two vessels, to the westward of Barataria Bay. It was stated that they exchanged about sixty shots and then seperated and bore away from each other. A statement in the Franklin Republican of the 8th inst. evidently made in good faith may afford some explanation of the mystery. The editor was informed by the commander of the U. S. Revenue cutter, Louis McLane, which has just returned from a three months off our coast, that on the 21st, a slaver boat went to the Vermillion Bay light house for water, with eight men on board, all armed with cutlasses and pistols; about 24 hours after [illegible] rd the boat of an English man of war, [illegible] s sent for the same purpose; the commander stated to the light house keeper that they were in chase of a slaver, with about 500 negroes on board, and desired to be reported; they made immediate chase for the slaver. The Captain of the cutter farther stated that about two days after this several planters of Lower Vermillion were out hunting, who heard considerable cannonading in the direction of the Muntow.

This statement and the one brought by the Athenian undoubtedly refer to the same affair; but it is not strange that no accurate information has been received in this quarter?—N. O. Picayune.

Bunker Hill Monument.—This magnificent structure has now reached the height of one hundred & twenty feet, & is still to be raised one hundred feet higher. The work has been going on for about ten weeks, and fifteen courses of stone have been laid in that time, being at the rate of three courses in two weeks. The last two, we believe have been laid in one week. The curious begin to inquire how the top stone is to be raised and put on? And the prudent ask whether it is to be furnished with lightning rods.—Bunker Hill Aurora.

POETRY.

From the New-York Signal.

The following is the thrilling and affective song which was given with such splendid effect by Mr. Russel, at his concert. It is the production of Dr. Coates.

THE GAMBLER'S WIFE.

Dark is the night! How dark! No light! No fire!
Cold on the hearth the last faint sparks expire.
Shivering, she watches by the cradle side
For him who pledged her love—last year a bride.

"Hark! 'Tis his footstep! No! 'Tis past, 'tis gone."
Tick—tick! "How wearily the time crawls on,
Why should he leave me thus! He once was kind,
And I belived 'twould last. How mad! How blind!

"Rest thee, my babe—rest on. 'Tis hungers cry!
Sleep—for there is no food! The fount is dry;
Famine and cold their wearing work have done,
My heart must break!—And thou!"—The clock strikes one!

"Hush! 'tis the dice box! Yes he's there; he's there!
For this, for this he leaves me to despair!
Leaves love, leaves truth—his wife!—his love! for what?
The wanton's smile, the villain, and the sot!

Yet I'll not curse him. No, 'tis not all in vain;
'Tis long to wait, but sure he'll come again!
And I could starve and bless him but for you,
My child—his child! Oh fiend! The clock strikes two.

"Hark! how the sign-board creaks—the wind howls by;
Moan! Moan! A dirge swells thro' the cloudy sky!
Ha! 'tis his knock!—he comes!—he comes once more!"
'Tis but the lattice flaps! Thy hope is o'er!

Can he desert us thus! He knows I stay
Night after night in loneliness to pray
For his return—and yet he sees no tear!
No, no. It cannot be. He will be here!

Nestle more closely, dear one, to my heart!
Thou'rt cold! thou'rt freezing; but we will not part.
Husband—I die—Father, it is not he!
Oh, God, protect my child.' The clock strikes three.

In addition to the above, the following concluding stanza, from the pen of another gentleman, himself the author of some fine songs, was sung by Mr. Russel.

They're gone! they're gone! the glimmering spark hath fled!
The wife and child are numbered with the dead,
On the cold hearth, out-stretched in solemn rest,
The babe lay frozen on its mother's breast;
The gambler came at last—but all was o'er—
Dread silence reigned around—The clock struck four!

PERSECUTION OF THE JEWS OF DAMASCUS.

BY EDWIN CROSWELL.

The events of the past year include one of those extraordinary exhibitions of cruelty and persecution, which arise at intervals in the history of nations, and darken the age which they occur.

The Khan Astad Bastad, in the western quarter of the city of Damascus, is a much-frequented resort. There, at all hours, may be seen representatives of the motly population of this ancient, and, in many respects, interesting Syrian capital.* From thence go out, thrice a year, with an armed escort of 2500 men, the great caravans to Bagdad; and there, also, those to Aleppo sometimes gather their hosts of camels, muleteers and Arab guards.

It was a mid-day in February, 1840, that Father Tomaso and his serving-man, Kaladad, the latter of Athletic frame, were seen in the most public part of the Kahan; the revered father in most earnest conversation with a leader of the muleteers, a sheikh, Iba Trieb by name.

"Thou liest, creature of the false prophet!" exclaimed father Tomaso, "and I curse thee and thy impious faith to the throat!" and the stalwart serving-man, practically following out the imprecation, seized the muleteer by the throat, and held him till the blood started from his nostrils.

"Beard of Mehomet," exclaimed Abuyckyck el Khaphar, a respectable Mehomedan merchant, who, with others of his creed, witnessed the scene, "the insolence of this dog of a Christian priest, passeth all endurance, and shall be dealt with accordingly."

"Nay," said the muleteer, wiping the blood from his swellen lips and face, "he shall not die by my hands!"

Father Tomaso was the prior of the Spanish convent at Damascus, and had resided forty years in the city, exercising the double functions of priest and physician.—In the latter capacity, he visited the Catholic, Armenian and Jewish families, and was cordially received in all. The scene above described; occurred on the 5th of February. From that day to the present moment, there have been no tidings of father Tomaso and his servant. But alas, their murderer, if such it was, by whomsoever committed, was the signal for inconceivable cruelty and torture—for atrocity such as in the history of fanaticism or extortion have never been surpassed.

The next day it was rumored abroad that the priest and the man were not to be found. Soon the cry was started that they had been murdered by the Jews. A party of Turks and Greeks came into the Jewish quarter, affirming that they had seen both there the preceding evening. They seized a poor Jew, a barber, and dragging him before the Pacha, accused him of the murder. Five hundred blows upon his heels, and the most cruel tortures, could extort nothing from him; until at last, the Greeks advised him to denounce certain rich Jews, as the perpetrators of the crime; and in the extremity of his suffering, he named seven of the most opulent Jews in Damascus. David Harary and his three brothers, Joack, Haron and Joseph, Joseph Sandiado, Mussa Abulafia and Deka Luda. The barber stated that they had sent for him, and offered him 300 piastres, if he would sacrifice the priest, as they required the blood of a Christian victim, to mix up with their bread for passover.

Improbable as this tale was, and extorted as it obviously was, through torture, the Pacha instantly ordered the seven Jews to be brought before him, and to be bastinadoed. They protested that they were innocent, declaring that it was both unnatural and impossible that the Jews, who were strictly prohibited feeding on the blood of animals, should indulge in a practice so repugnant to nature as the use of human blood, and the indulgence in which could not fail to bring upon them the severest inflictions of the laws. The Pacha would hear nothing in the shape of exculpation; but ordered them to be loaded with chains, and inflicted upon them barbarous sufferings, forcing them to remain standing forty hours, without food or drink, and without a moment's sleep, exhausted as nature was. He sent, also, for the three rabbins, Jacob Antevi, Aaron Arasi, and Azararia Halfaen, torturing them until their flesh flew off in large bits, in the vain attempt to extort from them the confession that they had employed human blood in the composition of their holy bread. They denied the imputation; and said that if such were the custom of the Jews, no art or device could have concealed the fact from the knowledge of the world.

It happened that when the report circulated of the disappearance of the priest and his servant, the Mahomedan merchant, whose wrath was excited by his attack upon the muleteers, disappeared also. At first, the suspicion of the murder of the merchant was also thrown upon the Jews; but the attention of the public being arrested by the shop of the merchant being and remaining closed, the door was forced open, and the man found dead, hanging in his shop, the door being carefully secured from within. The Jews at that time expected that an investigation would take place, and that it might then appear that the merchant, in consequence of their dispute, was the murderer, either by himself, or together within the ill-used and enraged muleteers, or others; and that he destroyed himself to avoid torture and disgrace. But no investigation took place, nor was the muleteer ever even subjected to an examination.

Bones having been found in a sewer, in the Jewish quarter, were at once declared to be the remains of human victims, put to death for their blood. Vain were the denials and protestations of the accused; until a commission of medical men and surgeons, charged by the local authorities with the examination, declared that the bones were those of animals, and had been long deposited there.

There are ten Jewish synagogues in the city of Damascus, and they maintain schools and a higher institution of learning. The Pacha, having exhausted the torture upon the fathers and the rabbins, proceeded to the college, had the children thrown into prison and chained; prohibited their being seen by their mothers, and allowed them but an ounce of bread and a glass of water a day, each; hoping that material solicitude and anguish might lead to some disclosure or confession.

A generous-hearted Jew, in the warmth of indignant feeling, ventured to assure the Pacha that the calumny of human blood had been discarded by all the powers of Europe, as alike unnatural and groundless; and that to inflict such cruelties through an accusation wrenched from an individual by insupportable torture, was not the dictate of mercy or justice. This Jew was beaten, by order of the Pacha, until he expired.

A young Jew, of opulent parents, ventured to affirm that he saw the priest enter a Turkish house, on the evening of his disappearance, and he died of the bastinado, under the hand of his merciless executioner.

An astrologer declared he had discovered that the servant had been killed by Raphael Farki, Nathan Levi, Aaron Levi, Mordecai Farki and Aarrkes di Listone. The two first were arrested immedately: the others effected their escape.

The banker Farki, unable to endure the tortures to which he was subjected, embraced Islamism.

During these proceedings, the demoniac spirit which seemed to impel the civil authority of the pachalic, pervaded all classes. The Gentile, whether Greek or Catholic or Mahomedan, united in the general denunciation of the unhappy Israelite. Youth, nor hoary age, nor sex, was spared. Fresh rumors were continually thrown out to inflame the public mind; so that the popular ferment might come in aid of the rapacity of the government. Not a voice was raised in behalf of the miserable objects of this persecution. Bands of infuriated men patrolled the city, in search of rumor; and every trifle was tortured into ground of accusation, or proof of guilt. The Jews, shrinking from the tender mercies of this fell spirit, were only seen as they were dragged forth from the recesses of their dwellings, by the myrmidons of authority, or the instigators of outrage.

Hitherto the torture, however diabolical, had wrung the false admission from only the poor barber. The Pacha now proceeded in person with six hundred men, to the Jewish quarter, and ordered the houses of the accused to be demolished, under the pretence of expecting to discover the dead bodies. Having made no discovery, he proceeded to farther atrocities. He caused the prisoners to be dragged by their sexual organs to a sewer, near the palace, and thrown into it. From thence were drawn out, to be tortured afresh. Unable to endure the torment, they at last confessed to a participation in the murder, and the use of blood. Thus nearly a month of inconceivable horror, (for this was the end of February,) added to these barbarities the self-condemnation of the innocent. How it proceeded, from the relation of David Solomons, will show:—

"Sunday, March 1st.—The two brothers, David and Tetskhack Arari, were again brought up for further trial, when they again deny their last day's confession of guilt, which they say, was extorted from them by torture, and made in the hope of a speedy execution, instead of an excrutiating and lingering death. The remaining five were now all brought up; and let humanity shudder, and turn her eyes from the refined bloodshed that was now executed—a bloodshed, however, not by quickly despatching, but by demoniacly extracting the life of innocent men by torments not inflicted on the most guilty, and more than a brute beast could bear. Tetskhack and David Arari are again reduced to make their former confessions. Msssa Abulafia, is now tortured to give up the blood; he then said, 'I have secreted it at home, in my house.' The French consul always alive to cruelty, then accompanied Mussa Abulafia, to his house, followed, as usual, by large crowds, and Mussa Abulafia, having now undertaken to give up what he never possessed, unlocked the cupboard, and feigned to examine it.—He then asked his wife, who was in despair all this while to see her husband so lacerated, and apparently quite beside herself, 'What have you done with the blood?' The poor woman, as in a fit of frenzy, exclaimed, 'what blood had you?' He answered, 'I have blood, only give me a knife, and you can take my life's blood, and then say this is it.' It is stated that when the French consul heard this, he, like a madman, attacked both Abulafia and his wife. He then laid a rope round his neck, threatening to strangle him; and in the attempt to pull the rope, he laid his victim prostrate at his feet; and not satisfied with this, it is related that he dragged him about in the Court-yard with the rope aronnd his neck. The French consul then ordered both M. Abulafia and his wife to be conducted to the court of the Pacha."

Such were the scenes, with variations, which, partially arrested in March, broke out afresh in April, and were not finally put an end to until the remonstrances of other governments induced the Pacha of Egypt, the then nominal head of the pachalic of Damascus, to interpose for the protection of the Jews.

The facts on which this statement is founded, are derived from the publications and correspondence, at the time, and from a volume published in London, soon afterwards, by Mr. Solomons,* to whom allusion has already been made. Mr. S. is a resident of London, an educated and intelligent Israelite, of high character and standing. Moved by the sufferings of his brethren, he proceeded to Damascas, for the purpose of investigation and vindication, in relation to the charges urged against them. The first duty was discharged in person, and with intrepidity, on the spot; and the other ably performed in the work referred to. The utmost ingenuity of prejudice or cupidity, could discover nothing to furnish the least color to the accusations, absurd and improbable, on which the persecutions were founded. "Before I quit the affairs of Padre Tomaso, (says Mr. Solomons,) I would notice that, on my arrival at Damascus, March 30th, and having some knowledge on the subject, I challenged any one to produce a single well-founded suspicion against the Jews, to show a reason why they were arrested; which they could not. At the same time I strongly protested against the calumny that the Jews use human blood, and was able to refute certain false allegations, which had been circulated; such as, that Jews dip a handkerchief in Christian blood, dry it, and burn it to ashes; and the day after a Jewess is married, these ashes are strewn on a hard boiled egg, which is eaten by the young couple. This invention, I am grieved to say, gave rise to new tortures, and new investigations concerning the murder of the monk, which for the last month had been considered as settled."

The London Monthly review pursues the subject of the probabilities, in the absence of all proof, of the criminality of the Jews, and reasons very conclusively against it:—

"The Jews of the present day are much too calculating a race to commit so dreadful a crime as that of the murder of Father Tomaso, for they are as much attached to their individual safety, as they are to the gains of commerce. The Jew is not vindictive, for the sake of mere vengeance; his vengeance is never the result of a pecuniary consideration, and is never practiced to gratify the mere passion of revenge, or the love of retaliation. We should say, that of all men, the Jews are the least calculated to commit murder, and that an unnecessary murder (which this, if there be one at all, of Father Tomaso evidently is,) is totally incompatible with the prudence, the calculating habits, and the disposition of the Jews. But to think that several thousands of Jews could all know that a Christian was to be murdered upon a particular day—that the assassination was to take place at the house of a rich Jewish merchant—that any one of the fraternity was enabled to proceed thither and witness the deed if he chose—that a barber was coolly sent for and offered a price to murder the victim—that the blood was caught in a silver vessel, and conveyed quietly through streets to a neighbor's house—to attach credence to all this, is to manifest a greater degree of credulity than even characterizes the Jews themselves; and their credulity, if we may believe the Roman satirist, was proverbial; Credat Judæus Appella, non ego. To imagine that if two or three, or even seven Jews, had determined upon the commission of this crime, that they would permit its intended consummation to be absolutely bruited abroad, is ridiculous in the extreme. The confession was wrested from the mouths of the miserable men by the following means:

1st. Flogging.

2d. Soaking persons in large tubs of cold water, in their clothes.

3d. The head machine, by which the eyes are pressed out of their sockets.

4th. Tying up the tender parts, and ordering soldiers to twist and horribly dispose them into such contortions, that the poor sufferers grew almost mad from pain.

5th. Standing upright for three days, without being allowed any other posture, not even to lean against the walls; and when they would fall down, were aroused up by the by-standing sentinels with their bayonets.

6th. Being dragged about in a large court, by their ears, until the blood gushed out.

7th. Having thorns driven in between their nails and the flesh of their fingers and toes.

8th. Having fire set to their beards, till their faces are singed.

9th. Having candles held under their noses, so that the flame rises up into their nostrils. This last brutality was one night carried on with such pitiless perseverence, that the wax dropped on the poor sufferer's breasts. It was in the night, and the Pacha being present, could no longer endure the sight. He then went away, but put no stop to it."

The interposition of our own government to arrest these persecutions, was in accordance with the genius of our institutions and the spirit of the age. It was warmly seconded, at the time, by the sentiment of the country, and will be recollected with gratification. Mr. Forsyth, the American Secretary of State, addressed our charge d'affaires at Constantinople, and our consul at Alexandria, expressing his anxiety that the active sympathy and generous interposition of the government of the United States, should not be withheld from so benevolent an object, and instructing them to employ all their good offices and efforts to this end. "In common with all civilized nations, (said Mr. F.) the people of the U. States have learned with horror the atrocious crimes attributed to the Jews of Damascus, and the cruelties of which they have been the victims. The President fully participates in the public feeling, and he cannot refrain from expressing equal surprise and pain, that in this advanced age, such unnatural practices should be ascribed to any portion of the religious world, and such barbarous measures resorted to in order to compel the confession of imputed guilt. The offences with which these unfortunate people are charged, resemble too much those which, in less enlightened times, were made the pretexts of fanatical persecution, or mercenary extortion, to permit a doubt that they are equally unfounded."

It is now three hundred and forty-nine years since the expulsion of the Jews from Spain. Barbarous as the edict was, which despoiled an entire people, and sent them forth, age, infancy and manhood, with undistinguished barbarity, unsparing alike to sex or condition, wanderers they knew not whither, it was less repulsive than the wantonness and cruelty of infliction that has stained the times in which we live. The revival of learning, of which the world had already passed the dawn, and the spread of Christianity, were not yet felt in their enlightening and liberal influences. It was comparatively a dark age. Nearly all over the world superstition and fanaticism seemed to have gathered as a pall. In Spain, the inquisition was at the zenith of its power; and its engines were no less omnipotent than cruel. Thoms Torquemada, not inaptly denominated the first-born of hell, was the Inquisitor General. Persecution and expatriation, were the natural fruits of such combinations. But that a similar spirit should exhibit itself in the most revolting persecutions, and in barbarities worthy of the inquisition, in this advanced age, has excited the wonder and moved the indignation of the civilized world

We must look back, indeed, to a still darker and ruder period for its counterpart. Five centuries ago,* if the Jews were not accused of the use of human blood, as an ingredient in their sacrifices, they fell under a charge not less improbable in itself, nor, unfortunately, less dire in its consequences. The swarms of lepers that sprang up, as it were, the off-spring of the crusaders, were accused, in France, of having poisoned the springs and wells; and they, in turn, accused the Jews of instigating and urging them to the commission of crime, as the means of destroying the Christians.—The convictions were nearly all from confessions extorted by torture. Philip of France issued an edict, condemning to the flames all who had shared in the conspiracy. It carried death and desolation into the habitations of the Jews. Many of both sexes were burned—one hundred and sixty in one day, in a single large pit, digged for the sacrifice; and forty died in prison, in a single night, by their own hand or that of their selected executioner, from among themselves—but all, however tortured into previous confessions, renounced them in death, as extorted calumnies. Let it not excite surprise that the bigotry or cupidity of the nineteenth century has chosen for its model the sanguinary bigotry and proscription of the fourteenth; for it characteristic of man, that in all ages, these qualities assume the same features.

The present year has wrought great and favorable changes in the condition of the Jews of Damascus. The restoration of the holy cities to the government of the Sultan, the expulsion of Ibrahim Pacha, and the cessation of war between Mehemet Ali and the Sublime Porte, or rather the allied powers, for the possession of Syria, have arrested the progress of the persecution, and restored the unhappy subjects of it to more than their usual exemption from outrage. The Sultan Abdul Mejid has issued his hatti sheriff, proclaiming a general and ample recognition of their political rights and privileges. While a degree of liberality has prevailed among the agas and other educated portions of this great capital, there is no population in the world where the prejudice against the Jew and the Christian, is more inveterate than among the mass of its Mahomedan residents. Their fanaticism is of the most excitable kind, and their hatred of the European, whether Israelite or Christian, always excessive, and easily inflamed to atrocity. Now, however, perhaps by the force of the reaction, a sense of wrong, possibly of regret, having taken the place of the late barbarities, there is already less than the ordinary restraint among the Jews and other dissenting sects. It is said even that the appearance of poverty and destitution, which it has been the policy of the inhabitants of the Armenian, Jew and Christian quarters to assume, as the mask under which they preserve their wealth and protect their persons, as giving place to a freer and bolder enjoyment of the immunities of citizens.† A recent occurrence exhibits, in a striking and agreeable manner, the extent of this change. Gen. Jochmus, commander of the allied military forces in Syria, entered Damascus after its evacuation by Ibrahim Pacha. While there, Captain Churchill, of the British army, arrived from Constantinople, bearing the hatti sheriff from the Sulton to the Jew. He was received by men with enthusiastic joy, and with every manifestation of respect. An entertainment was given him at the house of Signor Farki, the chief banker of Damascus, whose acceptance of Islamism, under torture, has been already stated, but whose renunciation of it, when no longer in personal peril, it is due to him to mention. It was attended by all the British and Austrian officers of Gen. Jochmus' staff, and by the chief Jewish residents.—The guests were received by Signor F. and a deputation of the principal Jewish merchants, at what may be said to be the palace of the former, a princely residence, realizing in the description, the fabulous marvels of the power and splendor of the Jews of Bagdad, and of the magnificence of the Prince of the Captivity, said to be the supreme head of the Jews of the East.—The banquet was truly gorgeous, prefaced a l' Europeen, with covers for eighty persons, and in the most costly manner that oriental opulence and taste could suggest: and the evening scene in these vast and noble apartments, the effulgence of the lights, the music, the orange trees, the fountains, and finally the female members of the Jewish community, lovely and captivating, gave it an air of romance, rather than reality, in a city so recently the theatre of trial and suffering. At the close of the evening, Col. Churchill addressed the assembled guests, through an interpreter, congratulating them upon the success of the application to the Sultan, to procure for the Jews of the Levant and Syria a full recognition of their political rights and privileges, and claiming for his own government, not only an active and generous sympathy in their behalf, but efficient friendship, during all their calamities, and a powerful auxiliary in their deliverance. "Yes, my friends," exclaimed Col. C., "there was once a Jewish people! famous in acts and renowned in war. The beautiful plains and valleys, which are now tenanted by the wild and wandering Arab, in which desolation has fixed her iron stamp, once revelled in the luxuriance of their fertile and abundant crops, and resounded with the songs of the 'daughters of Zion.' May the hour of Israel's deliverance be near at hand! May the approximation of Western civilization to this interesting land be the germ of her regeneration and of her political existence; may the Jewish nation once more claim her rank and station among the powers of the world! The descendants of the Maccabees may yet prove themselves worthy of their illustrious ancestors!" The speaker was interrupted by cries of "Inchallah! Inchallah! May God grant it! May God grant it! To England alone we look! To England alone we look!"

Doubtless the whole proceeding, as far as it was English, was not less a matter of policy than of humanity; it was, nevertheless, a scene of absorbing interest, and created a great sensation in Damascus It took place on the 1st of last March, one year after the depth and greatest severity of the persecutions: and several of the victims of those atrocities, who were yet suffering from their effects, were present.

*The capital of the pachalic of this name. "The city, surrounded by its ramparts of black and yellow marble, flanked by its innumerable square towers, crowned by sculptured cranies, commanded by its forests and minerets of every form, and intersected by the seven branches of its river and its numberless streams, extended as far as the eye could reach. It was a labyrinth of gardens and flowers, thrusting its suburbs here and there in the vast plain, encircled by its forest of ten leagues in circumference, and every where shaded by groves of sycamores, and trees of every form and hue. The walls of the suburbs, which are surrounded by charming kiosks and country-houses, in various styles of oriental architecture, glitter round Damascus like a circlet of gold. Her square towers, which flank them and which surmount their line, are encrusted with arabesque, pierced in ogives, white columns as slender as reeds, and edged with stone or slabs of yellow and black marble, arranged in elegant symmetry. The tops of the cypresses and other large trees, in the gardens in the interior of the city, rise above the walls and towers, and crown them with sombre verdure." "The city is entirely surrounded by orchards, or rather by forests of fruit trees, with which the vines are entwined, as at Naples, and hanging in festoons among fig, apricot, pear and cherry trees. Under these trees, the earth, which is rich, fertile and always well watered, is carpeted with barley, corn, maize and all the leguminous plants which the soil produces. Numerous shady paths, refreshed by fountains, intersect these gardens, leading from one suburb to another, or to the different gates of the city. The gardens form a boundary of twenty leagues in circumference round Damascus."

"Arabian traditions represent this city and its neighborhood to form the site of the lost Paradise; and certainly I should think that no place upon earth was better calculated to answer one's idea of Eden. The vast and fruitful plain, with the seven branches of the blue stream which irrigates it; the majestic frame-work of the mountains; the glittering lakes which reflect the heaven upon the earth; its geographical situation between the two seas; the perfection of the climate; every thing, indicates that Damascus has at least been one of the first towns that were ever built by the children of men—one of the natural halts of fugitive humanity in primeval times. It is, in fact, one of those sites pointed out by the hand of God for a city—a site predestined to sustain a capital like Constantinople. These are perhaps the only two cities which could not possibly have taken their post in an empire from arbitrary selection, but which were palpably indicated by the configuration of the places. So long as the earth shall bear empires upon her surface, Damascus will continue to be a great city, and Stamboul the metropolis of the world. On emerging from the desert and entering on the plains of Coelo-Syria, and the valleys of Galilee, the caravans of India need repose—and they find a spot of enchantment at Damascus. Commerce is there upheld by industry. Damascus is, like Lyons, one vast manufactory. Its population, according to some, reaches 400,000 souls; according to others, only 200,000. I cannot decide, and indeed it is impossible to do so; one can only conjecture. In the East, there is no exact census taken, and the traveler can only judge by the eye by the extent of the crowd which inundates the street and bazaars; by the number of armed men who issue from the houses on the least signal of revolution or tumult; and the extent of ground which the houses cover. I should myself be inclined to believe, that those who are inclosed within the city walls might number between 3 and 400,000 souls. But if we do not limit the town thus arbitrarily—if we include the aggregate of its population those who inhabit the immense faubourgs and villages, which are confounded to the eye with the houses and gardens of this enormous assemblage of human beings, I should think that the territory of Damascus might nourish a million."—[De Lamartine.

MONTHLY SERMONS,

BY

A VILLAGE PASTOR.

(AUGUST, 1841.)

NO. VIII.—THE LAME LEG.

Prov. xxvi. 7.—The legs of the lame are not equal; so is a parable in the mouth of fools.

The sentiment of the text is, the man is inconsistent with his profession: his religion limps. We find it illustrative of this truth,—

I. When we see a man notably zealous to tithe mint, annis, and cummin, but palpably negligent of the weightier matters.

II. When we hear him claim to be full of love and good will to all mankind, but find him at variance with all his relatives and neighbors.

III. When we hear him proclaim in the corners of the streets, that his heart glows with pity for the poor enslaved man and woman of the South, but see him screw the sixpence out of the needy hand of his own hired laborer.

IV. When we hear him attest his utter abhorrence of all sectarianism, but find him sustaining the most Ishmaelitish sect the world ever saw.

V. When we notice that he makes splendid donations on splendid occasions, and then by way of reprisal replenishes his own purse by seizing an opportunity to filch out shillings from the scanty earnings of the poor.

VII. When he will go to a great distance to attend great religious meetings, but will habitually neglect the conference and prayer meetings of those with whom he is in covenant.

VIII. When he claims to have arrived at sinless perfection, but so conducts himself, that we dare not hope that he knows any thing about genuine piety of heart.

When, my hearers, we find any individuals exhibiting such traits of character, we cannot fail to be reminded of what Solomon says—"The legs of the lame are not equal; so is a parable in the mouth of fools."

What's in a Name!

BY T. E. BABCOCK.

Human greatness is, in its true sense, an object of admiration; but it must be distinguished by its own peculiar characteristics, rather than by names or titles. Not, however, because there are no terms for that purpose, for there are those framed for its express representatives; but because there are many names which usage has as closely connected with greatness, as abstract terms can be with moral principles, which represent things as remote from greatness as darkness is from light.

What, then, is in a name? Names are but the representatives of things, and they originate in the promptings of necessity for the distinction of objects; and, since they are perfectly arbitrary, one, whether primary, or appended, possesses no superiority over another. Names have an influence, but it is justly dependent upon the character and actions of those who bear them. Why sparkles the eye, and beats more rapidly the pulse of the war-worn veteran of '76, at the mention of Gen. Washington? Is it because he bore the appellation of General? No: but because he remembers with admiration the glorious deliverance which he wrought for his Country. Why scowls with indignation the revolutionary patriot at the mention of Gen. Arnold? Not because he bore the title of General, but because he remembers with abhorrence his fortune-daring treachery. Thus the same official title, in connection with one character, radiates immortal honor; and in connection with another, perpetual infamy.

The idea is astonishing; yet, if we judge from the actions of men, we must conclude that many look upon occupations, professions and titles, as possessing inherent glory; and to obtain them, as such, like the slave scourged to his labor, they put forth their utmost exertions: supposing, that in the attainment of them, all their expectations of human greatness will be answered. So fanciful, indeed, is their distempered imagination, that they flatter themselves that, having obtained them, they shall be able to convert them into golden plumaged wings, upon which they may sail triumphantly above every species of care and want, far away to the verdant hills of luxury and ease, and their gaudy flight be rendered doubly exultant by the eager gaze of those below them.

Thus, time and substance are squandered for the accomplishment of purposes so ignoble, as, in many instances, to render Fortune indignant; for here many have fallen. Staking their hope exclusively upon a name, like that of the hypocrite, it fails! While one, convinced of his failure, sneaks away into retirement, bearing the scorpion sting of shame, another blusters on, till he meets a fate still less to be desired. Alas! what enterprize so fraught with danger as that of seeking to be great! Let the fate of a Haman—a Herod—a Julius Cæsar—a Napoleon Bonaparte answer. If they could speak, they would doubtless say,—"To seek for greatness is but to take a shorter road to shame."

But it is still more astonishing and detestable to see a heedless and unsuspecting community passively sit and permit the flood-gates of misery to be hoisted by these unskilful hands, under the impression that greatness consists in a name. This passive enduring of professional hoaxes, is a tide upon which such filthy rubbish has been borne over our country; but, if the people, discarding such pretenders, would rise up and proportion their confidence in men to their moral worth, without regard to their names, or titles, the inundation would subside, and this titular rubbish would be left, like the offal that floats upon small streams in high water, to rot in heaps. Such a course would teach most men that they can not ride to the summit of greatness upon a name made honorable by another.

There is, however, a class of men far more to be pitied than these. I mean those, who, having obtained some title, or assumed the responsibilities of some popular profession, can not be convinced, even by the thumps and kicks of a disgusted and indignant community, that they are not great. He, to whose heart there is the smallest avenue for sympathy, or pity, could most ardently wish this class to be small; but what station so responsible, or so sacred, as not to be encumbered with such pretending coxcombs.

There is no degree of goodness at which it is not perfectly laudible to aim; but he, who bends all his energies to the purpose of reaching greatness, deserves, at least, a punishment equal to that of being great only in a name. But under the present state of prejudices and partialities in our country, the ambitious aspirant frequently makes a hobby of another's popularity, upon which he rides into favor; while he, who is truly deserving, is, in point of honor, as though he had not been. But the time will come, and then it will be too late for amendment, when the disappointed aspirant will be left to lean alone upon his own merit, and the deserving shall enjoy the reward of his labor.

THE MORAL LAW.

An American lawyer, of eminence and ability, but an infidel and notoriously profane, meeting a legal acquaintance who was a decided Christian, told him that he had come to the determination of examining the evidences of the Christian religion, and asked him what books on the subject he would recommend him to read. 'Read,' said his friend, 'the Bible.' 'What, the very book of which I wish to ascertain the truth?' 'To be sure,' said his friend, 'this is what you would do in every other case, why not in this? Read the Bible itself: study it attentively: make yourself acquainted with the subject in controversy. Ascertain the amount of evidence of a divine original, contained in the Bible itself, it will then be time to think of consulting other books.' The advice seemed perfectly reasonable: but, where would you advise me to begin? with the New Testament, I suppose?' 'No, at the beginning: begin at Genesis and go through with it.'

An intimation from his physician that a disease he had upon him, must, within a very few years, put an end to his life, had, it seems, engaged him to make this enquiry, and it had its effect in leading him to act upon the good advice he had received.

His Christian friend called upon him not long after, and found him pacing the floor of his room, with a countenance which betokened intense interest in some important matter, and asked the subject of his thoughts. 'I have been reading,' he replied, 'the MORAL LAW.' 'Well, and what do you think of it?' 'I will tell you,' he replied, 'what I used to think. I used to think that Moses was the leader of a horde of barbarians or banditti: and that, having a strong mind, he had acquired extraordinary influence over a superstitious people, and succeeded in impressing them with the idea that he was possessed of supernatural powers. But what think you now,' enquired his friend. 'I have been looking,' he replied, 'into the nature of that Law: I have been trying to see whether I can add any thing to it, or take any thing from it, so as to make it better. Sir, I can not, it is perfect.'

He then proceeded briefly to analyze, and remark upon, each Commandment in order: showing the perfect reasonableness, and the comprehensive character of them all. He was, as a lawyer particularly struck with the classification of injuries to our neighbors, as there exhibited. 'They are divided,' said he, 'into offenses against life, chastity, property, and character. I notice too that the greatest offense in each class is expressly forbidden. Thus the greatest injury to life is murder: to chastity, adultery: to property, theft; to character, perjury. Now the greater offense includes, of course, the less of the same kind. Murder must include every injury to life; adultery every injury to purity; and so of the rest. And the moral code is closed and perfected by a command forbidding every improper desire in regard to our neighbor. Now I have been thinking, Where did Moses get that law? I have read history,—the Egyptians and other neighboring nations were idolators; so were the Greeks and Romans: and the wisest and best of the Greeks and Romans never gave a code of morals like this.—Where did Moses get this law which surpasses the wisdom and philosophy of the most enlightened ages? He lived at a period comparatively barbarous, but he has given a law in which the learning and sagacity of all subsequent times can detect no flaw.—Where did he get it? He could not have soared so far above his age as to have devised it himself. I am satisfied where he obtained it,—it must have come from heaven. I am convinced of the truth of the religion of the Bible.'

Such was the issue of a careful and exact investigation of the divine record, by one whose occupation as a lawyer, had, when his mind was applied to other subjects, produced habits of thought which eminently qualified him for such an enquiry, as this,—as soon at least as his heart, released from its thraldom under sin, allowed him to make it.

THE WORLD'S CONVERSION.

The unprecedented efforts by the church to multiply the number of preachers of the gospel in christian lands, to plant new churches, and to extend the benefits of a christian education, and are all so many preparations for the Divine Spirit to exert his power. The Spirit operates on the minds of men by means of the truth, and therefore, whatever is done to increase the amount of religious knowledge, prepares the way for his coming and agency. This is the object of the christian ministry; and, I need not say, this is the object of christian missions to the heathen. Missionaries go as the forerunners of the Spirit, as pioneers, as heralds. Their whole prescribed duty is to make proclamation of the truth. They are answerable only for making this proclamation faithfully. He who sends them forth, says to each of them, as he does indeed to every preacher of the gospel, "Son of man, if thou warn the wicked, and he turn not from his wickedness, nor from his wicked way, he shall die in his iniquity, but thou hast delivered thy soul." Christian missionaries have executed their commission when they have made all possible efforts to bring the gospel in contact with the minds of men. They can do no more. The hearing ear, the awakened conscience, the understanding heart, the willing obedience, are all the appropriate work of the Holy Spirit. Paul plants, Apollos waters, but God gives the increase.

Now there has been a commencement of preparations of this sort in very many of the benighted nations and tribes of men.—In hundreds of dark places the truth begins to shine; in most, very feebly, nevertheless it shines, and there is a gradual and constant increase of the light of life. Some millions of immortal minds are no longer in the total darkness they once were; and all that is necessary to make full preparation for the Spirit among the heathen, is to have these lights multiplied and increased in brightness, so as to throw the rays of truth over all nations.

The other preparations, resulting from providential movements in society, are on a far more extended scale. God, by means of a thousand causes, is, in fact, throwing the world open to his people, and is even bringing large portions of it either under the government, or the controlling influence of christian nations. He is furnishing his people with means for bringing the gospel to bear on the minds of men, far more powerful than he saw fit to bestow on his people in former ages; and he is taking away the impediments to traveling, and making access easy to almost all parts of the world. In a word, who can look over the earth, and not believe that providential preparations are in progress on a vast scale for the coming of the Spirit? While the preparatory agency of good men is beheld only here and there, providential preparations are going on, at this moment, throughout the habitable earth. And doubtless there are, too, preparatory influences of the Spirit himself on the minds of men, even where the gospel is not known, and where there is no truth except a few rays of the light of nature.—Rev. Dr. Anderson.

All true Christians must be like Noah's ark that was pitched within and without. They must have a holy inside, and a holy outside; their profession and their practice must agree together.

CHRIST WEEPING OVER JERUSALEM.

Let us learn from this portion of Scripture to attend, in this our day, "to the things which belong unto our peace." The Jews had their day of visitation, and we have ours They suffered their day of visitation to pass away unimproved; and unspeakably awful as we have already seen, were the consequences. Too many there are, of the present generation of men, who imitate their example in this respect. Our day of visitation, however, is passing rapidly away. The night is fast approaching, "when no man can work;" and are we attending to the things which belong to our peace? We attend to this and the other concern, but do we attend to the most momentous of all concerns—the one thing needful? Remember that an eternity of happiness, or an eternity of misery, is depending on this your day of visitation. Remember, that, when the present time of trial is expired, the most earnest cries, and the bitterest lamentations will be altogether fruitless and unavailing to procure you another. If the soul be once lost it is lost for ever!—We are not aware, my brethren, of the importance of this our day of visitation, or we could not consume the precious seasons in the manner in which we too frequently do. Were we duly impressed with its importance, of how different a nature would be our conversation, in how different a manner would our time be employed, and how different would be our prayers! Instead of that levity and unprofitableness which now too frequently mark our converse with each other, conversation would be edifying, and such as would "minister grace unto the hearers." Instead of our time being consumed in the constant pursuit of worldly amusements, or in a light species of reading, which is neither calculated to inform the understanding or improve the heart, much of our leisure hours would be spent in the devout perusal of the word of God, and in the retired devotions of the closet; and instead of that cold formality which now renders our prayers a lifeless service, and unacceptable to God, the deepest seriousness and the greatest earnestness would pervade them. We would converse as for eternity; we would live as for eternity. The momentous day of our visitation may, for any thing we know, be drawing near to a termination. This is a secret, known only to the great Author of our being. But of this we are certain, that whether that period be distant or near, it is impossible for us to attend too soon to the things which belong to our peace. Then, if we live, we shall live unto the Lord; "and if we die," "we shall die in the Lord."—Howard.

EACH MAN'S INFLUENCE.—Who can be in this breathing world so isolated, as to have no observers, no imitators; and so obscure as to have no influence? No man liveth to himself. Our every act, our every thought, wish, purpose, and word, influences ourselves, and through ourselves influences others. Every thing we do confirms us either in what is good or what is bad; contributes to the formation of either a holy or unholy character. A particular idea or sentiment within us may die, but it has contributed to the formation of a habit, and habits outlive all sentiments; yea, they multiply themselves, by influencing the habits of other persons. Every prayer breathed by Payson, aided in forming his seraphic piety; and it is now producing itself again in the power of his memoirs on our hearts. It is impossible to read them without resembling the man who was put into the prophet's tomb, and who, on touching the prophet's feet, was made alive.—What I am anxious to impress on your mind, is, that you can not be neutral in any thing, however remotely pertaining to the kingdom of God. Not a tone escapes our lips to die at our feet; it rather creates a corresponding modulation upon the air we occupy, and continues thus to rise till it sounds to the third heavens. So far as our successors and imitators are concerned, we ought to regard ourselves as walking across the field immediately after it has been ploughed. The path we mark, the footsteps we form, are to be the line by which, perhaps, myriads will regulate their movements.

SWEARING.—Whatever fortune may be made by perjury, I believe there never was a man who made a fortune by common swearing. It often happens that men pay for swearing, but it seldom happens that they are paid for it. It is not easy to perceive what honor or credit is connected with it. Does any man receive promotion because he is a notable blusterer? Or is any man advanced to dignity because he is expert at profane swearing? Never.—Low must be the character which such impertinence will exalt; high must be the character which such impertinence will not degrade. Inexcusable, therefore, must be the practice which has neither reason nor passion to support it. The drunkard has his cups, the letcher his mistress, the satirist his revenge, the ambitious man his preferments, the miser his gold—but, the common swearer has nothing; he is a fool at large, sells his soul for naught, and drudges in the service of the devil, gratis. Swearing is void of all plea; it is not the native offspring of the soul, not interwoven with the texture of the body, nor any how allied to our frame. For as Tillotson expresses it, "though some men pour out oaths as if they were natural, yet no man was ever born of a swearing constitution." But it is a custom, a low and paltry custom, picked up by low and paltry spirits who have no sense of honor, no regard to decency, but are forced to substitute some rhapsody of nonsense to supply the vacancy of good sense. Hence the silliness of the practice can only be equalled by the sillines of those who adopt it.—Lamont.

THE THOUGHTS OF ANOTHER WORLD.—It is not in the hey-day of health and enjoyment—it is not in the morning sunshine of his day, that man can be expected feelingly to remember his latter end, and to fix his heart upon eternity. But in after life many causes operate to wean us from the world; grief softens the heart; sickness searches it; the blossoms of hope are shed; death cuts down the flower of the affections; the disappointed man turns his thought toward a state of existence where his wiser desires may be fixed with the certainty of faith; the successful man feels that objects which he has already pursued fail to satisfy the cravings of an immortal spirit; the wicked man turneth away from his wickedness, that he may save his soul alive.

MOTIVES TO HOLINESS.—What an assemblage of motives to holiness does the Gospel present! I am a Christian. What then? Why I am a redeemed sinner, a pardoned rebel, all through grace, and by the most wonderful means which infinite wisdom could devise. I am a Christian. What then? Why I am a temple of God, and surely I ought to be pure and holy.—I am a Christian. What then? I am a child of God, and ought to be filled with filial love, reverence, joy, and gratitude. I am a Christian. What then? Why I am a disciple of Christ, and must imitate him who was meek and lowly in heart, and pleased not himself. I am a Christian.—What then? Why I am an heir of heaven, and hastening to the abodes of the blessed, to join the full choir of glorified ones, in singing the song of Moses and the Lamb: and surely I ought to learn that song on earth.—Payson.

SAMUEL J. MILLS.—When Samuel J. Mills left the college door, he said to his friend, "Let us make our influence felt on the other side of the globe." Mills was an exceedingly modest and retiring man, and the determination thus expressed was not from his nature—it was the result of grace. And the "other side of the globe" long ago was reached by the influence of that devoted servant of God. Almost the whole number of benevolent associations that are now sending out from this land the light and truth of the Gospel of Christ, may be traced immediately or remotely to the influence of that same man.—Irenæus.

WISE SAYINGS.

From impure air we take disease; from bad company, vice and imperfection.

The Dutch have this good proverb, that thefts never enrich; alms never impoverish; nor prayers hinder any work.

Did men govern themselves as they ought, the world would be well disciplined.

Mystery magnifies danger as the fog the sun. The hand that unnerved Belshazzer derived its most horrifying influence from the want of a body; and death itself is not formidable in what we know of it, but in what we do not.—Baker.

A REMARKABLE TOOL.

One evening, after supper, Edwin's father, who had that day returned from the city where he had been to market, sat down upon the settle which stood in the corner. There was a great blazing fire upon the hearth. Edwin came and took his seat upon a cricket before him.

'Now, father,' said Edwin, 'tell us about your journey. What was the most wonderful thing you have seen since you have been gone?'

'Why, I hardly know,' said his father; I have seen several wonderful things, though I think perhaps the most singular thing, on the whole, was a remarkable tool which I saw a man have."

'A tool?' said Edwin.

'Yes, a tool, or an instrument. I think we might call it a tool."

"Well, father, what is the name of it, and what is it for?' said Edwin. 'Is it a new invention?'

'It is for a great variety of purposes,' said his father; 'and that is in fact what makes it so remarkable: it can be put to such a variety of uses. You can do almost anything with it. And as to its name, I think it might properly be called the universal tool."

"What are some of the things that you can do with it, father?' said Edwin.

'Why, you can use it as a mallet, a turn-screw, a thimble, and a basket."

'Oh, father,' said Edwin, 'you're only making fun of me.'

'No,' said his father, soberly; 'it is really so. I should hardly have believed it myself, if I had not actually seen it.'

'I don't see how it is possible,' said Edwin, 'that the same thing can be used for a mallet and a thimble.'

'It has other uses more dissimilar still, for they can make it answer the purpose of a paddle, and a rake, and a hoe, and a shovel, and a box to carry money in.'

'Oh, father!' said Edwin. He could not believe that his father could really mean what he said, and yet he seemed to be perfectly serious.

'They use the article too, sometimes, for a brush, and a press, and also for a dipper, and a hook. With a little change in its shape, they make a speaking trumpet of it, and a perspective glass; also a pair of forceps, a spinning-machine, a screen, a vice, a pair of scales, a dibble,—'

'A dibble, father? what is a dibble?' said Edwin.

'A dibble,' replied his father, 'is a small pointed piece of wood to make holes with in the ground, when you are setting out plants.'

'And can you use this tool for a dibble?' said Edwin.

'Yes,' said his father.

'And for a pair of scales too? I don't see how it can be possible.'

'Yes,' said his father, 'and for a pair of tongs, and a snuffer; and it even does pretty well for a cork-screw; and it makes quite a good measure, both of length and of capacity.'

'What a tool!' said Edwin. 'Some wonderful new invention, I suppose. And it costs ever so much money, I dare say.'

'Not a great deal. It is very simple in its construction. Though I must confess that I think it must have required a great deal of wisdom to contrive it.'

'Is it simple, father?' asked Edwin. 'I don't see how it can be simple.'

'Yes,' replied his father. 'I did not examine it very minutely, but I did not observe more than about half a dozen parts.'

'Why, father! and yet it can be turned to all of these uses?'

'Yes, by varying these parts we can change its form and use very much.'

'Well, father, why did you not get one, and bring it home with you?'

'Why, to tell the truth, my son, I did,' replied his father, 'and there it is.'

So saying, Edwin's father held out his hand for Edwin to examine.

'Why, father,' said Edwin, 'you don't mean your hand?'

'Yes,' said his father, 'and I am not certain that there are so many as half a dozen parts. One, two, three,' counting the thumb and fingers of his hand, 'four, five. Not only five parts, and yet it can be turned to all of those uses.'

'I did not know that you meant your hand, father,' said Edwin. 'And even now I don't see that it can be put to quite all the uses you mentioned.'

'What one is there?' said his father, 'which you think it cannot be used for?'

'Why, a trumpet,' said Edwin, 'for instance.'

'Yes,' answered his father, 'we often halloo through our hand, and makes the sound go farther.'

'With a brush?' rejoined Edwin. 'Yes we do brush things with our hands sometimes. A money-box? Yes, I carry money in my hand, shut up tight. Well, a—a'

'I said a dibble,' added his father, 'and we do often use it for a dibble; and for a hoe and a shovel too, in soft ground, when setting out plants. And we paddle with it when we are swimming; and we use it as a pair of forceps when we take up things with our fingers; and we twist a thread with it, which is spinning; and we hold it up before the fire as a screen.'

'And you said a pair of scales,' added Edwin.

'Yes, we often estimate the weight of any thing by poising it in our hand. By holding a pound weight in one hand, and a quantity of any article which we want to weigh in the other, we can weigh out a pound of it pretty accurately.'

'Well, father,' said Edwin, 'I never knew before that my hand could be used for so many purposes.'

'It is a very remarkable instrument; and what is also remarkable, and adds very much to its value, it can not only be made to answer the purpose of all these tools and implements which I have named, but it is the very best thing which could be contrived to hold any other tool or implement whatever. So that it is at once a universal tool, and a universal tool-holder. It is perhaps the most admirably contrived instrument ever made. And yet some persons pretend to believe that it has no Maker.'

'I don't see how they can help believing that it has a Maker,' said Edwin.

'It is because they don't want to believe that there is a God,' said his father. 'They are like school-boys playing in a recess, when one of their playmates comes and says that the bell has rung for them to go in, and they say they don't believe it. The reason is that they don't want to believe; they want to stay out longer and play. And so they reject good evidence.'

'Is that what makes infidels?' said Edwin.

'Yes, they don't want to believe. They wish to live undisturbed in their sins.'

Here there was a pause. Edwin seemed to be reflecting upon what he had heard. At length he said:

'Well, father, you said it could be used for a dipper.'

'Yes,' said his father, 'and many a time when I have been working in the woods, I have had no water to drink but what I could dip up from the brook with my hand for the dipper.'

Loss of the Steam-Boat Erie.

The mail arrangements on this route are such that, at the time our paper goes to press, we shall not be in receipt of any accurate and detailed statement of the dreadful disaster which occurred on Lake Erie on the 9th inst. But through the politeness of a friend, we have been favored with the following particulars, in "advance of the mail," which, in the main, may probably be relied on as correct.

The Steam-Boat Erie left Buffalo, at 4 o'clock on Monday, the 9th inst., with 205 persons on board, including the Captain and crew, bound for Chicago. She had also, unfortunately, some Varnish on board as freight. When about 4 hours out, and off Dunkirk, the Varnish took fire, and the boat soon became enveloped in flames. The scene that ensued may be more readily conceived than described. The Steam-Boat De Witt Clinton, lying at Dunkirk, fortunately perceived the flames, and put out instantly to render assistance. Twenty-seven persons were picked up and taken on board of her, among whom was Mrs. C. J. Lynde, a daughter of Mr. Asa Babcock, of Truxton, who is at present the only female known to have been saved. She had been floating two hours on the water when rescued from a watery grave by the De Witt. We are sorry that we can not say positively that her husband, who, with his brother and uncle were also on board, were saved; but we trust the information may prove to be correct that he is on shore, but sadly burned. The Captain, we understand, was the last to leave the boat, when he and a few of the crew took to a small boat; but it was too light for them, and they abandoned it, when near Mrs. Lynde, to whom the Captain gave his last oar, recommending her to keep as still as possible. The Captain was afterwards taken up from a board by the crew of the De Witt.

The Exhibition.

The annual Exhibition of De Ruyter Institute took place at the Presbyterian Church, on Wednesday evening, as was announced. The exercises were of an interesting character, and were listened to by a large concourse of spectators, with evident satisfaction and interest.

The Ladies' Compositions partook of a great variety of subjects,

> "From grave to gay,
> From gay to grave, again," while the Gentlemen's Declamations contributed also eminently to keep up the interest which was attached to the exercises of the evening. Finally, the whole entertainment, accompanied as it was with music from the De Ruyter Band, gave a good degree of satisfaction to the hundreds who enjoyed it.

We hope we may be able to obtain several of the orations and compositions for publication in the Register. Their high literary and moral character entitle them to a more public place than the Port-Folios of the Authors. The richness of thought, and elegance of expression contained in them, are the best evidence of the intellectual faculties of the Students, and skill of the Teachers in teaching.

Final Perseverance—No. 2.

Mr. Editor,—I now enter upon the consideration of the article on 'Perseverance,' in the 68th No. of your paper. This specimen of inculcating and supporting the doctrine in hand, I suppose would be regarded a fair one in point of ability, not only by those who believe the doctrine to be true, but by those also who do not. There are, however, some features in the article which are so characteristic of the argument, in general, on that side of the question, that they ought not to be passed without notice.

The first is, a loose allusion to passages of scripture in support of the position taken, and that in language so unlike the passages on which the writer founds his theory, that it is hard to determine to what particular portion of the word he intends to direct the attention.

An example of this may be seen in the words, "Christ has engaged to keep them [believers] unto the end." And another in the following: "And having begun a good work in them, he has promised never to leave it until it be finished." The text intended in this last oblique reference, is found I suppose in Phillipians, i. 6; and in addition to the mistake in attributing the language to Christ, when it is Paul that speaks, it contains no promise at all, even from him. It is an expression of confidence in him who had begun a good work in the Christians of Phillipi. It should be observed that Paul shows in the subsequent verses that his confidence of the happy result from the continual favor of God to his brethren, grew out of the reasons he had (from his intimate acquaintance with and prayers for them,) to believe that they would be faithful to the last. See the 10th verse. I would notice the rest of the examples of similar laxness in the extract, but as it is to a great extent made up by adding together, in a declamatory style, one after another, of these remote, and obtuse allusions, it would be tedious to go through with them; but enough has been said, perhaps, to show that, either from being long accustomed to attach such a sense to those scriptures, the writer thought the case was clear enough without quoting them accurately, or he made choice of that way to wrest them, and so give his views the weight of divine authority, with the multitude of those who put themselves to no further trouble about their faith, than to believe what they are told.

Again: There are two passages which are given verbatim, excepting one word, that claim attention. Namely, John x. 27, 28, and Romans viii. 38, 39. The former reads, "My sheep hear my voice, and I know them, and they follow me: and I give unto them eternal life; and they shall never perish, neither shall any pluck them out of my hand." If this portion of our Lord's conversation, be read in connection with the general subject to which it relates, it will be seen that he had in view the following objects in what he said. First, so give a rule by which his friends might be known, and in the same breath to say to those whom he addressed, that they were not his friends.

Second, By alluding to his Omniscience, (in the words "I know them,") to signify that it was useless to attempt to deceive him by dissimulation.

Third, To tell what an infinitely rich boon he would give his friends.

Fourth, To state the security from foreign agents which they should enjoy in his and his Father's Omnipotence.

But it may be thought that the protection which he gives them, must protect them from every agent that might destroy, for he says, "And they shall never perish." Suppose, then, we admit that is what he meant by, and learned from, those words. Then must we not believe when Christians backslide, (which most who hold the foregoing sentiment, believe is done by all of them, more or less,) that they are not Christ's sheep? For he says, "My sheep hear my voice," (and what is more,) "They follow me."—Do they follow when they are sliding back? It may be replied that Christ did not say his sheep followed him all the time. True, neither did he say that all of them should never perish. He spoke in general terms; and if we interpret what he said in that way, we shall be apt to get his meaning: but if we give so much meaning to one part, the same rule must be allowed to the other.—That is, if because Christ said of his sheep, "They shall never perish," we must believe that whoever rightfully obtains that title can not be lost, then because he has said of them, "They follow me," we must believe they can not backslide, or do otherwise than follow him. Thus we are brought not only to acknowledge the doctrine of Perfection to be true in theory, but also, in practice, in the life, and experience of every regenerated person, while we are made to look upon those who profess faith in Christ, but mourn for the evil of their hearts and the imperfections of their lives, as having no good reason to expect the salvation of their souls.

nor depth, nor any other creature, shall be able to separate us from the love of God which is in Christ Jesus our Lord."

In this quotation, we have Paul's conclusion to an argument intended to confirm the Roman Christians in the belief, that God would not fail to grant them whatever they might need, whether in the afflictions of life, or the pains of death; taking for his premises the love God had for them, which He had demonstrated in the gift of his Son.

It is proper to notice, that in the catalogue of evils against which the love of God is put as security by this Apostle, we have presented to us by name, a train of those formidable foreign agencies by which the Christian's hopes are menaced; commencing with death the most terrific of them all, and proceeding on through, and closing with those less to be feared. I say foreign agents, or agencies, because they are things not found in or controlled by individuals, but are extraneous. This observation is equally true of the extract from John, and is shown by the words, "Neither shall any pluck them out of my hand." Again, 29th verse, "My Father which gave them me, is greater than all; and none is able to pluck them out of my Father's hand." If therefore any of the sheep of Christ, or the brethren of Paul, should be lost in perdition at last, by wilfully sinning against God, they could not impeach Christ, or Paul, for having falsely instructed them: for their words contain no warrant of safety in such a case.

In order that these scriptures should appear to sustain the position of Romaine, it would be necessary to alter them somewhat in the following manner. For the words in John, "And they shall never perish," substitute these, ("And none of them shall ever perish.") Again, in the passage from Romans, insert the words "sin nor" before the word death. Yet until these alterations this evidence would be questionable, because the authors might with great propriety be supposed to speak conditionally, as God did to Nineveh by Jonah, although no conditions are expressed in the message of the prophet; those, however, being known principles, and always understood though not expressed.—Consequently, whatever may be the strength of the texts under consideration, in favor of "Perseverance," that strength is suspended on the known, and often expressed condition of the ultimate fidelity of the individuals referred to. And that fidelity not being certain, though probable to a greater or less extent, the final "Perseverance" of the individual or the relation of the soul is in the same proportion uncertain.

Such a course of presuming upon the import of the oracles of God as the article in question presents, is not only destructive of all unity of faith among Christians, but even to the very existence of faith; for it is identical with the principles of interpretation used by Infidels, as may be illustrated by the following fact:—

A minister once preached a discourse in which among other things, he attempted to prove, that faith ought to be, and was exercised. Shortly after, he received a letter from an Infidel in the neighborhood who had taken umbrage upon hearing the sermon. The letter was an attempt to prove that nobody had any faith; and contained the 17 and 18 verses of the 16 chapter of Mark, as the foundation of the argument. The minister replied to the Infidel nearly in the following words:—

"Sir—You have taken it for ganted without proof, that those signs must follow all that believe."

But was not the Infidel in the right after all? Was not his position and that of Romaine's the same? For if we must believe that no regenerated person can possibly be lost, because Christ has said of his sheep, "And they shall never perish," must we not also believe, that no person can have faith, unless the signs named in the Infidel's quotation should actually follow them? because Christ has said, "These signs shall follow them that believe."

WASHINGTON CORRESPONDENCE.

Wednesday, July 28.

The Bank Bill has to-day passed the Senate by Yeas 26, Nays 23. Thus the great object of the Extra Session is accomplished as far as regards the Senate. It was ordered to an engrossment yesterday, and this morning was read a third time.—The question was on its final passage.

Mr. Benton, after a few remarks against the bill, and particularly in opposition to the amendment of Mr. Clay adopted yesterday—in which he said that with this amendment incorporated, were the bill taken on a writ of error before the Supreme Court, the charter would be reversed as soon as he could walk in and state the case—moved to postpone the bill indefinitely.

Messrs. Dixon and White briefly gave their reasons for voting for the amendment yesterday, and expressed their approbation of it.

Mr. Woodbury opposed it.

The question was then taken on the postponement and decided in the negative.—Yeas, 21, Nays 28.

The question, "shall this bill pass?" was then decided in the affirmative by the following vote:

Yeas 26, Nays 23.

Thus the bill was passed, and the Senate adjourned at about 2 o'clock.

In the morning hour previous to taking up the Bank Bill, the bill yesterday introduced by Mr. Preston to amend the act to carry into effect the provisions of the treaty with Mexico, was taken up and passed.

The Fortification Bill was taken up, and after some debate, was laid over till Saturday next.

In the House, the Revenue bill was taken up in Committee of the Whole, and

Mr. Kennedy offered an amendment, of which he gave notice yesterday, to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill, and insert six sections providing for a duty of twenty per cent. on certain specified articles now duty free, or bearing a less duty than twenty per cent., enumerating raw silks, linens, ticklenburgs, sheetings, all worsted goods, common saddlery, almonds and other fruits, wines, &c.

The Bill was debated during the day by Messrs. Barnard, Winthrop, Randolph and Everett, examining the present wants of the Treasury, and arguing the necessity of an increase of revenue, as proposed by this bill.

Without action, the Committee rose and the Bank bill being received from the Senate, was twice read and referred to the Committee of the Whole.

The House adjourned at 3 o'clock.

Thursday, July 29.

In the Senate, to-day, Mr. Mouton from the Select Committee on that subject, made a report relative to Gonon's System of Telegraph, and favorable to its adoption. The report was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. Mangum from the Naval Committee, reported the Home Squadron bill from the House, which was laid on the table.

He also reported the bill from the House for the payment of Navy Pensions, which, on his motion, was then taken up as in Committee. Several amendments were offered, and considerable debate ensued. No amendments were adopted, and the bill was put over and made the special order for Tuesday next.

The bill to revive and extend the charters of certain Banks of the District of Columbia was taken up, and supported by Messrs. Merrick, Smith of Ia., and Berrien, and opposed by Messrs. Allen, Linn and Benton. Without action, the Senate went into Executive Session.

In the House, Mr. Fillmore from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill making appropriations for the Diplomatic expenses of the Government, which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the State of the Union.

Mr. Levy introduced two bills, one for suppressing Indian hostilities in Florida, and the other for the protection of the people of Georgia and Florida from Indian banditti. Both of which were referred to the Committee of the Whole.

The Revenue Bill was then taken up in Committee of the Whole, Mr. Cushing in the Chair—a resolution having been adopted yesterday to stop debate in Committee, Friday next, at 12 o'clock. The bill was debated during the day by Messrs. Saltonstall, Ingersoll, Pickens, Habersham, Medill and Hastings, which latter gentleman read his entire speech from manuscript.

Mr. McKeon next got the floor, and moved that the Committee rise. A most boisterous scene of confusion here arose, in appeals from the decision of the Chairman, from the want of a quorum, from a call of the House; and while that was in progress, disturbance from truant Members crawling in through the windows, which occasioned an interruption of business, and objections addressed to the Speaker against this manner of admittance, &c. &c. The result was, that after an hour and a half spent in this manner with less than a quorum present, the Yeas and Nays having been twice taken on adjournment, which was refused, a bare quorum was at last collected, and the Committee resumed its session.

Mr. McKeon then took the floor, and at a quarter past 5 o'clock commenced his remarks, in opposition to the bill, which were continued during his hour, with much less than a quorum of members present.

The House adjourned at a late hour.

Friday, July 30.

The Senate early took up the bill to recharter the Banks of the District of Columbia. The question was on Mr. Berrien's amendment forbidding these Banks to receive or pay out the bills of any other than specie-paying Banks after the 1st of March next. Mr. Wright opposed this amendment, as according to the Banks an unnecessary privilege. He believed the District would do better without Banks than with them. The amendment prevailed:—Yeas 21; Nays 18.

Mr. Merrick moved an amendment to allow these Banks to issue notes of $1 and $2. Rejected: Yeas 21 [Whigs]; Nays 22—[Messrs. Barrow, Graham, Smith of Ind., and 19 Opposition.]

The fourth section of the bill, which had been stricken out in Committee of the Whole, was restored: 25 to 16.

Another amendment, allowing the Union Bank of Georgetown six years to wind up, was adopted.

The bill was now ordered to be engrossed for a third reading: Yeas 30; Nays 14. [Affirmative: 26 Whigs and Messrs. Clay of Ala., Fulton, Sevier, and Young. Nays: 14 Opposition.]

The bill making provision for Pauper Lunatics in the District of Columbia was now taken up and passed: Yeas 25, Nays 17. [Yeas 23 Whigs, with Messrs. Walker and Young. Nays 15 Opp. with Messrs. Bates and Dixon.]

The Land Distribution Bill from the House now came up in order; but Mr. Smith of Ind., (Chairman of the Land Committee,) gave notice that he should not call for its consideration to-day, but early in next week.

The House bill to establish a Home Squadron came up next in order. Mr. Benton moved an amendment requiring that American Hemp shall be used as the staple of its sails and cordage. This amendment was, after some discussion, withdrawn, and the bill considered in all its stages and passed. The Senate then adjourned over to Monday.

In the House, a great many memorials and other papers were presented, but, objection being made, they could not be received at this time. Among these were the Resolutions of the National Hall Meeting in favor of a Bank; the Albany Meeting in favor of a Bankrupt Law, &c., presented by Mr. Barnard. Mr. B. also endeavored to have the Bankruptcy bill from the Senate taken up, read twice and printed: but this also was refused, as interfering with the prescribed order of business. So the House proceeded to take up the motion of Mr. W. W. Irwin, of Pa., to reconsider the vote by which it had been determined to take the Revenue bill out of Committee at 12 o'clock this day. Mr. I. after a few remarks, withdrew his motion, asking only that his proposition to repeal the present exemption of Railroad Iron from duty be considered.

The Revenue Bill was taken up.

Mr. Wise spoke his hour, and Mr. Keim of Pa., briefly against it.

Mr. Fillmore followed in defense of the bill. He showed that more Revenue was absolutely necessary; that a general impost of 20 per cent., excepting only a few specified articles for obvious reasons, was the fairest and best mode of providing it, until full evidence could be obtained on the subject. He considered the proposed exemption of Tea and Coffee unwise and objectionable; the consumers would hardly know that 20 per cent. was levied unless told of it, while it would add $2,000,000 to the Revenue. A temporary exemption was worse still: it would fill our store-houses with a two years' supply of Coffee: and when the duty took effect, the price would rise to the actual value: so the Revenue will have lost all, and the consumers gained nothing. He trusted gentlemen were prepared to vote frankly and cheerfully the supplies needed for the support of the Government and Defense of the Country.

[Mr. F. was called to order in the midst of his remarks by Mr. Snyder of Pa. The Speaker decided that he was not out of order. Mr. S. appealed, and the House sustained the Speaker's decision.]

The hour of 12 having arrived, the debate was arrested by rule, and the House proceeded to vote on the various propositions of amendment.

Mr. Atherton's motion to strike out the enacting clause was negatived: Ayes 82; Noes 119.

The question was now on Mr. Lawrence's amendment to exempt Tea and Coffee from duty.

Mr. Clifford, of Me., moved to add "Sugar, Molasses, and Salt;" which prevailed: 112 to 81.

The whole amendment was now rejected: 112 to 57.

Mr. Fillmore moved that the new duties take effect on the 1st of September: Carried.

An extraordinary number of small amendments were successively offered and nearly all rejected; among them one to reduce the duty from 20 to 18 per cent.; one to exempt wollen blankets costing under 75 cents; one proposing duties on French Wines and Silks retaliatory of that levied on our Tobacco. Several attempts were made to limit the effect of the bill to two, two and a half, and three years, but neither prevailed. Finally, the amendments being all disposed of, the Committee rose and reported the bill, and the question was now on ordering it to a third reading.

Mr. Cave Johnson of Tenn., moved that the bill and amendments do lie on the table. Negatived: Yeas 89 Opposition, and Messrs. Gilmer, Wise, of Va., and Shields, of Tenn.—total 92: Nays 123—all Adm. Majority for the bill, 31. The Main Question was now ordered by 113 to 96. An amendment of the Committee repealing the exemption of Railroad Iron from duty was negatived: Yeas 73; Nays 119. And the bill was now without opposition ordered to be engrossed for a third reading to-morrow. Adjourned.

Saturday, July 31.

The Senate did not sit to-day.

In the House of Representatives, Mr. P. G. Goode from the Committee on Public Lands, reported two bills; one to extend the time for issuing military land warrants for officers and soldiers of the Revolution, which was three times read, and passed; and the other to extend the time for making surveys of Virginia land warrants, which was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

A resolution from the Committee on Naval Affairs was adopted, directing an inquiry into the cost and expediency of aiding companies in fitting out lines of steamers between the ports of this Country and foreign ports, and for selecting dock-yards on the bays, lakes and rivers of the United States.

On motion of Mr. Barnard, the Bankrupt Bill was read twice, referred to the Committee of the Whole, and ordered to be printed—a motion by Mr. Sprigg of Ky., to lay it on the table having failed by Yeas 93; Nays 128.

The Revenue Bill was then taken up, the question being on its passage. This was carried by Yeas 116, Nays 101, after a protest by Mr. Proffit against passing the bill with indecent haste, and a desire for the yeas and nays on every amendment in the House.

A motion for reconsideration of the vote was made by Mr. J. C. Clark, and negatived: Ayes 99; Noes 115.

Thus the bill was passed.

Mr. Wise moved, as the title of the bill, "A bill to violate the Compromise Act of March 2, 1833." After much cursory debate on the merits of the bill, contending that this would be a proper title, he withdrew his motion.

Mr. Bidlack, a new Opposition Member from Pennsylvania, who has manifested an excessive desire during the session to distinguish himself in some manner, followed the example of Mr. Wise, and moved as its title, "a bill to lay a tax on the producing classes, to make up the contemplated deficiency in the Treasury, arising from the anticipated distribution of the proceeds of the public domain, for the benefit of stockholders, landholders, and speculators."

After very powerful remarks by that gentleman, at some length, in favor of this title, he withdrew the motion.

The original title, "A Bill Relating to Duties and Drawbacks" was adopted, and the House adjourned at a quarter past 2 o'clock.

Monday, August 2.

In Senate to-day, various memorials were presented in favor of, and adverse to a Bankrupt Law, a National Bank, and Distribution of the Proceeds of Public Lands; one from hat manufacturers of New York, Boston, and Philadelphia, against a duty on the materials used in the manufacture of silk hats; one presented by Mr. Tallmadge for a duty on watches, jewelry, &c.; another by Mr. Clay against a duty on articles entering into the manufacture of glass; and one by Mr. Wright against the Revenue bill in its present form.

Mr. Calhoun presented the proceedings of a meeting of citizens of Cumberland Co., Virginia, containing resolutions against a National Bank, affirming its unconstitutionality, and the right not only, but the duty of Congress to repeal it if chartered, denying that the Bank question had been at issue at the late election, and repudiating as useless this Extra Session.

A debate sprung up on the disposition of this petition, on the Constitutionality of a Bank, and as to the history of the Convention that framed the Constitution, with regard to this subject. Messrs. Henderson and Morehead maintaining its constitutionality, and denying that the power of Congress to establish a Bank was brought in question by that Convention; and Messrs. Clay of Ala., and Calhoun tenaciously contending that the question of conferring on Congress the power of establishing a Bank was raised and decided in the negative, that it is unconstitutional, and the duty of Congress to repeal it if established.

The bill making further provisions for the pauper lunatics of the District of Columbia, was read a third time and passed.

The Revenue Bill, and the bill relating to the extension of Military Land Warrants, from the house, were twice read and referred—the former to the Finance Committee, and the latter to the Committee on Public Lands.

The Fortification Bill from the House was again taken up and debated, with reference to amendments during the day. Several amendments were adopted, among which was one offered by Mr. Benton, appropriating $75,000 for a site of a Western, or South-Western Armory, to be selected by the President of the United States.

Mr. Preston, Chairman of the Military Committee, who reported this bill, defended it with his accustomed ability and sagacity. It is designed to supply the deficiency of appropriations of the Fortification Bill of last session, and to go for the defense of our maritime borders.

A motion was made to recommit the bill with instructions: which failed by a vote of 17 to 20. No decisive action was taken on it.

The Senate adjourned at 4 o'clock, having been in session six hours.

In the House of Representatives, the Fiscal Bank bill from the Senate was taken up in Committee of the Whole, (Mr. John C. Clark in the Chair,) and discussed during the day.

Mr. Sergeant, Chairman of the select committee on the Currency, who reported the bill, opened the debate with one of his usually sound and practical speeches, in support of the bill. He took, as settled, the Constitutionality of a Bank, and examined the history of former Banks, noticing the fact that a Bank charter has received the signature of a Washington, Jefferson, and Madison, and arguing the financial policy of this measure, as absolutely necessary for the prosperity of our Government.

Mr. McClellan of New York opposed a Bank, both on constitutional grounds and grounds of policy. It was also opposed by Mr. Saunders of N. C., and ably advocated by Mr. Stuart of Va.

The House adjourned at a quarter past 4 o'clock.

Tuesday, August 3.

The resolution of Mr. Allen, to rescind the rule of the Senate, which provides for the closing of their doors in Executive Session, except when engaged on treaties, was taken up.

Mr. Allen advocated the resolution at some length, concluding that secrecy was not required while acting on the nominations of officers, as they deeply affected the interests of the people, holding in their hands, and swaying for good, or for evil, the whole action of government. The people should, therefore, know of the action of their agents on this subject, and be enabled to be heard with regard to the character of those who are appointed in such multitudes to office. The character of the candidates who were worthy could not be injured by public investigation, while it would expose guilt and corruption. When dealing with adversaries, or with foreign powers, as in the case of treaties, the progress of their action should not be known until it was consummated, he, therefore, did not propose to rescind this part of the rule.

Mr. Clay was not disposed to debate this subject at this Extra Session—were it the proper time it might be shown that publicity should not be given to their action on nominations, as well as on treaties. He would now merely move to lay the resolution on the table, and on this he called the yeas and nays.

The motion was carried by Yeas 26, Nays 20; and thus the resolution laid on the table.

The Fortification bill was then again taken up, in Committee of the Whole, the question being on the amendment of Mr. Porter, to appropriate $50,000 for barracks, repairs of forts, &c., at Detroit.

To this Mr. Allen offered an amendment, appropriating, for the construction of armed steamers and other vessels of Government on Lake Erie, $100,000.

Both of these propositions were debated at great length. The amendment to the amendment was rejected without a division, and the original amendment by Yeas 21, Nays 24.

Mr. Sevier offered an amendment to appropriate $50,000 for carrying on the military works at Fort Smith, Arkansas, which was adopted: Yeas 19; Nays 17.

Mr. Berrien moved an additional section to the bill, appropriating $208,618 for payment of Georgia, for expenses incurred in calling out her militia in cases of emergency in repressing Indian hostilities, and for the settlement of the claims of Maine of a similar character.

Mr. Preston, Chairman of the Committee on the Militia, who reported the bill, opposed this amendment. The bill was for the specific purpose of supplying the deficiency of last year's appropriations for old works of defense, which were now most necessary; and he opposed all amendments which had not been sanctioned by the War Department, or by the Committee.

The amendment was debated at great length by various members, among whom Messrs. Clay of Ala., Linn, and Walker, either moved or gave notice of amendments, if this was persisted in, for the payment of old dues to their respective States.

The amendments were however withdrawn, and that of Mr. Berrien rejected—Yeas 11; Nays 27.

Several other amendments were rejected, which were accompanied with much debate. The bill was then reported to the Senate, and the amendments of the Committee generally concurred in, to that appropriating $75,000 for the purchase of a site of an armory on the Western rivers or South Western frontier. This, Mr. Clay said he could not vote for, in this reduced state of the Treasury, and hoped it would be rejected. Mr. Benton, who offered it, was much surprised to hear at this late hour, objections to this amendment, and wished an opportunity, when prepared to show the necessity for it.

After some further conversation on this, the Senate adjourned at 4 o'clock.

In the House, the morning hour was devoted to resolutions.

The Fiscal Bank bill was then again taken up in Committee of the Whole, and debated during the day by Messrs. Mason of Md., Chas. Brown of Pa., Wood of N. J., and Payne of Ala. in opposition, and by Mr. Washington of N. C. in support.

The House adjourned at half past 3 o'clock.

It is estimated that 45,000 tons of Coffee were consumed in the U. S. the last year.

Suicide.—At Dunkirk, on Saturday evening, a man named Samuel Pickel, committed suicide by hanging himself; the cause of the fatal act was RUM.—Eve. Journal.

Fatal Accident.—Mr. Philo Churchill, Jr., of Bennington, Wyoming county, was instantly killed while assisting to raise a barn in that town on Saturday last. While raising one of the beams, it slipped, and falling upon Mr. C. crushed him to death—Eve. Journal.

A passenger in a steamboat, a short time since, brought a suit in St. Louis against the captain for not starting at the hour he advertised, thereby creating a loss to him. The case went before a jury, who brought in a verdict of one hundred and ninety dollars damages.—Eve. Jour.

Mail Robbery on the Hudson.—A leather mail bag, cut open and rifled of its contents, was found floating in the river on Wednesday morning last, near Crawford's dock at this village. The bag was chained and fastened with a U. S. lock, and had in it, when picked up three pieces of coal, weighing 15 lbs., placed there for the purpose of sinking it.—Newburgh Journal.

From Texas.—By the arrival of the steamer Kingston, we have received Texas papers to the 25th of July. The manifesto of the Kingston states that the Santa Fe expedition had fallen in with a large body of Indians on the Upper Brassos, and that reinforcements had been ordered to co-operate with the Santa Fe forces. No doubt by this time, the savages have been soundly thrashed.

Capt. Demitt has been taken by a party of Mexicans, but will shortly be released.

The british barque Marion, Capt. Campbell, arrived at Galveston on the 23rd, consigned to Mr. Chas. Power, with a cargo of assorted merchandise and a number of passengers.

The presidential election appears to absorb all parties. General Houston is the popular candidate.—New Orleans Bee.

Exploring Expeditios.—The correspondent of the Baltimore Republican under date of Valparaiso de Chili, 5th of April, says:—Our last advices from the Sandwich Islands, by a vessel arrived at this port a few days ago, left the U. S. Exploring Squadron there, fitting for a cruize to the Columbia river and the N. W. coast; from thence it is expected they will again proceed towards the South Pole, and return home by way of the Cape of Good Hope.

There are four or five American vessels now lying in this harbor; and the commerce of the port, as well as the improvement of the city, are in a more flourishing condition than any other place on the Pacific coast.

Confusion of Names.—We have remarked that men of intelligence are often misled by the circumstance that there are Members of Congress of opposite politics but similar names, and fall into gross errors. Thus one friend says to us "What does Kennedy mean by opposing the Bank Bill?"—confounding John P. Kennedy, Whig from Baltimore, with Andrew Kennedy, Opposition from Indiana. It may be worth while to put this matter straight in a paragraph, which our readers may preserve for reference:

There are two Allens in Congress:—William Allen, Opp. Senator from Ohio, and Elisha H. Allen, Whig Member from Maine. Two Andrewses in the House: Landoff W. Andrews from Kentucky, and Sherlock J. Andrews from Ohio—both Whigs. There are four Browns in the House: Jeremiah Brown of Pa., and Milton Brown of Tenn., Whigs, and Charles Brown of Pa., and A. V. Brown of Tenn., Opposition. Three Butlers in the House: Wm. Butler of S. C. a kind of Whig: Sampson H. Butler of S. C., and Wm. O. Butler of Ky. Opp. Two Calhouns: John C. Calhoun of S. C. Opp. in the Senate, Wm. B. Calhoun of Mass. Whig, in the House. Three Campbells in the House: W. B. Campbell, and Thomas J. Campbell of Tenn., Whigs: John Campbell of S. C. rather Opp. Two Clarks: John C. Clark and Stanley N. Clarke, both of this State, and both Whigs. Two Caldwells: Green W. Caldwell of N. C., and Patrick C. Caldwell of S. C., both Opp. The two Clays in the Senate—Henry Clay of Ky., Whig, and Clement C. Clay, of Ala., Opp., will hardly be confounded. There are two Davises: Richard D. Davis of N. Y., Opp., and Garret Davis of Ky., Whig. Two Dawsons: William C. Dawson of Ga., Whig, and John B. Dawson of La., Opp. Two Edwardses: John Edwards of Pa., Whig, John C. Edwards of Mo., Opp.—Two Floyds: John G. Floyd, and Charles A. Floyd, both of this State, and both Opp. Two Fosters: A. Lawrence Foster of N. Y., and Thomas F. Foster of Ga., both Whigs. Two Goodes: Patrick G. Goode of Ohio, Whig, and Wm. O. Goode of Va., Opp. Two Grahams: William Graham in the Senate, and James Graham in the House, both of N. C., and both Whigs.—Two Hastingses: Wm. S. Hastings of Mass., Whig, and John Hastings of Ohio, Opp. Two Johnsons: William Cost Johnson of Md., Whig, and Cave Johnson of Tenn., Opp. Two Joneses: John W. Jones of Va., Opp., and Isaac D. Jones of Md., Whig. Two Kennedys: John P. Kennedy of Md., Whig; Andrew Kennedy of Ind., Opp. Two Marshalls: Thomas F. Marshall of Ky., Whig, Alfred Marshall of Maine, Opp. Two Masons:—Samson Mason of Ohio, Whig, John T. Mason of Md., Opp. Two McClellans: Abram McClellan of Tenn., and Robert McClellan of N. Y., both Opp. Two Randalls: Alexander Randall of Md., and Benjamin Randall of Maine, both Whig. Three Smiths: Perry Smith of Ct., Opp., Oliver H. Smith of Ind., Whig, Senate, and Truman Smith of Ct., Whig, House. Two Thompsons: John B. Thompson of Ky., and Richard W. Thompson of Ind., both Whigs, Four Whites: Albert S. White of Ind., in Senate, Edward D. White of La., John White (Speaker,) of Ky., Joseph L. White of Ind., all Whigs. Six Williamses: Lewis Williams of N. C., Christopher H. Williams of Tenn., and Joseph L. Williams of Tenn., and Thomas W. Williams of Ct., Whigs, and James W. Williams of Md., Opp., with Ruel Williams, Opp., in the Senate. Three Youngs: Richard M. Young of Ill., Opp., Senate, Augustus Young of Vt., and John Young of N. Y., both Whigs, House.—New Yorker.

Beauties of the Slave Trade.—The British brig of war Fawn, recently arrived at Berbice, having in charge a Portuguese built brig, which had been captured as a slaver, after a chase of 8 hours. The log book of the Fawn furnishes the following details:

On the 19th of February, 1841, lat. 22 30, long. 40 west, Cacupos, Brazil, about 18 miles distant, observed a large brig standing in for the land, and altered our course so as to cut her off, if possible. On approaching, she appeared not to have the least idea of our being a man of war—allowed her to close within range of our 32 pounder; fired a gun over her, and another as quick as possible ahead—she then up with her helm, attempted to run, but appeared in great confusion.

We continued to throw the shot over, ahead, and astern of her, without intention of striking, as we were positive of slaves being on board. After a short time she was increasing her distance; Lieut. Foote then determined to put a shot into her hull, but with great regret, on account of the unfortunate beings on board. Shots were then thrown close under her stern twice—a third was about to be fired, when we observed her round to. In about twenty minutes we came up and boarded her. The slaves were all below with the hatches on; on turning them up, a scene presented itself, enough to sicken the heart even of a Portuguese.

The living, the dying, and the dead, huddled together in one mass. Some unfortunates in the most disgusting state of small pox, in the confluent state, covered from head to foot, distressingly ill with opthalmia; a few perfectly blind; others, living skeletons, with difficulty crawled from below, unable to bear the weight of their miserable bodies. Mothers with young infants hanging at their breasts, unable to give them a drop of nourishment. How they had brought them thus far appeared astonishing. All were perfectly naked. Their limbs were excoriated, from lying on the hard plank for so long a period. On going below, the stench was insupportable. How beings could breathe such an atmosphere and live, appeared incredible. Several were under the plank, which was called the deck, dying—one dead.

We proceeded to Rio Janeiro with the prize. On the passage we lost thirteen, in the harbor twelve—from small-pox and debility; a number also died on board the recovery ship Crescent. After clearing the hold, and fumigating the brig, it was determined by Mr. Ousley, the British Minister, to send the brig—with part of her cargo—for adjudication, to the nearest colony, under the command of Mr. G. Johnson, mate of the Fawn. We sailed on the 16th of May with 180, well provided with medicines, and directions in what manner to use them. Tapioca and lime juice well provided. Notwithstanding all the care that a small crew could bestow on them, we unfortunately lost twenty, chiefly from scurvey and general debility. This unfortunate brig left Bahia fort, on the coast of Benguela, with 510 negroes, and, thirteen days after, on her capture, she had but 375!

The New Locks.—The work on the new tier of Locks, now constructing at this place, is going on with great rapidity. The three lower Locks are already laid, and the other two are in good state of forwardness. The whole tier is to be completed this fall and when done, will be as substantial and splendid a piece of work of the kind as can be found in the country. Full five thousand yards of masonry have already been laid since the 1st of May.—Lockport Courier.

NOTICE.

The annual meeting of the S. D. B South Western Association, will take place at Northampton, Clark co., O., on the fifth day of the week before the second Sabbath in October. A general attendance is desired, and brethren from foreign churches are invited.

DIED,

In this town on the 15th inst., Miss FIDELIA GAGE, aged 20.

In Georgetown, on the 9th inst. at nearly 10 o'clock P. M., Mr. GEORGE COON, aged 65 years.

Mr. Coon through life manifested a kind and benevolent disposition to all around him.

A little more than two and a half years since Mr Coon openly and publicly professed the religion of our Lord. In June following, he was baptised into the fellowship of the S. D. B. Church, of which he proved a faithful member until his death; his illness was slow, and lingering—(partially the liver disease) his frame wasted to a mere skeleton; yet, not a murmur escaped his lips; but so strong was his faith, that he would often repeat "though he slay me, yet will I trust in him," and so died almost without a struggle. He was faithful at the family altar. His wife, with whom he had lived more than forty years is left and three children to mourn the loss of a kind husband, and loving father, and the prayer meeting a faithful attendant.

POETRY.

The Spirit Sleepeth Not.

BY WM. H. BURLEIGH.

When the gentle hand of slumber
  Presses on my weary eyes,
And the forms that none can number
  In their thronging beauty rise—
Phantoms of imagination,
  With a mystic glory fraught,
Tell me by their facination
  That the spirit sleepeth not!

When the airs of evening win me
  To go forth and view the skies,
And I feel my soul within me
  Strugling, as it fain would rise
From the gloomy paths of men,
  To enjoy its blessed lot,
Something whispers to me then
  That the spirit sleepeth not!

When I gaze upon the ocean,
  With its ever-heaving tide,
In its spirit-soothing motion,
  Or its desolating pride—
Changing still, it ever hath
  Voices for the inward thought,
Telling in its love and wrath,
  That the spirit sleepeth not!

When I bend in adoration
  Low before the throne of God,
Pouring forth my supplication,
  Spreading all my wants abroad—
Voices from the world above,
  While the earth is all forgot,
Tell me with their tones of love,
  That the spirit sleepeth not!

From the mountains and the valleys,
  From the leaves by zephyrs stirred,
From the wind that gently dallies
  With the ocean's mane, is heard
Whispers as of thousand spirits,
  Telling, as on air they rise,
That the soul which man inherits
  Never slumbers, never dies

EDUCATION AND CRIME.

BY ALONZO POTTER.

There is a great difference of opinion among the friends of education in regard to the moral tendencies of the existing common school system. Few would take the responsibility, it is presumed, of protesting against it as absolutely demoralizing; and yet language is often used, and a tone of argument adopted by worthy men, which savor not a little of such a sentiment. The avowed difference of opinion, however, has respect rather to the influence which is likely to be exerted by a system in which there is no special provision for religious instruction, and in which the amount and kind of such instruction are to be determined by the inhabitants in their respective school districts. In Prussia, France and Holland, the law expressly requires that a certain degree of instruction in the principles of natural, and in the history of revealed religion, and also in the moral precepts of Christianity, shall be given by every teacher. In addition to this, the clergymen of different churches are clothed with authority to visit the schools; and times are set apart in which they can communicate to the children of their respective cares, instruction in their own religious tenets.—This is the case also in the national schools of Ireland—a system from which, however, a large portion of the established clergy withhold their countenance and support, on the ground that it is the duty of the government to provide the young of Ireland not only with general religious instruction, but also with a special training in the doctrines of the national church.

In our country, the subject of religious instruction in schools is invested with peculiar difficulty. We are not only without an established religion; we have taken the ground of complete and universal toleration in respect to religious opinions. As on one hand this precludes the government from any direct authoritative action in favor of a system of instruction peculiarly Christian, so on the other, the great diversity of religious opinions among the people renders them jealous of measures which may tend to favor directly or indirectly one form of faith more than another. Under these circumstances, it might at first be thought that our children must necessarily grow up entirely destitute of that instruction which is pre-eminently necessary not only for another life, but also for the present. Yet such an inference is greatly wide of the truth. It is not sufficiently considered that though religious culture in schools is very important, there are other places more especially intended for that purpose, and better adapted to it. These are home and the religious sanctuary. Religious and moral training has been devolved by the Creator particularly upon parents and Christian pastors, and it is a charge which they ought in no case to delegate entirely or principally to others. While they may wisely and advantageously avail themselves in this matter of the aid of Sunday schools and day schools, it ought to be remembered that such aid will prove efficient only when those with whom God has especially entrusted the great duty, give it their own constant and careful supervision. In order, then, to ascertain what is the real condition of religious and moral training among a people, we ought to look at the state of their churches, the character of their clergy, and the prevalence of family religion, rather than at the amount of instruction in dogmatic theology which may be given at day schools. It should be remembered, too, that the great duties of morality and piety are inculcated much more effectually by [illegible] example than by mere precept; and that a teacher of bad temper or dissipated habits is not likely to make children love virtue or respect religion, though he exact daily answers to every question in the longest catechism.

Assuming these as truths too obvious to need discussion, we shall be able to determine the state of moral and religious instruction among the young of our own country, not by looking exclusively at our day schools, but rather by considering, in the first instance, the state of our churches and the various provisions which exist, in them and elsewhere for training the young to virtue and piety; and secondly, by observing the actual state of morals and religion, as well as the prevalence of crime for the last twenty-five years, during which common schools have been established by law

1. In regard to the first point, it is now a matter of common remark with foreigners, and must, I think, be apparent to every candid observer, that an unusually large proportion of our people attend public worship; that the standard of clerical character, as it respects piety and virtue, is high; that our Sunday schools embrace an immense proportion of the children of the republic, and that parents generally are anxious to cultivate in their families a respect for the observances of religion. In such a state of things it is hardly to be supposed that a duty so prominent as the moral culture of the young can have fallen into great neglect. We know as a fact that it is quite otherwise. The press teems to an extent altogether unparalleled, with books intended for their benefit. Under the stimulus of Christian zeal, and of a laudable though not always sufficiently generous emulation, Sunday school and Bible classes are rapidly multiplying, and are drawing within their influence the hitherto neglected children of vice and indigence. Asylums for blind youth of both sexes, for the deaf and dumb, and for two classes of orphans, are not only rising on every side, but public opinion requires that they shall impart religious instruction, and be conducted on Christian principles.

And how is it even in day schools? In very many cases, especially when taught by females, the exercises are opened in the morning by reading the scriptures and by prayer. In all cases before a school can derive aid from the public funds, the teacher must give evidence of good moral character, and this evidence must be renewed each year. Even where the scriptures are not read, the books used as reading and text books will be found to assume the paramount obligations of religion and the divine authority of Christ, and to be pervaded by a healthy tone of moral feeling. Such is the state of public sentiment on this subject that no book of immoral tendency would be tolerated in our schools; and a teacher who should venture to prostitute the influence afforded by his station, in order to instil licentious or infidel principles into the tender minds of his pupils, would be sure to be driven from their post. It is also worthy of much more consideration than it usually receives, that a school which is ostensibly occupied only in educating the intellect, may yet be operating benignly and powerfully upon the moral sentiments and habits, and indeed must do so, if properly conducted. By its lessons and tasks it tends to substitute reflection and deliberate effort in place of mere impulse. By its disciple it contributes, insensibly, to generate a spirit of subordination to lawful authority, a power of self-control, and a habit of postponing present indulgence to a greater future good; and finally by the knoweledge which it communicates, it enlarges a child's conception of his true interest, teaches him that forecast, self-restraint and a correct moral deportment are indispensible pre-requisites to success in life. No one can be more sensible than the writer, that these effects are produced but imperfectly in most of our schools at present, and that vastly more might be done indirectly for the moral culture of the young, if intellectual instructions were conducted on a more enlightened plan, and were animated by a more pure and generous spirit. He holds, too, that without trenching upon the more delicate and debateable points of religious faith, much more might and ought to be accomplished, directly, towards confirming the pupils in a reverence for justice, charity and religion, and in the habitual discharge of these social duties. But while we lament these imperfections, we ought not to deny nor underrate the good which is effected and which is believed to be equally clear and encouraging.

2. For what has been the practical effect of the system of public instruction established in this State? As has been already intimated, about twenty-five years has elapsed since this system first went into operation. Under these auspices a new generation of men and women have come forward, and those of us who are old enough to compare them with their predecessors, can judge whether they have less reverence for the institutions of religion, or less faith in its principles. The fact that the number of churches and clergymen of every denomination is increasing more rapidly than the population (and that such is the fact might easily be made apparent if your space allowed,) proves that the proportion of those who conform outwardly to Christianity has been increased. It is not alledged that this increase is to be attributed exclusively, or even principally to our day schools; but merely that it is inconsistent with the idea sometimes advanced that the instruction in those schools is essentially infidel; and also is evidence that that prompted rather than obstructed the faith and virtue of the people. This, however, will become much more obvious if we consider the statistics of crime.

It is often affirmed, that notwithstanding the extention of the means of education, crime is rapidly increasing. On this point I would remark, first, that so far as our own State is concerned, the returns of criminal convictions annually made to the office of the Secretary of State show that the increase of crimes of every description within the last ten years, is not greater than the increase of population, even on the supposition, by no means probable, that the returns were as full and complete when first required, ten years since, as they are at present. Secondly, This increase of crime would have been much less, but for the unusual influx of foreigners within the last few years. Dr. Julius states as the result of a laborious examination of all the principal prisons in the United States, that about one-third of the convicts are foreigners. The returns in this State show that with us, the proportion is even larger, being in some years nearly one-half. Thirdly, Before this increase of crime could, under any circumstances, be ascribed with plausibility to an increase of education—for this is gravely maintained by some persons—it would be necessary to show that those offences have multiplied fastest, which, in their conception and perpetration, require the greatest knowledge and forethought.—The facts, however, are remarkably the reverse. In this State, as appears, by the last annual report of the Secretary of State on criminal convictions, the crimes of forgery, perjury, burgulary, &c., which imply skill and knowledge, have been diminishing, while those which are the usual concomitants of ignorance and mental debasement have increased. To the same effect is the experience of other States. Says the Chaplain of the Connecticut State Prison in a late report, "that knowledge is not very frequently used as an instrument in the commission of crime, may be presumed from the fact that of the 66 committed to this prison last year, the crimes of only four were of such a nature as to require for their commission ability either to read or write."—The directors of the Ohio Penitentiary state, that "it is an erroneous impression that the convicts are intelligent, shrewd men, whose minds have been pervaded to vice, rather than blunderers into low and vicious habits, and ultimately into the commission of crime from idleness, ignorance and opacity of mental vision. It will be seen that nearly the whole number of convicts are below mediocrity in point of information; and indeed, our inquiries and observations have long since fully satisfied us that not only in our own prison, but in others which we have visited or inquired after, depraved appetites and corrupt habits which have led to the commission of crime are usually found with the ignorant, uninformed and duller part of mankind. Of the 276, nearly all below mediocrity, 175 are grossly ignorant, and in point of education scarcely capable of transacting the ordinary business of life." Is it not a question for grave reflection, how far society after thus suffering individuals to grow up in ignorance and incapacity, retains, in respect to them, the right of inflicting punishment?

Fourthly, To show, however, still more clearly that education, instead of being responsible for any portion of crime, is directly and greatly calculated to arrest it, I would place in juxtaposition, and ask attention to two facts which seem to me alike conclusive and striking. 1. It appears by the late census that there are but 43,000 white adults in this State who are unable to read or write. If to this number we add one-half of the whole colored population of the State, as suffering from a like inability, yet without education we shall get a total of about 83,000; i. e. about 1-29th of the whole population of the State, who cannot read and write. If, then, education has no tendency to diminish crime, so that a person after having enjoyed its advantages is as likely to commit crime as the ignorant, we shall expect, on examining the records of our courts and prisons, to find the same proportion between the instructed and uninstructed among convicts, as among the whole population. In other words we should expect to find 28 convicts able to read and write to every one unable to do so. Now what is the fact?

2. If we take the whole number of convictions in this State, for the last two years, in courts of record and at special sessions, we find, not one in 29 who is unable to read, but 1 in 2; showing that the tendency to crime among the ignorant, is fourteen and a half times greater than it ought to be on the supposition that education has no tendency to diminish it. An examination of the Auburn prison, made something more than a year ago, gave out of 244 prisoners, but 59 who could read well, and but 39 who could read and write. In the Connecticut State Prison, but about one-half of the convicts when committed, knew how to write. In the New Penitentiary of Philadelphia, out of 217 prisoners received during the year 1835, but 85 could read and write; and most of these could do either in but a very imperfect manner. Facts of this kind might be adduced to almost any extent. By showing that the proportion of uneducated convicts is invariably so much greater than the proportion of uneducated inhabitants; they seem to me to demonstrate, that ignorance is one of the great high-ways to crime, and that in proportion as men are left without instruction, in that proportion they are likely to become convicts.

In a future number I may resume this subject for the purpose of comparing the state of Education and Crime in various countries of Europe; and more especially for the purpose of examining certain results of M. Guerry in his "Moral Statistics," which seem to be at variance with the views presented in this paper.

BELL IN THE STATE HOUSE PHILADELPHIA.

While in our venerable State House on the 20th of April last, the day of funeral solemnities in honor of the late President of the United States, and in the very chamber where was signed the immortal Declaration of Independence, we were struck by the peculiar solemnity of the muffled bell above.

A friend informed us that it was the very bell which announced to the assembled crowds on the 4th of July, 1776, the passage of the memorable act which procured for our country "a seperate and equal station among the nations of the earth; and that it had remained unused since it was tolled for the death of General Washington. We have since seen in an exchange paper the following notice of what is familiarly called "the old bell."

This bell was manufactured in England, expressly for the State House, while the United were under the British Government. On it was inscribed the names of the manufacturers, date, &c and the following prophetic words: "Proclaim Liberty throughout all the land, unto all the inhabitants thereof," Levi xxv. 10.

On the morning of the ever memorable 4th of July, 1776, the doors of the State House were closed during the deliberations of Congress, and the many anxious citizens who thronged the streets were denied admission: but no sooner was the last signature affixed to that charter which severed the tie that bound these colonies to the mother country, than this same bell was rung.—Yes, it was the first to sound the notes of the sweet song of Liberty to columbia's sons. Little did its manufacturers think that the solemn injunction to 'Proclaim Liberty throughout the land,' would be soon obeyed.

At that time our country was covered with thick forests, our cities small, our advantages for education limited; and on all sides were heard the howl of England's war-dogs, and the war-whoop of the enraged Red man. Now the forests are succeeded by the vegetation produced by American industry—our cities are large and beautiful,—and where the Indian's wigwam once stood, the gorgeous Seminary or stately Church rear their majestic heads, and instead of the howl of war, are heard songs of Zion, or the glad shout of America's freedom-born sons.

All this is the result of the passage of that one act of our forefathers. The minds of the people were prepared for it, and nobly did they sustain it, in "time that tried men's souls." The welcome notes of that old bell were wafted on the refreshing breeze of that happy day to many a fireside, and found a response in every patriotic heart. The Minister, Lawyer, Farmer and Mechanic; old and young, rich and poor, male and female, all put their hands to the work: fought for Washington, their country, and their God.

Like the immortal signers of that Declaration of Independence, the old bell has done its duty, and now "rests from its labors." It hangs in the second story of the stable, its former place being now occupied by another and much larger one. I have stood in the belfry of that steeple, and cast my eyes, not over a dreary wilderness, but over a vast extent of cultivated soil; while here and there could be seen what every American loves, viz:

"The star spangled banner in proud triumph wave, O'er the land of the free, and the home of the brave."

BROOKS OF THE HOLY LAND.—The Arnon rises among the mountains of Gilead or Abarim, runs a northwesterly course, leaving Mount Nebo and Pisgah to the north: here it was Moses took a view of the promised land; this stream "turns toward the valley of the plain of Moab," [Numb. 21. 14–20.] emptying into the Dead Sea. It now divides the province of Belka from Kerek as formerly the kingdom of the Moabites on the south from that of the Ammonites on the north.

Jabbok rises in the country of the ancient Ammonites among the mountains, runs westerly by Pella and empties into the Jordan about mid-way between the lake Gallilee and the Dead Sea. On this stream were "Mahanain" and "Penuel" where the angels appeared to Jacob and he wrestled with God for a blessing and prevailed.—[Gen. 32, 2—32.] How cheering to know, that now also "the effectual fervent prayer of the righteous man availeth much!"—[James 4. 16.]

Kishon is a small stream near the Valley of Esdrælon which runs into the Jordon on the west side, there is a stream of the same name, running into the Mediterranean not far from Carmel.

Kedron running between the city of Jerusalem on the west, and the mount of Olives on the east, then turning easterly through a rough valley of about 12 miles, empties into the Dead Sea. It was in this valley the Kings Asa, Hezekiah and Josiah burned the idols of the kings who preceeded them. This stream is very serviceable to the city, as it rises greatly by the rain and with a rapid current carries away the filth which is discharged into it from the common sewers. Across this brook David fled from the traitor Absalom [2 Sam. 15, 23.] as afterwards our blessed Lord from the traitor Judas. [John 18, 1.]

WALLS OF BABYLON.—The city of Babylon, so famous in ancient history, is now crumbled to dust, so that its site is not precisely known. We are informed by scripture that ti is seated on the Euphrates; and as numerous heaps of rubbish and brick are seen by travelers, in about lat. 32 degrees N. and long. 39 deg. E., it is supposed to have stood in that situation.

Babylon was sixty miles in circumference, surrounded with a wet ditch and a wall built of large bricks cemented with bitumen, a pitchy substance, which issues out of the earth, in that country. Pliny says the walls were 200 feet in height, and fifty feet broad, and adds that each foot was three inches more than the Roman foot, making the foot here used equal to about 14 inches and a half English. The walls were defended by 230 towers. It had 100 gates, all of solid brass, twenty-five on each side, being built in the form of a square; streets at right angles passed from each gate to the opposite, dividing the city from N. to S. over which there was a bridge 1100 yards long and thirty feet wide; on each end of the bridge was a palace, the largest of which was seven miles and a half in circumference; these palaces communicated with each other by a vault under the cahunel of the river. Strabo differs from the above in his description of Babylon.

Pliny says that this city was built by Semiramis, who was Queen of Assyria, 2007 years before Christ. Eusebius makes it to have been founded by Nimrod. It become the capital of the Babylonish empire under Nabouassar, 747 years before Christ, and in the time of Jotham King of Judah.

Nineven, according to Diodorus, was sixty miles in circuit, the wall 100 feet high, and so broad that three chariots could go abreast on them: they were defended by 1500 towers, 200 feet high.

RIVER JORDAN.—This rver runs nearly south, through the whole land. It rises among the mountains of Anti-Lebanon, in a small pond, called "phiala" or the bowl, because it is always filled to the brim with water. From this it runs under ground for some miles, and issues at length from a cave in the neighborhood of paneas or panium, for Josephus says, that chaff thrown in at phiala, came out here. Passing south about fifteen miles, the river widens into a lake, called "merom," or "Samechon," meaning the upper lake, a beautiful sheet of water about seven and a half miles long, and four broad.

Running south about twenty miles, the river enters the lake or sea of Galilee. It is said to pass through this without mingling its waters, but this is not true, though the [illegible] current of the Jordan can be traced in the pure waters of the lake for some distance. After leaving this lake it runs about 15 miles south, [illegible] then turns to the hills on the east side. It flows about 15 miles, and empties into the Dead Sea, from which there is no outlet.

The whole course of the Jordan is about 100 miles. Its breadth is from 30 to 50 yards, the depth varying from three feet at the fording places to several fathoms: the water deepens suddenly, being six or seven feet deep close to the bank. The waters are generally colored with mud, and in some places flow sluggishly, but generally rapid. So strong is the current near the Dead Sea, that an expert swimmer cannot cross it. As there are no bridges, it is crossed by wading. During the summer, there are many "fording places," such as "Bethabara" where John preached and baptised. [John 1 28.]

The Jordan may be said to have double banks. The inner, which confines the river to its bed, and the outer bank some distance back, and rising 10 feet above the level of the river. The space between the two banks is covered with high trees and herbage; and the river is so hid with reeds, bushes, &c. that it is hidden till you descend to it. In these bushes, [illegible] and other beasts reside, who are driven back when the river overflows. [Jer. [illegible] 19.] This takes place in January, February, and March, from the thaws and rains on the mountains of Lebanon. This was about the time of the passover. And it was at this very time when the river was widest spread and rolling in all its might, and the [illegible] that Joshua, by the command of God, divided the waters, and Israel crossed dry shod. (Josh. 3, 15, and 5, 10)

This river is venerable in the east, to this day, and well may it be. Here the proud Syrian was directed to wash, that his leprosy might be healed. [2 Kings, 5, 10.] Here in the sight of the prophets, it was divided to make way for Elijah and Elisha. [2 Kings, 2. 8, 14.] Here Elisha in the power of his master, made iron to swim. [2 Kings, 6. 6, 7.] Here the blessed Savior was made known to the prophets and Jews as the son of God, and the Lamb of God that taketh away the sins of the world, while the Holy Spirit descended upon him without measure. [John 1,36.]

To House Keepers.—The following Receipe is just in time—read it, and then see if it is true:

Let a bunch of lecks soak four, five, or six days in a pail of water, and wash your pictures or any piece of furniture with it. The flies will never come near any thing so washed.—Boston Times.

MENTAL AND MORAL PHILOSOPHY.

BY S. S. RANDALL.

That is the only true philosophy of human life which, by the communication of an enlightened knowledge, and just appreciation of all our powers and faculties, physical, intellectual and moral, and their relations to each other and to the external world, enables us to conform in all things to the laws and constitution of our being. That no such system has hitherto generally prevailed, is painfully obvious when we reflect upon the capacity of our common nature for the enjoyment of happiness—and consider the vast amount of evil and of suffering which surround us on every hand. It requires but an ordinary exertion of reason to convince us that these consequences are not the legitimate or necessary result of that wonderful organization which constitutes human life. On the contrary, we see the most abundant evidences of an opposite design and adaptation pervading our whole corporeal and mental structure; we perceive the uniform harmony of external nature with all our higher and nobler faculties, and its invariable tendency to minister to our pleasure and benefit: and we recognize the hand of a bounteous Benefactor in the innumerable blessings which are spread out for our acceptance, both in the physical and moral world.

A systematic obedience to the natural and moral laws impressed by the Creator upon all the workmanship of his hands, must invariably be productive of the highest degree of happiness, of comparative exemption from physical ills, and a cheerful and abiding enjoyment of all the varied aspects of human existence. All men, it may safely be presumed, desire thus to fulfil the great purposes of life; but the melancholy experience of the world demonstrates that but few of the race have been able to comprehend, and still fewer to apply, the means of accomplishing this universal object of human exertion. Originally constituted with powers and faculties in harmony with each other, and with the external world of matter and of mind, the legitimate exercise of all these powers and faculties was the sole requisite to the full participation of the utmost measure of happiness of which humanity admitted. The lower orders of animal creation were endowed with constitutions adapted to their rank in the scale of being; and with faculties, powers, and sources of enjoyment fitted to their several natures. The exercise of these faculties, however, was, in their case, restrained within prescribed and impassable limits: the objects and purposes of existence, are, with them, instinctively fulfilled, and transgression rendered impossible. Upon man were conferred intellectual and moral powers, comprising within themselves every element of progressive improvement, of refined enjoyment and substantial happiness; together with the ability to exercise them wisely and judiciously, and to reap in unbounded profusion, the rich fruits of an intelligent obedience to the laws of the Creator, or to pervert and misapply them, with all the certain and fearful responsibilities attached to a departure from the established conditions of his being.

The education of the race has proceeded by slow and almost imperceptible gradations. Over a great portion of the globe, centuries of deep and profound ignorance of the elementary truths of intellectual and moral science, have been permitted to elapse, and the light of civilization is yet to dawn. In those more favored regions, where the mind of man has been reaching forward from time to time, to more enlarged views of its nature, capabilities and destination, its efforts have been constantly checked, and its onward progress impeded by the surrounding darkness, and the innumerable obstacles which it has been compelled to encounter and surmount. The institutions of society—many of them founded in ignorance and error—and more, partaking of the nature of an incipient and only partially developed civilization, and failing to recognize the possibility of future improvement advance; the inveterate prejudices and narrow selfishness so predominant in every community; the unchecked passions of the multitude rushing blindly and heedlessly on in pursuit of ignoble and degrading objects; and, above all, the constant "fear of change, perplexing nations" which looks upon and punishes every departure from established usages, principles, modes of thinking and of acting, as the greatest of crimes—all these and a variety of other influences equally potent, have conspired to retard the advancement of true knowledge, and to postpone the prevalence of an enlightened philosophy of human life. A system of physical, mental and moral bondage has but too generally prevailed; and if at rare intervals its galling fetters have been broken, and individuals of commanding genius have stepped forward from the crowd, to announce some new truth, destined in its influence to change the whole aspect of science or morals, and to constitute the basis of future discoveries, equally important in their results upon the welfare and improvement of the race, the penalty prescribed by ignorance, prejudice and error, has been scrupulously exacted.

As in the progress of individual existence, however, it requires long years of bitter experience, much and deep reflection, and a constant observation and study of human nature, in all its aspects, to enable us fully to appreciate, and understandingly to pursue the interests and the duties appertaining to our physical and moral well-being, so in reference to the race, centuries may pass, before the true philosophy of human life shall be evolved from the diversified elements of which it is composed.

Amid the thick and palpable darkness of the middle ages—when the Genius of Barbarism hovered in gloomy triumph over the intolerance, bigotry and cruelty which pervaded all ranks from the highest to the lowest—the lights of science and civilization, heralding the path to moral and intellectual advancement burst forth to cheer and illumine the benighted nations. Within the compass of less than four centuries, and notwithstanding the uniform prevalence of wars and civil commotions unprecedented in their violence and terror, even in the bloody history of the ancient world, the progress of knowledge in every department of physical science, has subjected the broad dominion of nature, above, around, and beneath, to the intimate acquaintance and in a great degree to the control of man. The laws which regulate the motion and govern the complicated evolutions of the heavenly bodies, have been ascertained with a precision amounting to absolute demonstration. The various elements, properties and powers of matter, in all its combinations, have been analyzed and appropriated to the specific purposes for which they seemed best adapted. All the phenomena of the animal and vegetable creation have been fully elucidated: the external and internal structure and materials of the earth itself displayed to view: the principles which cause, regulate, control and terminate the wild and apparently lawless career of elementary warfare, subjected to analytical examination: and all the complicated manifestations of our own physical organization reduced to harmony, simplicity and beauty of nature itself.

From the multifarious investigations which preceded and accompanied these proud and triumphant results of science, the great principle was established, that all the workmanship of the Creator displayed to human view, was subject to certain and invariable laws, in strict conformity to which all the phenomena of nature were manifested: that these laws were susceptible of full discovery and easy comprehension;—and that by their constant and pervading presence, the visible creation was upheld and sustained, and the vast machinery of the Universe harmoniously directed and arranged. If then, to all these emanations of creative wisdom and goodness, fixed laws have been prescribed, and these laws and their operations are capable of being ascertained by the intellect of man, and applied to the purposes of science and art, is not the inference irresistible that to our mental and moral nature, laws equally certain and invariable have also been prescribed, the knowledge of which is equally attainable, and of incomparably greater importance to our present and future welfare? Metaphysicians, from the days of Aristotle to the present period, have successively endeavored to solve the great problem of the nature and operations of the human mind; but while they have accomplished results, doubtless satisfactory to themselves, they have failed to throw around the subject the full and clear light of demonstration. To the few inquiring minds of the ages in which they flourished, they succeeded only in investing the intellectual powers with an undefinable and mysterious abstraction; and none of them attempted to reach the minds of the multitude, equally interested in this momentous question, with the wisest of the race. In short, they have erected a great variety of admirable superstructures, each essentially partaking of the predominating qualities of the mind from which it emanated; each deeply tinged with the peculiarities of its skilful architect; faithfully depicting those nicer shades of character intuitively apprehended by the consciousness of each; but possessing few of those enduring elements of universal nature and truth, capable of instant recognition and immediate appropriation by every grade of intellect, and every combination of moral sentiment. One system has rapidly succeeded another; and this, in its turn, has given place to a more ingenious and plausible hypothesis—all equally artificial and equally unsatisfactory. The minds of earnest inquirers were unsettled and unconvinced; the human intellect roamed over the broad fields of imagination, without a guide—building up for itself misty, vague and unsubstantial theories: and at a period when a rational, simple and harmonious system was universally demanded by the increasing intelligence and enlightenment of the race—a system which should be based upon the immovable rock of nature, and adapted to all the capacities, wants and aspirations of humanity—the metaphysics of the schools furnished nothing beyond the most abstract conceptions of isolated intellect—captivating, indeed, and beautiful to the fancy, but cheerless and uncongenial to the heart. They "kept the word of promise to the ear—but broke it to the hope."

At this crisis, an obscure individual in the heart of Germany began to attract the attention of the world, by the originality, novelty and interest of his speculations on the phenomena of the mind, in connection with its material organ, the brain. Free from all pretensions to the character of an authoritative expounder of ethical science—having formed no hypothesis—cherished no theory—adopted no system—one of those simple and ordinary occurrences of every day life, which, when subjected to the eagle eye of Genius, is sometimes fraught with the most momentous consequences, directed his mind to a train of reflections involving results of immense magnitude and universal interest. Acknowledging no guide but nature, and faithfully gathering and applying the responses of this only infallible oracle, he waited long and patiently upon the shrine of his great teacher, before venturing to interpret her revelations. Confining his researches and inductions strictly within the pale of accurate and comprehensive observation, and aided by the scientific skill of a kindred mind, the details of a system were gradually and cautiously evolved, which at once challenged the most scrutinizing observation, and addressed itself to the most enlightened sanctions of the intellect and the heart. It is unnecessary, in this place to do more than refer to the principles unfolded. We doubt not they are already familiar to the greater portion of our readers; and if there be any who have not yet examined this admirable system of mental and moral philosophy, or have given it but a cursory and superficial glance, we would earnestly commend it to their deliberate and serious attention, in the firm conviction that a subject possessing, in every point of view, so deep an interest for the christian, the philanthropist, the patriot and statesman, will be divested of none of its attraction, when examined through the medium of the new and peculiar light thrown upon it by the masterly intellect and comprehensive benevolence of a Spurzheim, a Combe, and a Caldwell.

These principles, fortified as they now are by the accumulated observation and experience of half a century—tested as they have been, by the most severe and critical analysis—and sanctioned by some of the soundest minds of the age, promise to effect a complete and most beneficial revolution in the kindred sciences of physical, mental and moral philosophy—to unite them in one great and harmonious system—and to shed a flood of light upon some of the most interesting problems of man's existence and nature. Their reception, however, by the generation to which they were first announced, was destined to add another page to the record of human perversity and obliquity. Those who occupied the chief seats in the numerous temples of mental philosophy, while they simultaneously denounced the new doctrines, watched with constantly increasing alarm, their steady advance and rapidly expanding influence. The "ineffectual fires" of the old philosophy were seen to pale and grow dim before the superior light and kindling warmth of the rising orb. The mind of man was no longer symbolized to the imagination as a heterogeneous and inexplicable compound of etherial influences and "baser matter," impelling to opposite and discordant results—a combination of virtuous principles and vicious propensities so arranged as necessarily to render life a constant and hopeless struggle for the ascendancy of the higher nature. The "middle wall of partition," which for ages had separated the constituent elements of our common humanity, was broken down at once and forever; and man stood forth in the image of his Creator—a living soul, occupying and consecrating by its deathless energies an organized corporeal structure—a "temple not made with hands"—with powers and faculties, propensities and sentiments, each performing its own peculiar and appropriate functions, within the prescribed range of its operations—fulfilling harmoniously its separate mission—and the whole effectually and admirably adapted to the diffusion of happiness, the promotion of knowledge, the attainment of wisdom, and the progressive advancement and improvement of the race.

No one who has accustomed himself to trace the progress of great truths, in any of the various departments of knowledge, as they have successively been unfolded to the human intellect, will indulge the apprehension that the discoveries of Gall and Spurzheim are destined permanently to be affected either by present indifference to their value, or by the interposition of discouraging obstacles to their diffusion.—Elaborated and systematized as they have been by the most enlightened scholars and purest philanthropists of Europe and America, and presenting the fundamental elements of a clear, connected and harmonious science of surpassing interest and practical utility—they will, in due time, assume in our systems of education, in our legislation, in our criminal jurisprudence, and in our numerous institutions for the relief of suffering humanity, the elevated rank to which they justly appertain. It is needless to multiply instances where popular prejudice, and the predominance of error have denounced and proscribed those doctrines and their teachers, which after ages have consecrated and hallowed, and the universal sense of the civilized world inscribed upon the imperishable tablets of the intellect and heart of man.

> "Truth crushed to earth, shall rise again,
> The eternal years of God are hers;
> But error, wounded, writhes in pain,
> And dies amid her worshipers."

It is from the general prevalence and diffusion of a philosophy so accordant with truth and nature—so intimately connected with the interests and welfare of every individual of the species—so important in its influences, present and prospective, on human character and human happiness, on society, on civil and political institutions of every grade, on all the relations of domestic life—in a word, on all the diversified machinery of civilization,—that we may rationally look forward to an advance in mental and moral improvement, hitherto unknown in the history of the race. By a slow and laborious, yet persevering process—by gradually displacing the numerous and varied theories of the past, which have served only to encumber and darken the subject, and by careful and thorough observation, experiment and reflection, a path has at length been opened up to the enlightened investigation of man's compound nature. Like those indefatigable travelers who perseveringly and painfully persisted in the immense and apparently hopeless labor of removing the accumulated rubbish which choked the entrance to the Pyramids, until their exertions were at length rewarded by discovering the magnificent chambers and wonderful architecture of remotest antiquity—so have the masters of the new philosophy, in the face of the most discouraging obstacles, succeeded in attaining to a clear perception of the physical, mental and moral constitution of man, and in indicating to those who shall come after them, the means by which still greater and more important advances may be made, in that knowledge, of all others the most interesting and useful. But like those travelers, they have, as yet, penetrated only to the vestibule of the immense and magnificent temple. Numerous undiscovered apartments remain to be explored—hidden treasures to be developed and appropriated—and the perfect harmony and minute adaptation of the whole vast structure to be demonstrated and applied.

God's Goodness to Me.

How glad am I!—I was not born
A Hindoo or a slave,
To wander in a state forlorn
Down to an early grave.

I might have been an Arab child,
The Koran taught to read;
Or been an Indian fierce and wild,
In war to fight and bleed.

I might have worshiped at the shrine
Of dreadful Juggernaut—
Been thrown to crocodiles and swine,
On some devoted spot.

But no; my favored lot has been Cast on New England's shore,
Where I am taught the plague of sin,
And Jesus to adore.

Here pious parents every day
Teach me to live for heaven;
And bid me morn and evening pray
That I may be forgiven.

Here none molest or make afraid
Those who delight in prayer;
And all can seek the Savior's aid,
However poor they are.

And O, what gratitude and love
Should daily fill my breast!
That God should stoop from heaven above
To make me here so blest.

O, I must praise him, and I'll feel
For thousands young as I,
Who never hear his holy will,
And thus degraded die.

TRUE COURAGE.

"Coward! coward!" said James Lawton to Edward Wilkins, as he pointed his finger to him.

Edward's face turned very red and then the tears started in his eyes, as he said, "James Lawton don't call me a coward."

"Why don't you fight John Taylor then, when he dares you? I would not be dared by any boy."

"He is afraid said Charles Jones," as he put his finger in his eye, and pretended to cry.

"I am not afraid," said Edward; and he looked almost ready to give up: for John Taylor came forward and said, "Come on, then, and show that you are not afraid."

A gentleman passing by, said, "Why do you not fight the boy? tell me the reason."

The boys all stood still, while Edward said, "I will not do a wicked thing, sir, if they do call me a coward."

"That is right, my noble boy," said the gentleman. "If you fight that boy, you really will disgrace yourself, and will show that you are more afraid of the laugh and ridicule of your companions, than of breaking the commandments of God.

"It is more honorable to bear an insult with meekness, than to fight about it.

"Beasts and brutes which have no reason, know of no other way to avenge themselves; but God has given you understanding, and though it be hard to be called a coward, and to submit to indignity and insult, yet remember the words of the wise man—"He that ruleth his spirit is greater than he that taketh a city."

"Suppose you fight with this boy, and your companions all call you a brave fellow, what will this be when you are called to stand before God?

"Many a poor deluded man has been drawn in to accept a challenge and fight a duel to show his bravery, and thus displayed to all, that he was a miserable coward, who was afraid of the sneer and laugh of his companions. Rather follow the example of that brave soldier, who, when he was challenged to fight, said, 'I do not fear the cannon's mouth, but I fear God.'"—Juvenile Reformer.

A Lame Boy.—A poor lame boy came one day to a gentleman who was very kind to him, and asked for a piece of string, saying, "Do let it be a good long bit, sir." The gentleman inquiring what it was for, the boy seemed unwilling to tell; but at last said, it was to make a cabbage-net, which he could sell for three pence, as he wished to send the money to help to pay for printing Bibles for the heathen: "And you know, sir," added he, "it may pay for printing one side of a leaf of one of them." The gentleman gave him a large piece of string, and told him to bring the net when it was finished. The boy brought it, and the gentleman said, "you are a good boy; there is three pence for you to send for the Bibles, and three pence for yourself." "No, sir," exclaimed the boy, "do send it all, perhaps it will pay for printing both sides." —S. S. Gleaner.

THE CONVERSION OF SOULS A CAUSE OF JOY.

And they caused great joy unto all the brethren. —Acts xv. 3.

It was Paul and Barnabas who are here said to have caused great joy unto all the brethren: and they caused them great joy by declaring the conversion of the Gentiles. The truth here taught is, that the conversion of souls is a cause of joy to real Christians. It is so, because God is thereby glorified, because the church of Jesus Christ is thereby enlarged and extended, because of the evil thereby prevented, and because of the good thereby done; and this joy is illustrated by the Savior in the parables of the lost sheep, the piece of silver, and the prodigal son. Luke xv.

In the conversion of a sinner, a soul is saved from death, and all the evil which it must have felt and suffered in the future world is prevented. James v. 19, 20. And a multitude of sins are hidden; they are forgiven and covered. And his own evil influence is averted. By precept and example, he was exerting a most unholy and unhappy influence. That influence was great, and dreadful, and growing. By it the wicked were encouraged in their evil ways, the enquiring disheartened, the righteous distressed. It enabled many to shake off serious impressions and walk with unconcern in the broad way to death. His life may have been moral, his temper amiable, his external deportment such as to be approved by all, and there may have been nothing to distinguish him from the humble Christian but this,—practically he rejected the Savior and lived in disregard of the religion of Jesus,—yet his influence, in a religious aspect, was exceedingly dangerous and disastrous. Its tendency was to elevate morality above religion in the estimation of those around him, or to induce the belief that morality without religion is sufficient for this world and the next. But this accords not with the teachings of the Scripture. Morality is good, but it is not sufficient. Religion is necessary. Without an interest in Jesus Christ there is no salvation. And while one refuses to seek an interest in him, the legitimate influence of his example, on his family and friends, is to prevent them from attending to the concerns of their souls.—From him a flood of evil emanates, daily and hourly increasing in magnitude as it flows onward to eternity. But let him be converted to God, and this flood is stayed—the fountain is dried up, and the stream ceases to flow.

Hence, in the conversion of a soul, good is done. The very fact of his turning to the Lord must have an impression on the minds of his associates. It will render them less confident in their evil courses, quicken their consciences, and lead them to inquire whether all is well. And then his subsequent life, being to them a constant reproof, may be the means of awakening them to their danger and drawing them to Christ. The influence on his family can be but salutary. Those of them who do love the Savior will be filled with new courage; and those who are yet in their sins, when they see the change, must confess the power of grace, the excellency of religion, and they may become also followers of the Lamb. The neighborhood will be benefitted by the change; the church and the world will feel its happy influence: a new impulse will be given to the prayers and efforts of the faithful: the careless will become thoughtful and the vicious be restrained. Even the ends of the world may feel the happy effects of a single conversion. Good may result from it which man can not estimate. A stream of holy results and influences may begin to flow, which shall widen, and deepen, and extend while time endures, nor cease to flow when time is swallowed up in eternity.

Now to do good, as well as to be good, is the Christian's aim. He knows it is impossible to be good and yet make no efforts to do good. Persevering attempts to do good is the evidence which the Christian gives to the world that he is good, for by their fruits ye shall know them. Matt. vii. 20. And they who labor to do good, must rejoice when good is done. It is the Christian's nature, therefore, to rejoice when souls are converted. The brethren whom Paul and Barnabas addressed, had great joy when they heard of the conversion of the Gentiles; and so have all genuine Christians now when made acquainted with the conquests of the cross of Christ. They rejoice in the good already done and in the still greater good which may result from these instances of redeeming grace.

We have here, then, a test of Christian character and feeling. We have seen how real Christians feel in view of a given event—the conversion of souls; they rejoice. And they feel thus because they possess a certain character—a christian character; they rejoice because they are Christians—real Christians. Do we possess this character and these feelings? Do we possess that character or disposition which occasions us to feel emotions of joy when we hear of the conversion of souls? Do such tidings cause us great joy? How can we be Christians ourselves, if it gives us no joy to see others becoming so? Examine yourselves. Be not deceived.

Again: if the conversion of souls is a cause of joy, then to see no converts must occasion sorrow and grief. This is obvious. Read Ps. cxix. 136, Rom. ix. 1—3, and x. 1. As the Christian has joys which the world know not of, so has he sorrows. And not the least of these is that which he feels in contemplating a world lying in wickedness—a world sporting with death and trifling with eternal realities. Let not the sinner say religion makes us melancholy. It is the thought that he is destitute of it which fills us with grief; and when we see none turning their attention to the one thing needful—amid the solemn providencess occurring around us—who shall forbid us to weep?

Again: if real Christians rejoice in the conversion of souls, then they should labor and pray for their conversion. We see men every where pursuing that which they think will add to their happiness. The Christian is not forbidden to do the same. But his happiness runs in a different channel from that of the world. His chief happiness flows from a divine source.—And among the ingredients of which it is composed, not the least is the joy over repenting sinners. For this, then, he should labor. If he has any desire for this joy—and if he has not, he may as well renounce his hopes of heaven—let him engage in earnest efforts to bring his fellow creatures to the Savior of sinners. This is his duty and his privilege. He is not to be all the day idle, but to go into the vineyard of Christ and work. There is enough to do. The bible is to be distributed, tracts circulated, temperance promoted, the ignorant taught, children gathered into Sabbath schools, the careless warned, and the gospel preached to every creature. And there must be prayer as well as effort. God works by means: but means without his blessing can accomplish nothing. You may pile up motives to the skies, and bring them to bear with mountain weight upon the heart, and yet, without the Spirit nothing can be accomplished. Motives can not convert the soul: means and efforts can not convert it; it is the work of the Spirit; and after you have presented motives, and used means, and made efforts, you will utterly fail unless you have the Spirit to second your efforts and render means efficient, and motives effectual, and renew the heart. And the Spirit is given in answer to prayer. Ask, that you may receive. Pray as well as labor, that you may have the joy of welcoming returning sinners to the Savior.—Pray with the Psalmist, Wilt thou not revive us again, that thy people may rejoice in thee? Shew us thy mercy, O Lord, and grant us thy salvation. Ps. lxxxv. 6, 7.

Finally: this subject also affords an inducement for sinners to become reconciled to God. There is joy on earth over repenting sinners; and so there is in heaven among the angels of God. Luke xv. 10.—And their impenitence is a cause of grief. Let them now pray for mercy and eternal life—now repent and believe in Jesus Christ—now be converted to God—that angels may carry the glad news to heaven and strike their golden harps with new rapture, and, as the tidings are spread abroad among the churches, they may cause great joy unto all the brethren. W. J. M.

The Human Voice.—God has made the whole earth vocal with sweet sounds. The untraveled forest echoes the notes of the wild bird, and the habitations of man are made glad by the song of the feathered minstrel. But, above all, the human voice, that combines the highest charm of sweet sounds with the inspiration of thought, is given for no ordinary purpose or earthly pleasure. In its whisper of affection, how grateful! In its expression of religious devotion, how exalted! For its solace in trouble, how dear! For its participation in joy, how unspeakable!

Our Earthly State.—Every man hath a heaven and a hell. Earth is the wicked man's heaven; and his hell is to come.—But the godly have their hell upon earth, where they are vexed by afflictions and temptations; and their heaven is above, in endless happiness. If, then, it be ill with me on earth, it is well my torment is so short, and so easy. I will not be so covetous as to hope for two heavens.

A smooth sea never made a skilful mariner. Neither do uninterrupted prosperity and success qualify man for usefulness and happiness. The storms of adversity, like the storms of the ocean, rouse the faculties, and excite the invention, prudence, skill, and fortitude of the voyager.

The happiness of man consists in the enjoyment of God.

THOMAS E. BABCOCK is a traveling agent for this paper.

"Be not conformed to this World."

The line of distinction between the requirements of the gospel and the customs of the world is most plain. The former is simply to love God with all the heart, and the neighbor as himself. The latter induces to supreme selfishness. So much as one is disposed to love God, by so much will his selfishness diminish, and vice versa. The indulgence, therefore, of either of these grand characteristics determines the true character of the individual, whether he is on the Lord's side, or otherwise. Names and professions do but little toward establishing character. For a time they may cloak the true character from observation; but it will soon develope itself. A conformity to the world is,

1. Ungrateful. Christians have been purchased by an inestimable price. The blood of the Son of God, so freely shed on Calvary, is the purchase price of their souls, and the indwelling of the Holy Spirit is the evidence of the transfer of the heart and affections to God. The qualifications for discipleship, are obedience to the divine law, and a non-conformity to the world. Christians, by virtue of their union with God, have joys and hopes far above those of sinners. They are heirs of the kingdom, and are infinitely rich and happy, lacking nothing or wanting more, possessed of holy and virtuous affections, and freed from the bondage of sin. Hence, it would be the basest ingratitude for a professed disciple of Christ to conform to the world. In doing it he casts contempt on the Lord Jesus Christ, and testifies falsely relative to our holy religion. He both deprives himself of the joys of the kingdom, and instrumentally shuts others out that would enter in.

The atonement made by the Lord Jesus Christ was designed for all men, so far as the news of it should be published; thereby laying all men who hear the gospel under obligations to conform to the law of God, and not to the world. Every unregenerate sinner is as much bound to love and serve God as the Christian is, and in conforming to the world he exhibits the vilest ingratitude to him who has purchased his soul.

2. Dangerous. A conformity to the world is rebellion against God, and all who do thus will be treated as rebels. He that is not on the Lord's side is against him. The vials of God's wrath shall at last be poured out upon all his enemies, as it is written, "Bring here mine enemies that would not have me rule over them, and slay them at my feet."

A conformity to the world exposes ourselves to all the sufferings caused by sin in this life and that which is to come. 'There is no peace to the wicked, saith my God.'—No peace to him in time, nor in eternity.—How foolish to barter the interests of the soul—the joys of heaven—and secure the pains of hell, for a few minutes conformity to the world!

We have several communications on hand which must be deferred till next week, to make room for important news. We were not able last week to get the particulars of the destruction of the Steam-Boat Erie till our paper had gone to press. We give it this week for the information of some of our readers who would not otherwise get it.

The President's Veto of the Fiscal Bank of the U. S. is also considered an important document, and our readers will doubtless wish to see it. We give it a place for their benefit.

A Day of Anguish at Syracuse!

We are indebted to Mr. Burdick, of this office, for the following melancholy intelligence from Syracuse, which we receive two days in "advance of the mail." Funeral services were attended at the different churches on Sunday by thousands—estimated by some at from fifteen to twenty thousand. Fire Companies were in attendance from all along the valley of the Mohawk, and from Fulton, Oswego, and Auburn, all dressed in uniform, paying their last tribute of respect to departed worth. Finally, Syracuse seemed clad in habiliments of the deepest mourning and distress; and well she might, for she had entombed many of her noblest sons—her most enterprizing and valued citizens, her rarest beacons of future greatness!

It will be noted that five persons amongst the wounded had died since the following Extra was issued, and before Mr. B. left; and a great number more were not expected to survive.

SYRACUSE, Saturday Morning, August 21.

SYRACUSE IN MOURNING.

FIRE.—EXPLOSION OF GUNPOWDER—DREADFUL LOSS OF LIFE!

Our village was visited last night with one of the most dreadful scenes which the annals of our State can reveal. About half past 9 o'clock the alarm of fire was given, which proved to be in the Carpenter's Shop of E. T. Hayden, or C. Goings, on the Oswego Canal. Our citizens repaired to the spot, together with our three fire engine companies. In the course of half an hour an explosion of gun powder took place which, most melancholy to relate, sent instantaneously some THIRTY of our fellow-citizens into another world! We have no time to describe the horrible scene, immediately after the explosion. The building which was on fire, was blown into atoms, and the buildings east and west were shattered by the concussion and flying timbers. About 30 firemen, and others near the fire, were instantly killed, being thrown in all directions—into the canal, four or five entirely across the canal—and among them some of our most respectable citizens, and, we are sorry to add, including about a half dozen of our most promising Young Men. The groans of the dying, the frantic screams of wives and children, brothers and sisters, who had lost their dearest earthly friends—the killed and wounded carried from the scene to their homes—altogether, presented a sight to melt the strongest heart.

Our whole village is in mourning and distress. The stores this morning still remain closed. Such scenes as we have witnessed within the last 12 hours, may Heaven forbid our ever seeing again.

The following list of killed and wounded, is as near correct as we are able to form it, amidst the confusion. Probably one-fourth or one-third of those wounded will yet die.

H. T. Gibson, foreman of engine number 3, (formerly keeper of a hotel in Albany, and later of the Syracuse House,) had his head almost blown off and his body was found in the canal. He was one of our principal business men, and has left a distracted wife and children.

E H. Hough, belonging to the same company, was a druggist, and one of the most promising young men of the village, and exemplary in every particular.

John Durnford, Jr., (son of Justice Durnford,) was a young lawyer of flattering prospects, and was endowed with uncommon talents.

Horatio N. Cheney, was the Canal Weighmaster, and has left a wife, (daughter of Col. Levi Chapman, Canal Collector, Albany,) and three children; and his brother, L. L. Cheney, was deputy Weigh-master.

Isaac Stanton, stone-cutter, was awfully mutilated, and has left a family.

Z. Dwight, Livery Stable keeper, survived but a few moments after the accident.

Among the wounded—Stephen W. Cadwell, Dr. Foran, Jerry Stevens, Jonathan Baldwin, E. George, Geo. B. Walter, D. C. LeRoy, (citizens generally well known,) although some of them very badly mutilated, are expected to survive.

We understand windows were broken by the explosion, as far as Salina. The noise was very plainly heard at De Witt, four miles east. The number of kegs of powder, which exploded, were about 25.

When we are brought to the reflection, that all this distress has been brought upon us by the hand of an incendiary—a devil in human shape—we are disgusted and sick at heart for poor human nature.

The alarm that powder was in the building, was given, but with such a want of energy as to border on criminality. Many supposed, also, that it was the mere trick of the incendiary.

KILLED.—E. H. Hough, Z. Dwight, John Durnford, Jr., Joseph Kohlhamer, H. N. Cheney, Loran L. Cheney, H. Goings, R. Maynard, I. Stanton, —— Baker, (boy,) H. T. Gibson, M. Smelt, Noah Hoyt, J. M. Barker, C. A. Moffett, W. B. Cloyce, Nelson Conklin, Capt. Burdick, of Clay, Messrs. Lake, Betts, Jones, Gillson, Miller.

WOUNDED.—Dr. Foran, J. B. Phelps, D. C. LeRoy, Jerry Stevens, H. S. Sloan, Jonathan Baldwin, John Showans, Geo. Benedict, S. W. Cadwell, S. Hurst, J. D. Lawson, S. Packwood, Elisha George, J. Goodrich, J. Crowe, Geo. B. Walter, L. Mulwin, L. Gifford, R. Thorn, John Conklin, Mr. Appleton, Miss. Elliston, Henry Hodge, L. Bement, Lewis Smith, Thomas H. Ostrander, P. Lowe, W. Conklin, Myers, Austin, (boy,) D. Brown, Shaw Collins, Thomas Poe, Wm. Lilly, (boy,) an Irishman, John Beers, (boy,) Lewis Corbin, (badly,) Phillip Holkins.

P. S.—Since the above was placed in type, we have been informed that at a meeting of the citizens, this morning, it was recommended that FUNERAL SERVICES be held at the several Churches, to-morrow, (Sunday,) to commence at the usual hour of morning service; and that the remains of the killed be conveyed to such houses of public worship as their friends may select.

We are requested to give notice that the Trustees of the village have given permission to inter the dead in the new Cemetery under the direction of the sexton.

WASHINGTON CORRESPONDENCE.

Wednesday, August 4.

In the Senate, the Fortification Bill was under consideration.

The amendment appropriating $50,000 for Forth Smith, Arkansas, was rejected.

The amendment of Mr. Allen, to appropriate one hundred thousand dollars for the construction and armament of armed steamers, or other vessels on the North-Western Lakes, such as the President may deem proper, and may be compatible with the provisions of the treaty with Great Britain, was adopted: Yeas 22, Nays 17.

The amendment offered by Mr. Porter was adopted, appropriating $50,000 for the defensive works at Detroit: Yeas 22; Nays 17.

Mr. Tallmadge offered an amendment, appropriating $60,000 for defensive works at or near Buffalo, which was rejected: Yeas 18; Nays 21.

Mr. Henderson moved to increase the appropriation for the defense of New Orleans from fifty to one hundred and fifty thousand dollars, which was rejected:—Yeas 4; Nays 33.

A motion for reconsideration of the vote on the amendment appropriating for armed steamers, failed: Yeas 22; Nays 28.

In the House of Representatives, the resolution of Mr. Morgan to suspend debate in Committee, on the Fiscal Bank Bill, on Friday next, at 12 o'clock, was taken up. Mr. M. modified it, extending the time to Tuesday, and it was rejected.

Mr. Sergeant then introduced the original resolution, which was adopted: Yeas 104; Nays 97.

The debate on the Bank Bill will cease Friday, and it no doubt will be passed this week.

The Fiscal Bank Bill was again taken up in Committee of the Whole, Mr. J. C. Clark in the Chair.

Mr. Botts made an able speech in its support; it was also defended by Messrs. Proffit, Milton Brown, of Tenn., and Gamble, and opposed by Mr. A. Brown, of Tennessee.

Thursday, August 5.

In the Senate to-day, Mr. Benton presented the proceedings and resolutions of a large and respectable portion—as he said—of the citizens of Fauquier Co., Va., declaiming against the Extra Session, as needless; against a National Bank, as unconstitutional; that it had not been at issue before the people at the late election, and that if chartered, it would be their duty to wage unceasing and deadly war against it till repealed; that Congress has full power to repeal it; also, against distribution of the proceeds of public lands; against an increase of the Tariff, and a National Debt; and returning their thanks to the Democratic Members of Congress for their patriotic exertions in the service of their Country during the present Session of Congress.

Mr. Benton expressed his entire concurrence in these views, and moved the printing of the proceedings, &c.

Mr. Archer stated that the whole number at that meeting was only thirty three! and that its three most conspicuous members entirely dissented from the scope of the resolutions, and withdrew from the meeting on this account. This was the memorial of the "large and respectable" meeting presented to the Senate, and designed to go forth to the community as the deliberate opinion of the people of Virginia on the very gravest question that was ever presented to the American people. With this explanation, he was willing it should be presented to the Senate and the people.

Mr. Miller eloquently and briefly refuted the assertion, that the Bank question was not before the people at the late election. It had been expressly, and was decided in the affirmative, in a contest, which was between measures, and not men.

Mr. White opposed its printing; and Mr. Clay moved to lay the motion to print on the table. This was carried. Yeas 21; Nays 20.

Mr. Benton then moved to take it up, and (with much excitement of tone and manner,) gave notice to the Senate, that he would move this proposition every morning during the session, till his object was accomplished. He was proceeding to speak of the subject of the resolutions, when

Mr. Clay called the Senator to order—

Mr. Benton. Take down the words.—(The point of order.)

Mr. Clay said the Senator had no right to discuss the merits of the subject, on a motion to take up or lay on the table; and called the Senator to order.

Mr. Benton. Take down the words!—Take down the words!

A long and unusually excited debate on points of order here ensued, in which much warmth was displayed by various members, and an appeal was taken from the decision of the President, which, it was moved to lay on the table; &c. &c. The further progress of which, was arrested by Mr. Tallmadge, who, some fifteen or twenty minutes after the time, suggested to the President, that the morning hour had elapsed.

The Senate then proceeded to unfinished business.

The bill to extend for ten years, the charter of the Mechanic's Relief Society of Alexandria, was on motion of Mr. King taken up and passed.

The bill to revive the charters of the banks of the District of Columbia, was passed by Yeas 29; Nays 15.

The Fortification Bill was then taken up, and after brief remarks by various members, passed—Yeas 45; Nays 4.

The Navy Pension Bill was taken up in committee of the whole, and occupied the attention of the Senate the remainder of the day. Several amendments were offered, which were accompanied with much debate. Without finishing the bill, the Senate adjourned.

In the House of Representatives; yesterday, a communication having been received from the Treasury Department, containing a remonstrance of the French Minister, against an increase of so much of the tariff as relates to France; this morning, Mr. Adams offered a resolution inquiring of the President the right of the Fr. Minister to petition to their House.

Mr. Adams made some remarks, which were listened to with great interest, respecting the unusual occurrence of the petitioning of a foreign minister, relative to our system of duties.

The resolution was then laid on the table, by a vote of 99 to 79.

The Fiscal Bank Bill was again taken up in Committee of the Whole—the resolution having been adopted to stop debate in Committee—Friday, at 12 o'clock, and was discussed during the day by Messrs. Pope and Marshall of Ky., Wise, Bidlack, Dean of Ohio, Thompson of Ia., and others, in an interesting and important manner.

Mr. Marshall gave notice that he should move to strike out Mr. Clay's amendment, giving the States an opportunity to assent or dissent with regard to the establishment of branches, within their limits, and to insert a provision giving Congress the free and unqualified power, independently of the assent of the States, to establish branches.

He contended that the right of Congress was sovereign, general, and entirely independent of the States—that this provision of the bill was novel, and as absurd, as to pass a tariff bill with a provision that its binding effect in the several States was to depend on the assent of those States, given at the first Session of their Legislatures thus far. He went for a whole, and United States Bank, and not one whose efficiency depended on the wills of the States.

Mr. Wise entirely concurred in these views.

The House adjourned at 10 1-2 o'clock, P. M.

Friday, Aug. 6.

In Senate the Navy Pension Bill came up, and a motion by Mr. Williams to repeal the act of 1837 was negatived: Yeas 19; Nays 28.

Mr. Calhoun now moved to amend so that no new pensioners should be admitted under that law. Rejected: Yeas 20; Nays 21. On motion of Mr. Buchanan, the bill was so amended as to continue the present law till the close of next Session. In this shape the bill was engrossed for a third reading

The bill from the House to Distribute the Proceeds of the Public Lands was now taken up, and Mr. O. H. Smith, of Ind., entered into a lucid exposition of its features and principles, and a powerful argument in favor of its passage. When he had concluded, no one being ready to prosecute the discussion, the Senate went into Executive Session.

In the House, the Fiscal Bank bill was taken up at an early hour, and Mr. Roosevelt, of N. Y., made a speech against its passage. When Mr. R's hour had expired. Mr. King, of Geo., spoke an hour on the other side. When he had concluded, there were but six minutes to 12, when the debate must close, and Mr. W. Cost Johnson of Md. took the floor. [Mr. Dawson of Ga. across—"Now, Johnson, give them a specimen of the power of concentration."] Mr. J. briefly summed up the argument on which rests the Constitutionality of a Bank, and then passed to the necessity for such an institution, which he considered evident and urgent. If he had framed the Charter, he would have made it different from this. He preferred a Bank dealing in Exchanges, with Branches of Circulation only, and thought such a Bank would make a good Currency and equalize Exchanges. But as it was, he would cheerfully vote for the bill as it came from the Senate. Having finished his speech in three minutes, he would cheerfully hand over the two remaining minutes to any one who chose to follow him.

Nobody rising, and the hour of 12 having arrived, the Committee of the Whole proceeded to vote on "all the amendments pending, or which may be offered," prior to reporting the bill.

The first question was on the motion of Mr. Dean of Ohio, to strike out the enacting clause: Yeas 87; Noes 136.

A great number of amendments, proposing a reduction of the capital, change of location, &c. &c., were severally offered and rejected. Mr. Adam's amendment to strike out the compromise section was defeated by 105 to 43. Every proposition of amendment having been successively voted down, the Committee rose and reported the bill to the House precisely as it came from the Senate.

The question being now on ordering the bill to a third reading, Mr. Arnold of Tenn., (for the first time in his life, as he observed.) moved the Previous Question. Seconded, and the Main Question ordered. The bill was then ordered to a third reading: Yeas 129; Nays 97.

The bill having been read a third time by its table, Mr. Fillmore again moved the Previous Question. Seconded, and the Main Question ordered.

The question "Shall this bill pass?" was then put and decided in the affirmative, by Yeas and Nays as follows: Yeas 128; Nays 97.

So the bill having been passed, Mr. Boardman of Ct. moved a reconsideration, which, (as he intended,) was promptly voted down without a division. The House then adjourned.

Saturday, August 7.

The Senate have to-day been occupied with the discussion of the points of order connected with the resolutions in favor of the "repeal" and the unconstitutionality of a Bank, which were presented by Mr. Benton, Thursday, and the questions of order connected with which, occupied the attention of the Senate during the morning hour, Thursday and Friday, and this entire day.

The case is substantially this: Mr. Benton, on presenting the papers, moved their printing. Mr. Clay and others opposed it, and he moved to lay the motion to print, on the table, which was carried. The President decided that the papers were laid on the table with the motion to print. Mr. Benton immediately moved to take up the motion to print, and was discussing its propriety, when he was called to order by Mr. Clay. Mr. Benton then appealed from the decision of the Chair, that the papers were laid on the table with the motion to print. Mr. Clay motioned to lay this appeal on the table. Mr. Calhoun raised the point of order that this appeal could not be laid on the table. The President gave it as his opinion that it could. Here the matter stood this morning—on the point of order by Mr. Calhoun.

Mr. Clay contended that an appeal from the decision of the Chair could be laid on the table; it was a common practice of the House of Representatives. He referred to their journal, and showed one among the many instances of it. He preferred the rules of the House to rules of Parliament, to British rules. It was a glorious House—a Whig House of Representatives, that by its action had solved the problem, whether a Whig House could, or could not, do the work of the people. They had shown that they could do it, and had done it, in a noble, manly and patriotic manner: and they had also shown that 242 Members could do business better than 52 did.—Whenever he felt any ill humors coming over him, he was going into the House of Representatives, and one breath of the pure, patriotic air in that Hall would restore him. The House was the best source of parliamentary law in this country.

A debate arose of great length, in which, (among others,) Messrs. Evans, Clay, of Ky., and Prentiss, contended that an appeal could not be laid on the table; and Messrs. Calhoun, Linn, Bayard, Walker, King, Woodbury and Allen opposed this view. Mr. Huntington, in the midst of this, moved to proceed to the orders of the day, the morning hour having expired.—This was objected to, and was insisted that before any thing else could be taken up, the question on the appeal being a privileged question, must first be decided. Mr. Huntington raised a point of order on this, and insisted on the decision whether the Senate should proceed to other business. He, however, at the request of several members, withdrew.

Here was presented a scene of complicated confusion and disorder, appeals being piled on appeals, and no two members having the same understanding of the immediate question before them. It was generally concluded best to withdraw or annul all the proceedings, and commence anew on the vexing resolutions. But the difficulty arose of correcting the Journal so as to appear in a true light. Various members gave their views—all differing—how they should extricate themselves from the difficulty. They did not succeed in annulling or "expunging" this last point of order, and a vote of the Senate was taken, and decided that an appeal from the decision of the Chair could not be laid on the table, by Yeas 9, Nays 30. The Journal was at last corrected; and the previous points of order, &c., were withdrawn, back to that of Mr. Clay, that Mr. Benton could not discuss the motion to take up from the table. This point was sustained: Yeas 25; Nays 18.

Thus they succeeded in regaining the point on which they stood Thursday when the subject was first taken up. It was concluded they now had glory enough for one day; and at three o'clock a motion was made to adjourn. This was suspended for a moment, and the Navy Pension Bill read a third time and passed.

The Fiscal Bank Bill was also received from the House, and signed by the President of the Senate.

The House of Representatives, although consummating so glorious an achievement, to-day exhibited some of the imperfections of humanity, and were involved in one of their usual tempests of dis-"order," not, however, as wild and perplexing as that of the Senate.

After the presentation of a few memorials, a motion was made to take up the Bankrupt bill. This, after much delay in taking the Yeas and Nays on various incidental questions, &c., was taken up in Committee of the Whole, but without debate was laid down again, and the Committee rose for want of a quorum.

They then succeeded to take up the Bill to repeal the Sub-Treasury, which, after short debate, was taken into the House, and the Committee discharged from its consideration by a majority of one. It was debated in the House by Messrs. Mason, of Md., Pearce, Gordon and Shields, of Ala. The House then adjourned.

The question will probably be taken on it Monday, or Tuesday. We are waiting here with an anxious interest, which also pervades the whole country, for the action of the President on the Bank Bill, and various conjures are rife as to its fate. If it becomes a law, it is generally supposed Congress will adjourn in the course of two weeks.

Monday, August 9.

In the Senate, to-day, the resolution submitted some days since by Mr. Clay of Ala., calling on the Secretary of the Treasury for the number of removals and appointments of clerks by the present Commissions of the General Land Office, with the reasons therefor, and the salaries paid, was taken up and debated some time beyond the expiration of the morning hour.

Messrs. Clay, of Ala., Linn, Benton, King and Buchanan advocated the resolution, and entered into the general subject of removals from office by the present Administration, as made inconsistently with their professions. The case of Diplomatic Agents was referred to, and proscription charged there.

Mr. Preston in his usually eloquent and able manner refuted this charge, and showed that but two appointments of Diplomatic Agents had been made, and one of which, at Chili, was on account of a vacancy. No change of administration had ever taken place, when the changes in the diplomatic corps were not double and triple. He was not opposed to this information. The Whig party would carry out the promises against proscription they had made to the people.—When they were found prying into the opinions of officers, ascertaining their qualifications as voters, turning out those who had no votes, or who were opposed to them, and appointing in their places their political friends—when they exercised half the proscription they had convicted the late administration of, they would be found out, and, he hoped, condemned by the people, as the late Administration had been.

Mr. Smith, of Ia., White and others, opposed the resolution, not as adverse to obtaining the information, but doubtful of the propriety of calling on Heads of Bureaus for information on which no legislation could be founded.

The resolution was put over till to-morrow.

The Distribution and Pre-emption Bill was taken up, as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. Walker offered an amendment providing for the relinquishment of the two-per-cent. to Mississippi of the sales of the public lands in her borders, to be applied to the construction of a rail road.

This was advocated by Messrs. Walker and Clay of Ala., and opposed by Messrs. Evans, White, Smith of Ia., and then adopted: Yeas 22; Nays 21.

Mr. Clay of Ala. offered an amendment for the relinquishment of the same fund to Alabama. This was rejected: Yeas 20; Nays 22.

Mr. Calhoun moved a provision that nothing contained in the bill should be construed into debt to the States, or to prevent the repeal of the act whenever required by the public interest.

This being advocated by Messrs. Calhoun and Allen, and opposed by Messrs. Smith of Ia., Woodbridge and Phelps, was rejected: Yeas 21; Nays 25.

Mr. McRoberts moved to add the Territories of Wiskonsin, Iowa and Florida to the bill, to be included in the distribution.

This was advocated by Messrs. McRoberts, Sevier, Wright and Allen, and opposed by Messrs. Huntington, Clay Smith of Ia., and Woodbridge, and then rejected: Yeas 20; Nays 26.

The Senate adjourned after a session of nearly 7 hours.

In the House Mr. J. W. [illegible] [illegible] Fauquier Co. Va. (the same as presented by Mr. Benton in the Senate) against a Bank, and declaring for its repeal and unconstitutionality, &c. He expressed his entire concurrence in the resolutions, and moved that they be laid on the table and printed.

Mr. Powell, representative from that county, stated what was stated in the Senate, that but thirty-three were present at the meeting, three, the most conspicuous of whom, withdrew on account of their dissent from the resolutions.

The resolutions were laid on the table, and the House refused their printing by a vote of 107 to 76.

On motion of Mr. C. Brown, a resolution of inquiry relative to duties on foreign coal was adopted.

Mr. Irvin introduced a bill providing for the payment for the sites of Marine Hospitals in the Western States, which was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

On motion of Mr. Giddings a resolution was passed, calling for information as to the causes and expenses of the Seminole War.

Mr. Underwood, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, reported a bill to amend the charter of the City of Georgetown.

Mr. Dawson, Chairman of the Military Committee, reported a bill extending the law of 1836, authorising the employment of troops in Florida.

Mr. Thompson, of Ia., from the Committee on the District of Columbia, presented the report accompanying the bills to provide for the paving of Pennsylvania Avenue of this city, and the repair of the Potomac Bridge, which was ordered to be printed, and with the above bills referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Petitions for a Bankrupt Law were presented by Messrs. Underwood, Smith of Ct., and Roosevelt.

The bill for the Repeal of the Sub-Treasury was taken up, and advocated by Messrs. Hunt and Merriwether, and opposed by Messrs. Pickens and Steenrod.

The bill was passed: Yeas 134; Nays 87.

The notorious J. D. Stevenson of your city is here, engaged, it is believed, in a puny effort to defeat the passage of a Bankrupt Bill.

Messrs. Blatchford, Bowen, Burrows, A. Hamilton and a number of others of your citizens are here.

The city is full of tittle-tattle about the anticipated Veto. Bets have been running high. The Cabinet met the President to-day upon the subject, and it is said that he had requested their opinions in writing. In case of a Veto it is conjectured that only a portion, if any, of the Cabinet will resign. It is understood that President Tyler still believes on his conscience a National Bank unconstitutional, and that the so-called "compromise amendment" has made the bill still more objectionable. He is willing to adopt a Fiscal Agent in the District of Columbia, to receive and disburse the Government funds, to furnish a National Currency, and to equalize Exchanges. Such an Institution can have Agencies in the States where it pleases. He does not think it necessary to have a National Bank of discount. The Local Banks can supply local loans. Is it not better to unite upon some such system as this than to bite our noses off to spite our faces?

Tuesday, August 10.

In Senate, to-day, Mr. Smith of Ia. presented a petition for the improvement of the Ohio river.

Mr. Tallmadge presented a memorial of citizens of New York, asking for an imposition of duty on gold and silver ware, both of which were laid on the table.

The bill for the repeal of the Sub-Treasury was returned to the Senate with amendments, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

The resolution reported by Mr. Huntington from the Committee on Commerce, for the transfer of the light-boat at Sandy Hook to Bartlett's reef in Long Island Sound, and for the transfer of that at Bartlett's reef to Execution rocks in Long Island Sound, was taken up, and adopted.

Mr. Benton again moved to take up the motion to print the famous repeal resolutions of the meeting in Fauquier county, Virginia. The motion was carried. The question on their printing was taken, and lost: Yeas 22; Nays 22.

The Distribution and Pre-emption Bill was then taken up and discussed with reference to amendments during the day.

Mr. Clay, of Ala., moved to insert a provision to prevent the bill taking effect till the complete payment of the public debt, now or hereafter existing.

This was debated at length, and with interest, by Messrs. Clay, of Ala., Calhoun, King, Woodbury, Wright and Buchanan in support, and by Messrs. Smith, of Ia., Clay, of Ky., and Rives in opposition, which latter gentleman declared he should vote for the bill, if it were demonstrated that the accruing revenue was adequate to the wants of government without the land fund, of which he was somewhat in doubt; if it were not, he should vote against the bill.

The amendment was rejected: Yeas 19; Nays 27.

Mr. Clay, of Ala., moved to insert in the 2d section, where the items are enumerated, which are to be deducted from the fund prior to the distribution, "and such sums as may be paid to any Indian tribe for the purchase of any portion of the public lands."

This was rejected: Yeas 21; Nays 26.

Mr. McRoberts moved to strike out, in the 10th section, the provision that the lands shall not be liable to pre-emption prior to their survey.

This was rejected: Yeas 23; Nays 24.

Mr. Young moved to strike out the clause confining the benefits of Pre-emption to citizens of the United States, or those having filed their intention of becoming citizens, as required by the Pre-emption laws.

This was rejected: Yeas 22; Nays 25.

Several other amendments were rejected, and the Senate adjourned, after a session of nearly seven hours.

It is anticipated that the amendments will be completed, and the bill taken out of Committee to-morrow.

In the House of Representatives, the Bankrupt Bill was taken up in Committee of the Whole, (Mr. Tillinghast in the chair,) and debated during the day.

Mr. Barnard opened the defense of the bill in one of his usually sound and argumentative speeches, contending that the grinding and entirely useless oppression now arising from pecuniary misfortune had too long remained, in this age of light and civilization;—that the five hundred thousand bankrupts of this nation ought now to be released from it, and enjoying freedom, be permitted and induced to honourable exertions and industry for the support of themselves and their families, and the retrieval of their lost fortunes.

Messrs. Samson Mason, of Ohio, Nisbet, of Ga., and Roosevelt ably advocated the bill. Mr. R. expressed his intention of offering, at the proper time, an amendment to include banks within the bill. He should vote for the bill, however, whether this were adopted or not, and considered it a measure demanded by justice and humanity.

Mr. Gordon bitterly opposed the bill, contending that its effect would be looseness in pecuniary transactions—that it would be a cause of increase of failures and bankruptcies, and, by the release of insolvent debtors, would cause an entire loss of the millions of dollars which were now outstanding in debts throughout the country.

The House adjourned at half past 3 o'clock.

News of the Day.

VETO OF THE BANK BILL.

Washington, Monday, Aug. 16.

The President communicated to the Senate the following

MESSAGE

Of the President of the United States, returning, with his objections, the Bill to incorporate the Fiscal Bank of the United States. August 16, 1841.

To the Senate of the United States:

The bill entitled "An act to incorporate the subscribers to the Fiscal Bank of the United States," which originated in the Senate, has been considered by me, with a sincere desire to conform my action in regard to it, to that of the two Houses of Congress. By the Constitution it is made my duty either to approve the bill by signing it, or to return it with my objections to the House in which it originated. I can not conscientiously give it my approval, and I proceed to discharge the duty required of me by the Constitution—to give my reasons for disapproving.

The power of Congress to create a National Bank to operate per se over the Union, has been a question of dispute from the origin of our government. Men most justly and deservedly esteemed for their high intellectual endowments, their virtue and their patriotism, have, in regard to it, entertained different and conflicting opinions. Congresses have differed. The approval of one President has been followed by the disapproval of another. The People at different times have acquiesced in decisions both for and against. The country has been, and still is, deeply agitated by this unsettled question. It will suffice for me to say that my opinion has been uniformly proclaimed to be against the exercise of any such power by this Government. On all suitable occasions, during a period of twenty-five years, the opinion thus entertained has been unreservedly expressed. I declared it in the legislature of my native State. In the House of Representatives of the United States it has been openly vindicated by me.

In the Senate chamber, in the presence and hearing of many who are at this time members of that body, it has been affirmed and re-affirmed, in speeches and reports there made, and by votes there recorded. In popular assemblies I have unhesitatingly announced it; and the last public declaration which I made, and that but a short time before the late Presidential election, I referred to my previously expressed opinions as being those then entertained by me; with a full knowledge of the opinions thus entertained, and never conceded, I was elected by the people Vice President of the United States. By the occurrence of a contingency provided for by the Constitution, and arising under an impressive dispensation of Providence, I succeeded to the Presidential office. Before entering upon the duties of that office, I took an oath that I would "preserve, protect, and defend the Constitution of the United States."

Entertaining the opinions alluded to, and having taken this oath, the Senate and the country will see that I could not give my sanction to a measure of the character described, without surrendering all claim to the respect of honorable men—all confidence on the part of the people—all self-respect—all regard for moral and religious obligations; without an observance of which, no government can be prosperous, and no people can be happy. It would be to commit a crime which I would not wilfully commit to gain any earthly reward, and which would justly subject me to the ridicule and scorn of all virtuous men.

I deem it entirely unnecessary at this time to enter upon the reasons which have brought my mind to the convictions I feel and entertain on this subject. They have over and over again been repeated. If some of those who have preceded me in this high office, have entertained and avowed different opinions, I yield all confidence that their convictions were sincere. I claim only to have the same measure meted out to myself. Without going further into the argument, I will say that, in looking to the powers of this Government to collect, safely keep, and disburse the public revenue, and incidentally regulate the commerce and exchanges, I have not been able to satisfy myself that the establishment, by this Government, of a bank of discount, in the ordinary acceptation of that term, was a necessary means, or one demanded by propriety, to execute those powers. What can the local discounts of a bank have to do with the collecting, safe-keeping, and disbursing of the revenues?

So far as the mere discounting of paper is concerned, it is quite immaterial to this question, whether the discount is obtained at a State Bank or a U. S. Bank.

They are both equally local—both beginning and both ending in a local accommodation. What influence have local discounts, granted by any form of banks, in the regulating of the currency and the exchanges? Let the history of the late United States Bank aid us in answering this inquiry.

For several years after the establishment of that institution, it dealt almost exclusively in local discounts, and during that period the country was, for the most part disappointed in the consequences anticipated from its incorporation. A uniform currency was not provided, exchanges were not regulated, and little or nothing was added to the general circulation; and in 1820 its embarrassments had become so great that the Directors petitioned Congress to repeal that article of the Charter which made its notes receivable every where, in payment of public dues.

It had, up to that period, dealt but to a very small extent in exchanges, either foreign or domestic; and, as late as 1832, its operations in that line amounted to a little more than $7,000,000 per annum; a very rapid augmentation soon after occurred, and in 1833 its dealings in the exchanges amounted to upwards of $100,000,000, including the sales of its own drafts; and all these immense transactions were effected without the employment of extraordinary means. The currency of the country became sound, and the negotiations in the exchanges were carried on at the lowest possible rates.

The circulation was increased to more than $22,000,000 and the notes of the Bank were regarded as equal to specie all over the country: thus showing, most conclusively, that it was their capacity to deal in exchanges, and not in local discounts, which furnished these facilities and advantages. It may be remembered, too, that notwithstanding the immense transactions of the Bank, in the purchase of exchange, the losses were merely nominal; while in the time of discounts, the suspended debt was enormous, and found most disastrous to the Bank and the country. Its power of local discount has, in fact, proved to be a fruitful source of favoritism and corruption, alike destructive to the public morals and to the general weal.

The capital invested in banks of discount in the United States, created by the States, at this time exceeds $350,000,000; and if the discounting of local paper could have produced any beneficial effects, the United States ought to possess the soundest currency in the world, but the reverse is lamentably the fact.

Is the measure now under consideration of the objectionable character to which I have alluded? It is clearly so, unless by the 16th fundamental article of the 11th section it is made otherwise. That article is in the following words:

"The directors of the said corporation shall establish one competent office of discount and deposite in any State in which two thousand shares shall have been subscribed, or may be held, whenever, upon application of the Legislature of such State, Congress may, by law, require the same. And the said directors may also establish one or more competent offices of discount and deposite in any Territory or District of the United States, and in any State, with the assent of such State; and when established, the said office or offices shall be only withdrawn or removed by the said directors, prior to the expiration of this charter, with the previous assent of Congress.

"Provided, in respect to any state which shall not, at the first session of the Legislature thereof, held after the passage of this act, by resolution, or other usual legislative proceeding, unconditionally assent or dissent to the establishment of such office or offices within it, such assent of the said State shall be thereafter presumed; and provided, nevertheless, that whenever it shall become necessary and proper for carrying into execution any of the powers granted by the Constitution, to establish an office or offices in any of the States whatever, and the establishment thereof shall be directed by law, it shall be the duty of the said directors to establish such office or offices accordingly."

It will be seen by this clause that the directors are invested with the fullest power to establish a branch in any state which has yielded its assent, and having established such branch, it shall not afterward be withdrawn, except by order of Congress. Such assent is to be implied, and to have the force and sanction of an actually expressed assent "provided in respect to any State which shall not, at the first session of the Legislature held thereof after the passage of this act, by resolution or other usual legislative proceeding, unconditionally assent or dissent to the establishment of such office or offices within it, such assent of such State shall be presumed." The assent or dissent is to be expressed unconditionally at the first session of the Legislature, by some formal legislative act; and if not so expressed, its assent is to be implied, and the directors are therefore invested with power, at such time thereafter as they may please to establish branches, which can not afterwards be withdrawn, except by resolve of Congress—no matter what may be the cause which may operate with the Legislature, which either prevents it from speaking, or addresses itself to its wisdom to induce delay, its assent is to be implied—binding and inflexible.—It is the lawgiver of the master to the vassal, an unconditional answer is claimed forthwith, and delay, postponement, or incapacity to answer, produces an implied assent, which is ever after irrevocable.

Many of the State elections have already taken place, without any knowledge on the part of the people, that such a question was to come up. The representatives may desire a submission of the question to their constituents preparatory to final action upon it, but this high privilege is denied; whatever may be the motives and views entertained by the representatives of the people to induce delay, their assent is to be presumed, and is ever afterwards binding, unless their assent shall be unconditionally expressed at their first session after the passage of this bill into a law.

They may by formal resolution declare the question of assent or dissent to be undecided, and postponed, and yet, in opposition to their express declaration to the contrary, their assent is to be implied. Cases innumerable might be cited to manifest the irrationality of such an inference. Let one or two in addition suffice—the popular branch of the Legislature may express the dissent by a unanimous vote, and its resolution may be defeated by the vote of the Senate; and yet the assent is to be implied. Both branches of the legislature may concur in a resolution of decided dissent, and yet the Governor may exert the veto power conferred on him by the State Constitution, and their legislative action be defeated; and yet the assent of the Legislative authority is implied, and the Directors of this contemplated institution are authorised to establish a branch or branches in such State, whenever they may find it conducive to the interest of the stockholders to do so; and having once established it, they can, under no circumstances, withdraw it, except by an act of Congress.

The State may afterwards protest against any such unjust inference—but its authority is gone. Its assent is implied by its failure or inability to act at its first session, and its voice can never afterward be heard.—To inferences so violent, and, as they seem to me, irrational, I can not yield my consent. No court of justice would or could sanction them, without reversing all that is established in judicial proceedings, by introducing presumptions at variance to the fact, and inferences at the expense of reason. A State in a condition of duress would be presumed to speak as an individual manacled and imprisoned might be presumed to be in the enjoyment of freedom. Far better to say to the States boldly and frankly—Congress wills, and submission is demanded.

It may be said that the directors may not establish branches under such circumstances; but this is a question of power, and this bill invests them with full power to do so. If the Legislature of New York, or Pennsylvania, or any other State, should be found in such condition as I have supposed, could there be any security furnished against such a step on the part of the Directors? Nay, is it not fairly to be presumed that this proviso was introduced for the sole purpose of meeting the contingency referred to? What else should it have been introduced?

And I would submit to the Senate, whether it can be believed, that any State would be likely to sit quietly down, under such a state of things? In a great measure of public interest their patriotism may be successfully appealed to, but to infer their assent from circumstances at war with such inference, I can not but regard as calculated to excite a feeling at fatal enmity with the peace and harmony of the country. I must, therefore, regard this clause as asserting the power to be in Congress to establish offices of discount in a State, not only without its assent, but against its dissent; and so regarding it I cannot sanction it.

On general principles, the right in Congress to prescribe terms to any State, implies a superiority of power and control, deprives the transaction of all pretence to compact between them, and terminates, as we have seen, in the total abrogation of freedom and action on the part of the States. But fourth; the State may express, after the most solemn form of legislation, its dissent, which may from time to time thereafter be repeated, in full view of its own interest, which can never be separated from the wise and beneficent operation of this government; and yet Congress may, by virtue of the last proviso, overrule its law, and upon grounds which, to such State, will appear to rest on a constructive necessity and propriety, and nothing more.

I regard the bill as asserting for Congress the right to incorporate a United States Bank, with power and right to establish offices of discount and deposit in the several States of the Union, with or without their consent, a principle to which I have already heretofore been exposed, and which can never obtain my sanction. And waiving all other considerations growing out of its other provisions, I return it to the House in which it originated, with these, my objections to its approval.

APPALLING CALAMITY.

DESTRUCTION OF THE STEAMBOAT ERIE BY FIRE, AND THE LOSS OF ONE HUNDRED AND SEVENTY LIVES!

Little did we think yesterday in penning a brief paragraph in commendation of the Erie, that to-day we should be called upon to record the destruction of that boat together with a loss of life unequalled on our own or almost any other waters. The Erie left the dock at 10 minutes past 4, P. M., loaded with merchandise destined for Chicago, and as nearly as can be ascertained, about two hundred persons, including passengers and crew on board.

The boat had been thoroughly overhauled, and although the wind was blowing fresh, every thing promised a pleasant and prosperous voyage. Nothing occurred to mar this prospect till about 8 o'clock, when the boat was off Silver Creek, about eight miles from shore, and thirty-three miles from this city, when a slight explosion was heard, and immediately, instantaneously almost, the whole vessel was enveloped in flames. Capt. Titus, who was on the upper deck, at the time, rushed to the Ladies' Cabin to obtain the Life Preservers, of which there were from 90 to 100 on board, but so rapid had been the progress of the flames, he found it impossible to enter the cabin.

He returned to the upper deck, on his way giving orders to the engineer to stop the engine, the wind and the headway of the boat increasing the fierceness of the flames and driving them abaft. The Engineer replied that in consequence of the flames he could not reach the engine—The steersman was instantly directed to put the helm hard a starboard. The vessel swung slowly around, heading to the shore, and the boats—there were three on board—were then ordered to be lowered. Two of the boats were lowered, but in consequence of the heavy sea on, and the headway of the vessel, they both swamped as soon as they touched water.

We will not attempt to describe the awful and appaling condition of the passengers. Some were frantic with fear and horror, others plunged headlong madly into the water, others again seized upon any thing buoyant upon which they could lay hands upon. The small boat had been lowered. It was alongside of the wheel with three or four persons in it, when the Captain jumped in and the boat immediately dropped astern filled with water. A lady floated by with a life preserver on. She called for help. There was no safety in the boat. The Captain threw her the only oar in the boat. She caught the oar and was saved. It was Mrs. Lynde of Milwaukie, and she was the only lady that was saved.

In this condition, the boat a mass of fierce fire, and the passengers and crew endeavoring to save themselves by swimming or supporting themselves by whatever they could reach—they were found by the Clinton at about 10, P. M. The Clinton left here in the morning, but in consequence of the wind had put into Dunkirk. She laid there till nearly sunset, at which time she ran out, and had proceeded as far as Barcelona, when just at twilight, the fire of the Erie was discovered some 20 miles astern. The Clinton immediately put about and reached the burning wreck about 10.

It was a fearful sight. All the upper works of the Erie had been burned away. The engine was standing, but the hull was a mass of dull, red flame. The passengers and crew were floating around, screaming in their agony and shrieking for help. The boats of the Clinton were instantly lowered and manned, and every person that could be seen or heard was picked up, and every possible relief afforded. The Lady, a little steamboat lying at Dunkirk, went out of that harbor as soon as possible, after the discovery of the fire, and arrived soon after the Clinton. It was not thought by the survivors that she saved any.

By 1 A. M. all was still except the dead crackling of the fire. Not a solitary individual could be seen or heard of the wild waste of waters. A line was then made fast to the remains of the Erie's rudder, and an effort made to tow the hapless bulk ashore. About this time the Chautauque came up and lent her assistance.

The hull of the Erie was towed within about four miles of shore, when it sunk in eleven fathoms water. By this time it was daylight. The lines were cast off. The Clinton headed for this port which she reached about 6 o'clock. Of those who are saved, several are badly burned.

ORIGIN OF THE FIRE.—Among the passengers on board were six painters in the employ of Mr. W. G. Miller of this city, who were going to Erie to paint the steamboat Madison. They had with them demijohns filled with spirits of turpentine and varnish, which, unknown to Capt. Titus, were placed on the boiler deck directly over the boilers. One of the firemen, who was saved, says he had occasion to go on deck, and seeing the demijohns, removed them. They were replaced, by whom is not known. Immediately previous to the bursting forth of the flames, as several on board have assured us, a slight explosion was heard. The demijohns had probably burst with heat, and the inflammable contents, taking fire instantly, communicated to every part of the boat, which had been freshly varnished caught as if it had been gunpowder.

Not a paper nor an article of any kind was saved. Of course it is impossible to give a complete list of those on board. Of cabin passengers Capt. Titus thinks there were between 30 and 40 of whom 10 or 12 were ladies. In the steerage there were about 140 passengers, nearly all of whom were Swiss and German emigrants. They were mostly in families with the usual proportion of men, women and children. The heart bleeds at the thought.

It is a singular coincidence that the Erie was burned at almost identically the same spot where the Washington was burned in June, 1838. Capt. Brown, who commanded the Washington at that time, happened to be on board the Clinton, and was very active in saving the survivors of the Erie.

LATER.—By the Robt. Fulton, Capt. HART, we learn that two more persons were saved by the people of Dunkirk. One was Fred. Parmelee, the bar-keeper of the Erie, and an American, name unknown.

The Fulton also picked up two boats, one belonging to the Erie, and the other a sail-boat, belonging to Dunkirk, which was swamped on its way to the rescue. Those on board were picked up.

We annex a list of the lost and saved so far as we have been able to ascertain.

The Return.

BY MARY EMILY JACKSON.

'Think not because the harp hath ceased,
The soul of Song hath fled!'

My harp, give me my harp once more—
Again the pulse beats high,
And my heart is touched to its inmost depths,
With a glow of ecstacy.
For I breathe once more the mountain air,
And feast my wandering sight
On pleasant scenes of my Childhood's home,
With a sad yet sweet delight.

Then quick! bring quick the trembling harp,
Ere this wild dream be passed;
For the pallid cheek will its flight portray,
With the hectic following fast.
I feel, e'en now, a dimness come
O'er my enamored eyes,
And on my brow the darkest shade
Of transient being lies.

Yet I would sing to thee my home—
My mountain home of thee;
Though what but as the dead hast thou
Been for a time to me.
But for the loved of earlier days,
That throng me like a spell
I'd weave for thee a wreath of song,
And then again farewell.

A change hath come, and many a change
Since last I looked on thee;
And e'en the rocks and heaving hills
Are not the same to me;
For many a voice I loved to hear,
Hath ceased its kindly tone,
And the fairy forms that childhood traced,
Are with those moments flown.

Then bring the harp and let me touch
Each wild and trembling string;
My heart would pour its treasures forth,
A parting strain to sing.
They all are gone, the loved and true—
Death weaves a lasting spell,
I seek the unfeeling world again,
'Twill soon be o'er—FAREWELL.

DEATH IN THE SCHOOL-ROOM.

A FACT.

TING-A-LING-LING-LING!—went the little bell on the teacher's desk of a village school one morning, when the studies of the early part of the day were about half completed. It was well understood that this was a command for silence and attention; and when these had been obtained, the master spoke. He was a low thick-set man, and his name was LUGARE.

"Boys," said he, "I have had a complaint entered, that last night some of you were stealing fruit from Mr. Nichols' garden. I rather think I know the thief. Tim Barker, step up here, sir."

The one to whom he spoke came forward. He was a slight, fair-looking boy of about 14,—and his face had a laughing, good-humored expression, which even the charge now preferred against him, and the stern tone and threatening look of the teacher had not entirely dissipated. The countenance of the boy, however, was too unearthly fair for health; it had, notwithstanding its fleshy, cheerful look, a singular cast as if some inward disease, and that a fearful one, were seated within. As the stripling stood before that place of judgment,—that place so often made the scene of heartless and coarse brutality, of timid innocence confessed, helpless childhood outraged, and gentle feelings crushed—Lugare looked on him with a frown which plainly told that he felt in no very pleasant doom. Happily, a worthier and more philosophical system is proving to men that schools can be better governed than by lashes and tears and sighs. We are waxing toward that consummation when one of the old fashioned school-masters, with his cowhide, his heavy birch rod, and his many ingenious methods of child-torture, will be gazed upon as a scorned memento of an ignorant, cruel, and exploded doctrine.

"Were you by Mr. Nichols' garden fence last night?" said Lugare.

"Yes." answered the boy, "I was."

"Well, sir, I'm glad to find you so ready with your confession. And so you thought you could do a little robbing, and enjoy yourself in a manner you ought to be ashamed to own, without being punished, did you?"

"I have not been robbing," replied the boy quickly. His face was suffused, whether with resentment or fright, it was difficult to tell. "And I didn't do any thing last night that I'm ashamed to own."

"No impudence!" exclaimed the teacher, passionately, as he grasped a long and heavy ratan: "give me none of your sharp speeches, or I'll thrash you till you beg like a dog."

The youngster's face paled a little; his lip quivered, but he did not speak.

"And pray sir," continued Lugare, as the outward signs of wrath disappeared from his features; "what were you about the garden for? Perhaps you only received the plunder, and had an accomplice to do the more dangerous part of the job?"

"I went that way because it is on my way home. I was there again afterward to meet an acquaintance; and—and— But I did not go into the garden, nor take any thing away from it. I would not steal,—hardly to save myself from starving."

"You had better have stuck to that last evening. You were seen, Tim Barker, to come from under Mr. Nichols' garden fence, a little after nine o'clock, with a bag full of something or other over your shoulders. The bag had every appearance of being filled with fruit, and this morning the melon-beds are found to have been completely cleared. Now, sir, what was there in that bag?"

Like fire itself glowed the face of the detected lad. He spoke not a word. All the school had their eyes directed at him. The perspiration ran down his white forehead like rain drops.

"Speak, sir," exclaimed Lugare, with a loud strike of his ratan on the desk.

The boy looked as though he would faint. But the unmerciful teacher, confident of having brought to light a criminal, and exulting in the idea of the severe chastisement he should now be justified in inflicting, kept working himself up to a still greater and greater degree of passion. In the meantime, the child seemed hardly to know what to do with himself. His tongue cleaved to the roof of his mouth. Either he was very much frightened, or he was actually unwell.

"Speak, I say!" again thundered Lugare; and his hand, grasping his ratan, towered above his head in a very significant manner.

"I hardly can, sir," said the poor fellow faintly. His voice was husky and thick. "I will tell you some—some other time.—Please to let me go to my seat—I ain't well."

"Oh yes; that's very likely;" and Mr. Lugare bulged out his nose and cheeks with contempt. "Do you think to make me believe your lies! I've found you out, sir, plainly enough; and I am satisfied that you are as precious a little villain as there is in the State. But I will postpone settling with you for an hour yet. I shall then call you up again; and if you don't tell the whole truth then, I will give you something that'll make you remember Mr. Nichols' melons for many a months to come. Go to your seat."

Glad enough of the ungracious permission, and answering not a sound, the child crept trembling to his bench. He felt very strangely, dizzily—more as if he was in a dream than in real life; and laying his arms on his desk, bowed down his face between them. The pupils turned to their accustomed studies, for, during the reign of Lugare in the village-school, they had been so used to scenes of violence and severe chastisement, that such things made but little interruption in the tenor of their way.

Now, while the intervening hour is passing, we will clear up the mystery of the bag, and of young Barker being under the garden fence on the preceding night. The boy's mother was a widow, and they both had to live in the very narrowest limits.—His father had died when he was six years old, and little Tim was left a sickly emaciated infant, whom no one expected to live many months. To the surprise of all, however, the poor child kept alive, and seemed to recover his health, as he certainly did his size and good looks. This was owing to the kind offices of an eminent physician, who had a country-seat in the neighborhood and who had been interested in the widow's little family. Tim, the physician said, might possibly outgrow his disease; but every thing was uncertain. It was a mysterious and baffling malady; and it would not be wonderful if he should in some moment of apparent health be taken away. The poor widow was at first in a continual state of uneasiness; but several years had now passed, and none of the impending evils had fallen upon the boy's head. His mother seemed to feel confident that he would live, and be a help and honor to her old age; and the two struggled on together, mutually happy in each other, and enduring much of poverty and discomfort without repining, each for the other's sake.

Tim's pleasant disposition had made him many friends in the village, and among the rest a young farmer named Jones, who with his elder brother, worked a large farm in the neighborhood on shares. Jones very frequently made Tim a present of a bag of potatoes or corn, or some garden vegetables, which he took from his own stock; but as his partner was a parsimonious, high-tempered man, and had often said that Tim was an idle fellow, and ought not to be helped, because he did not work, Jones generally made his gifts in such a manner that no one knew any thing about them, except himself and the grateful objects of his kindness. It might be, too, that the widow was loath to have it understood by the neighbors that she received food from any one; for there is often an excusable pride in people of her condition, which makes them shrink from being considered as objects of "charity," as they would from the severest pains. On the night in question, Tim had been told that Jones would send them a bag of potatoes, and the place at which they were to be waiting for him was fixed at Mr. Nichols' garden fence.—It was this bag that Tim had been seen staggering under, and which caused the unlucky boy to be accused and convicted by his teacher as a thief. That teacher was one little fitted for his important and responsible office. Hasty to decide, and inflexibly severe, he was the terror of the little world he ruled so despotically. Punishment he seemed to delight in. Knowing little of those sweet fountains, which in children's breasts ever open quickly at the call of gentleness and kind words, he was feared by all for his sternness, and loved by none. I would that he were an isolated instance.

The hour of grace had drawn to its close, and the time approached at which it was usual for Lugare to give his school a joyfully received dismission. Now and then one of the scholars would direct a furtive glance at Tim, sometimes in pity, sometimes in indifference or inquiry. They knew that he would have no mercy shown him, and though most of them loved him, whipping was too common there to exact much sympathy. Even inquiring glances, however, remained unsatisfied, for at the end of the hour, Tim remained with his face completely hidden, and his head bowed in his arms, precisely as he had leaned himself when he first went to his seat.—Lugare looked at the boy occasionally with a scowl, which seemed to bode vengeance for his sullenness. At length the last class had been heard, and the last lesson recited, and Lugare seated himself behind his desk on the platform, with his longest and stoutest ratan before him.

"Now, Barker," he said, "we'll settle that little business of yours. Just step up here."

Tim did not move. The school-room was as still as the grave. Not a sound was to be heard, except occasionally a long-drawn breath.

"Mind me, sir, or it will be the worse for you. Step up here, and take off your jacket!"

The boy did not stir any more than if he had been of wood. Lugare shook with passion. He sat still a minute, as if considering the best way to wreak his vengeance. That minute passed in death-like silence, was a fearful one to some of the children, for their faces whitened with fright. It seemed, as it slowly dropped away, like the minute which proceeds the climax of an exquisitely performed tragedy, when some mighty master of the histrionic art is treading the stage, and you and the multitude around you are waiting with stretched nerves and suspended breath, in expectation of the terrible catastrophe.

"Tim is asleep, sir," at length said one of the boys who sat near him.

Lugare, at this intelligence, allowed his features to relax from their expression of savage anger into a smile, but that smile looked more malignant, if possible, than his scowls. It might be that he felt amused at the horror depicted on the faces of those about him; or it might be that he was gloating in the pleasure on the way in which he intended to wake the poor little slumberer.

"Asleep! are you, my young gentleman!" said he; "let us see if we can't find something to tickle your eyes open.—There's nothing like making the best of a bad case, boys. Tim, here, is determined not to be worried in his mind about a little flogging, for the thought of it can't even keep the little scoundrel awake."

Lugare smiled again as he made this last observation. He grasped his ratan firmly, and descended from his seat. With light and stealthy steps he crossed the room, and stood by the unlucky sleeper. The boy was still as unconscious of his impending punishment as ever. He might be dreaming some golden dream of youth and pleasure; perhaps he was far away in the world of fancy, seeing scenes, and feeling delights which cold reality can never bestow. Lugare lifted his ratan high over his head, and with the true and expert aim which he had acquired from long practice, brought it down on Tim's back with a force and whacking sound which seemed sufficient to wake a freezing man in his last lethargy. Quick and fast, blow followed blow. Without waiting to see the effect of the first cut, the brutal wretch plied his instrument of torture first on one side of the boy's back, and then on the other, and only stopped at the end of two or three minutes for very weariness. But still Tim showed no signs of motion; and as Lugare, provoked at his torpidity, jerked away one of the child's arms, on which he had been leaning over the desk, his head dropped down on the board with a dull sound, and his face lay turned up and exposed to view. When Lugare saw it, he stood like one transfixed by a basilisk. His countenance turned to a leaden whiteness; the ratan dropped from his grasp; and his eyes, stretched wide open, glaring at some spectacle of horror and death. The sweat starts in great globules seemingly from every pore in his face; his skinny lips contracted, and showed his teeth; and when he at length stretched forth his arm, and with the end of one of his fingers touched the child's cheek, each limb quivered like the tongue of a snake; and his strength seemed as though it would fail him. The boy was dead. He had probably been so for some time, for his eye was turned up, and his body was quite cold. The widow was now childless too. Death was in the school-room, and Lugare had been flogging A CORPSE.

AGRICULTURAL GEOLOGY.

Ten simple minerals, sometimes called the 'Geological Alphabet,' form the elements of our globe. These minerals, variously combined, constitute from twenty-five to thirty varieties of rocks, piled into mountains, also appearing in ledges and boulders, or loose fragments, scattered over the earth. Upon the character of the rocks depend the surface of country, soil, mineral wealth, and other facilities and resources for productive industry, and for physical, intellectual and moral prosperity.

The ten elementary minerals are quartz, felspar, hornblend, lime, slate, gypsum, serpentine, talc and chlorite. By various combinations, the rocks formed from them may be classed into five or six families.—The Granite family consists of three members, viz: granite, gneiss and mica slate, all composed of quartz, felspar, and mica, in differen' proportions and arrangements.

The Horblend family consists of three or four members, viz: greenstone, or traprocks, hornblend rock, hornblend slate, and sienite, masses of which are scattered extensively over the world, broken from mountain ranges of great extent in various countries.

The calcareous, or Lime family of rocks, consists of members more numerous, and more various in character, and not less interesting to farmers than either of the others mentioned. In this family are common limestone, most or all the marbles, chalk, (all carbonates of lime,) gypsum, or plaster of Paris, which is the sulphate of lime.

The Hagnesian family of rocks embraces serpentine ridges, noted in Agriculture only for their barrenness, but rich in ores, which produce some of our most beautiful paints, especially chrome yellow. Soapstone is also a magnesian rock, composed principally of talc.

The Conglomerate family is composed of fragments, or scattered remains of the rocks just named, again collected and cemented into large masses, and even mountain ranges. They are pudding stone, and sandstone and gaywack, each pearing under a great variety of forms.

To the farmer, all the simple minerals, the various rocks and the families, or classes under which they may be arranged, are of much interest. Several of them, as they determine the character and constitute the elements of soils, may be considered almost fundamental, both in the science and art of Agriculture. Those of special, and even paramount importance, are quartz, which is of the character of sand, and felspar, forming, when pulverised, varieties of clay and line, which, though not essential to a good soil, like the other two, is still necessary to give a soil the highest degree of fertility.

Stiff soils, light soils, loamy, calcareous, and all other soils, depend much upon the proportions in which these three simple minerals, and especially the two first are combined. Quartz, or silex, predominates in all soils, even stiff or clayey, as they are denominated. In light soils it is the principal ingredient, though pure silex, sand or quartz, produces entire barrenness, capable however, in some instances of being rendered fertile by the addition of a small portion of clay.

If it should be asked how these elementary substances and principles of soils can be rendered available by farmers, the answer must be—Let them procure 'GEOLOGICAL CABINETS,' or specimens, so selected, arranged, labeled and described, as will present in a tangible, intelligible form, the groundwork of the whole matter. A small collection of such specimens seldom, if ever, fails to add others, and still others, till tens soon increase to hundreds, and a single ray becomes broad daylight.

If such Geological Cabinets could be used and explained by lectures of a familiar, practical character, their interest and usefulness would be greatly increased. At present it may be difficult to procure men competent for such lectures; but if a call should be made for them, with a prospect of remuneration, men entirely competent to the enterprise might soon be qualified; some could now be found, already prepared, to make such lectures in a high degree instructive and entertaining. To my mind, no steps presents itself as more important for giving to farmers a knowledge of Agricultural Geology, or for promoting the improvement of their farms or their minds, than a call for Cabinets and Lectures, designed to illustrate this highly practical and popular Science.

The 'GEOLOGICAL SURVEYS' now in progress or completion in nearly all the States, present a strong reason why this or some other step should be taken, to diffuse the knowledge collected by these surveys, in large amounts and at great expense, and which is still liable to be confined to a few ponderous volumes, placed upon the shelves of the State or College Libraries, instead of going into the possession and to the use of farmers and mechanics, at whose expense such information has been principally collected.

If the thirty or forty Agricultural journals now published in our Country should unite in procuring and sustaining Lectures as here proposed, they could hardly fail of a measure of success which would give them a large reward, by giving to the Country a great amount of light, on a highly important and interesting subject.

JOSIAH HOLBROOK.

GULF STREAM.

This most powerful of known currents has its source in the Gulf or Sea of Mexico, which, like the Mediterranean and other close seas in the temperate or low latitudes, is warmer than the open ocean in the same parallels. The temperature of the Mexican sea in summer, is according to Rennell, 86 deg. Fahr., or at least 7 deg. above that of the Atlantic in the same latitude.—From this great reservoir or chaldron of warm water, a constant current pours forth through the straits of Bahama at the rate of three or four miles an hour; it crosses the ocean in a north-easterly direction, skirting the great bank of Newfoundland, where it still retains a temperature of 8 deg. above that of the surrounding sea. It reaches the Azoros in about seventy-eight days, after flowing nearly 3000 geographical miles, and from thence it sometimes extends its course a thousand miles further, so as to reach the Bay of Biscay, still retaining an excess of 5 deg. above the mean temperature of the sea.

COOL WATER.

Speaking of cool water, the Phila. Ledger says: "We can suggest a mode within the reach of every person. Let the jar, pitcher or vessel used for water, be surrounded with one or more folds of coarse cotton, to be constantly wet. The evaporation of the water from this will carry off the heat from the water inside, and soon reduce it to the freezing point. In India and other tropical regions, where ice cannot be procured, this practice is common. Let every mechanic or laborer have at his place of employment two pitchers thus provided, and with lids or covers, the one to contain water for drinking, the other for evaporation, and he can always have a supply of cold water in warm weather. Any person can test this by dipping a finger in the water and holding it in the air on a warm day. After doing this three or four times, he will find his finger uncomfortably cold.

How readily should we forgive those who offend us, if we consider how much our heavenly Father has fo given us!

Idleness brings forward and nourishes many bad passions.

Religious Discussion.

For the Register.

THE TRINITY.—NO VI.

Evidence frequently derives much of its force from its combination. One branch of an argument, though it may be indispensable to the whole, yet abstractly regarded it may render no service to the cause in the support of which it is adduced: but if we judiciously join it with other branches of the argument, the proof may be as full as any heart can wish. God has so arranged it, that the obtaining of truth, especially on religious subjects, shall cost us effort.—Hence, the inspired injunctions, "Buy the truth;" "Search the scriptures."

It has been stated, that by the doctrine of the Trinity we mean to maintain, that the ONE only living and true God exists in three persons, Father, Son, and Holy Spirit. We have guarded against the impression that we intend to use the word persons, in the sense of beings; or that we use it as merely designating attributes, or the different relations which the Creator sustains toward his intelligent creatures.

If any yet insist on farther explanation of what we do mean by the word person, when applied to Deity, the answer has been furnished in the language of Dr. Emmons:—"The one only living and true God exists in such a manner, that there is a proper foundation in his nature to speak of himself in the first, second, and third person, and say I, Thou, and He, meaning only himself."

In the preceding brief summary of the argument for the Trinity, we have noticed the intimations which the Old Testament contains concerning a plurality of persons in the Godhead; the Baptism Commission, and the Apostolic Benediction; the evidence for the Deity of Jesus Christ; also for the Personality and Deity of the Holy Spirit. The aggregate force of this evidence was such, that we felt that no objections against the Doctrine of the Trinity, could shake its deep foundations. Some objections which at first view might seem quite plausible, we found were rendered nugatory by a recognition of those familiar truths relating to the human nature of Christ, and to his inferiority of office.

A retrospect of the whole discussion suggests to my mind the following

REFLECTIONS.

1. No valid objection can be urged against the Doctrine of the Trinity, simply because it is mysterious.

Were it absurd, it ought to be rejected; but a mystery is not an absurdity. What shall we retain, if we resolve to reject all that involves mystery? Our own existence presents ten thousand mysteries.

What is more mysterious than underived existence? God exists without beginning. How can he thus exist? Finite beings find it difficult to conceive of a being now existing, who did not begin to exist. If God began to exist, then his existence was caused. Where then shall we look for the great First Cause? It is plain to every contemplative mind, that unless we admit the doctrine of underived existence, our stinted and frigid creed must be—Atheism. Therefore, he who denies the Trinity, because the doctrine is mysterious, to be consistent with himself, must also unqualifiedly deny the existence of the self-existent God.

2. The Doctrine of the Trinity is a fundamental doctrine of the Christian System.

In this doctrine are embraced the Deity of Christ; and inferentially, his atonement, its nature and necessity, and the reasons of that necessity, which consist in the nature of the claims of the Moral Law, and in the character of man as a rebel against the Government of God. It also embraces the Personality and Deity of the Holy Spirit; and inferentially, the regenerating work of the Spirit on the heart of man, and the certainty of the future and endless happiness of the regenerated, and the equal certainty of the future and endless misery of all who die unregenerated. Such a doctrine is fundamental; take it away and the Christian System can no longer exist.

3. If the Doctrine of the Trinity is a fundamental doctrine of the Christian System, then any scheme of religion which rejects this doctrine, does not belong to the Christian System.

The author of "Saturday Evening," says, (p. 40) "The modern history—the fate and the present actual condition of the doctrine absurdly called Unitarianism, is quite enough to convince any man of sense that the sceptical argument is a mere sophism, even if he knew nothing of the merits of the question." "And this edifying history, and spectacle, does in fact produce a proper effect upon the minds of men, and does actually seal the theological argument as it ought. Is Unitarianism Christianity? Read the story of its rise in modern times, of its progress, and decay, and look at the meager phantom as now it haunts the dry places it has retired to!—Is this pitiful shadow Christianity?"

New England now exhibits the Anti-Christian character of Anti-Trinitarian sentiments. Some of the Anti-Trinitarians of New-England are Universalists of the common class, but most of them are Restorationists. In that loved land of the Pilgrims, the rapid and characteristic degeneracy of Anti-Trinitarian theology, has recently been so fully developed, that even that portion of the secular press which had long been considered favorable to that theology, is constrained in alarm and amazement to exclaim, "Where are we!"

4. Soundness of morals cannot be maintained, where fundamental defection in religious sentiment prevails.

A sense of official responsibility; some remnant of the great truths which the mind once embraced as a system; the habits of thinking and of acting, which were formed when Trinitarianism was his creed; and the conservative influence of the various branches of the evangelical church,—these separately or combined, may save the Anti-Trinitarian from utter shipwreck in morals. But let his system have its legitimate course, unchecked by any of these or like restraints, and the day of its universal prevalence through the United States, would be the day of the complete prostration of the public morals, and of the triumph of unmasked Infidelity.

5. Care must be taken that we are not deceived by those who profess to believe in the Divinity of Christ, but who deny his real Deity.

The truth is, that the term Divinity of Christ, does designate his Supreme Deity. Thus all Trinitarians understand it, and thus they use it. This is well known by their opponents; and when they wish to introduce themselves into a place without alarming the people, they preach, pray, and talk abundantly about their strong belief in the Divinity of Christ. They enjoy their own mental interpretation of the term, while they know how it is understood by those who hear them. If it is asserted by the friends of truth, that these new comers do not believe in Christ's Divinity, the cry is at once raised, 'Perversion! Misrepresentation! Abuse! Defamation! Persecution!!" Then they reiterate louder than ever, 'We do believe in the Divinity of Christ.' As soon as they obtain some influence among the people, they begin to portray the absurdity and sinfulness of worshiping Jesus Christ as the Eternal God. They do not hesitate to affirm that Trinitarians are idolators; and their souls are horror-struck by one glance at "that system which teaches us to worship three Gods." A short time previous their policy was, by asserting that they believed in the Divinity of Christ 'as much as any people,' to represent themselves as being quite near the Trinitarians in belief—in that very belief which they cannot now mention without inexpressible regret.

The class of Anti-Trinitarians, who, as far as my own knowledge of the matter extends, most practice this kind of deception, style themselves "Christians." In the providence of God I have been so situated during some part of the eight years that I have preached the Gospel in the state of New-York, that several times I have come in contact with this class of persons, and therefore in what I here relate concerning them, I write that which I know, and testify what I have seen. The Hicksite Friends, another class of Anti-Trinitarians,* pursue a similar course.

It was not long since, that I read in one of their books, strong assertions of their belief in the Divinity of Christ. For a moment I felt somewhat encouraged, hoping that they were resolved to bear "testimony" to one fundamental truth of Christianity. But on casting my eye a little farther on the page, I there read, that Christ is called divine in the same sense that Abraham, Noah, Job, Daniel, Paul, and George Fox, were divine, or as any other man is at the present day, in whom the spirit of God dwells.

Not many years since, a like course was adopted by the Anti-Trinitarians of New-England, I mean those of Boston and its vicinity. Their efforts at concealment were modified by that seriousness of demeanor in which they had been educated, and of which they could not at once divest themselves, and also by those advantages of learning and mental discipline which they had derived from those institutions to which they had become hostile—whose foundations were laid by the toils, and contributions, and tears, and prayers of their Pilgrim ancestors.

The multitude are in danger of being misled by the sound of words. If public teachers say that they believe in the Divinity of Christ, the hearers may think all is safe, while the teachers are in heart, and in theology, strenuously opposed to that doctrine which the hearers suppose them to favor. Because the term Divinity of Christ is often evaded, we must put the question—Do you believe in the DEITY of Christ? There is, indeed, a modern evasion of this interrogation. The prompt answer may be, 'O yes, we believe in the Deity of Christ.' They suppose that we understand them according to the import of the question that we ask; while their own mental reservation is, that Jesus Christ is a sort of deity—god in some inferior sense—a little god! We must be on our guard against all such evasions, and we must not dare to recognize any person as a preacher of the Gospel of Jesus Christ, unless he unequivocally proclaims, that JESUS CHRIST IS THE SELF-EXISTENT AND ETERNAL GOD.

6. The higher the terms of exaltation are, which those use who intend to withhold from Christ the acknowledgment of Supreme Deity, the more impudently do they insult him.

A kind father says to his son, 'my son, call me father.' 'Most excellent friend!' says the son. Call me father. 'My most worthy benefactor!' My son, I command you to call me father. The son tries again—'My most venerable and ———,' but we need not fill the blank. Every one sees that while the son studiously refuses to say father, the more he multiplies exalted terms, the more does he insult his father. Jesus Christ claims to be the "I AM"—the Self-Existent God, who sent Moses to the children of Israel. Every effort to give him great titles, while that which he claims is withheld, is insult heaped upon insult.

I once had occasion to suggest to one who was under my pastoral charge, that he did wrong in encouraging soul-destroying delusions, by hearing one preach who denied the Deity of Christ. With much animation of countenance and earnestness of manner, he responded—"O Sir! ——— speaks very highly of Christ." Let the reader understand, that Anti-Trinitarians are not so easily detected by what they attribute to Christ, as by what they withhold from him. Almost their whole scheme is a system of negations. They privily bring in damnable heresies, denying the LORD that bought them.

7. The time has come when all those who love the Doctrine of the Trinity must stand together for its defense.

No minor subject should divide us. The Doctrine of the Trinity, and that system of Doctrines with which it is inseparably connected, constitute, theoretically, the dividing line between the church and the world. Again I repeat it—all who love the Doctrine of the Trinity, must join together for its defense; and must so join that the hurrying world cannot fail to see the union. The aspects of religious discussion in this country designate that we are fast approaching this crisis. The three great branches of reform, the Temperance cause, the cause of Chastity, and that of Liberty, cannot secure permanent triumph, only as each shall be sustained by the advocates of evangelical sentiments—the doctrine of the Trinity and its cluster of doctrines. Anti-Trinitarians never will labor efficiently for the renovation of this guilty world. Trinitarian doctrines are adapted for this work; and those who embrace them must cease to make too prominent their discussions about their shibboleths, and must stand in one firm unbroken phalanx for the defense of the truth, that there is one God in three persons, Father, Son, and Holy Spirit.

8. The spirit which HENRY MARTYN manifested, when he defended that distinguishing doctrine of Christianity, the Deity of Christ, is the spirit which should govern us.

Mr. Martyn recorded in his journal,—"The Moollah Aga Mohammed Hasan, has nothing to find fault with in Christianity except the Divinity of Christ. It is this doctrine that exposes me to the contempt of the learned Mohammedans, in whom it is difficult to say whether pride or ignorance predominates. Their sneers are more difficult to bear than the brickbats which the boys sometimes throw at me: however both are an honor of which I am not worthy.—How many times in the day have I occasion to repeat the words,

> If on my face, for thy dear name,
>   Shame and reproaches be;
> All hail reproach, and welcome shame,
>   If thou remember me.

The more they wish me to give up this one point—the Divinity of Christ—the more I seem to feel the necessity of it, and rejoice and glory in it. Indeed, I trust I would sooner give up my life than surrender it."

A few months after this record was made, Mr. Martyn had an opportunity of proclaiming the doctrine which was so near his heart, in the presence of a large number of Moollahs. He says, "I entered, and was surprised at their numbers. The room was lined with Moollahs, on both sides, and at the top. I was about to sit down at the door, but I was beckoned to an empty place near the top, opposite to the master, who, after the usual compliments, without further ceremony, asked me, what we meant by calling Christ, God? War being thus unequivocally declared, I had nothing to do but to stand on the defensive. Mirza Ibraheem argued temperately enough, but of the rest, some were very violent and clamorous. The former asked, if Christ had ever called himself God; was he the Creator or a creature? I replied, THE CREATOR. The Moollahs looked at one another. Such a confession had never before been heard among these Mohammedan doctors."

9. This subject makes a most solemn appeal to the impenitent sinner.

It is not a mere abstraction with which he has no specific concern, but it is a theme of thrilling interest, which involves the eternal destinies of apostate man.

If Jesus Christ is a mere created being, then no atonement has been made for sin—then Christianity is an imposition, and you, impenitent sinner, and I, and all the human family, are shrouded in darkness which no ray of light can ever penetrate.

But such is not our cheerless condition. There is ONE GOD in three persons—Father, Son, and Holy Spirit. Jesus did die on the Cross, not chiefly as a martyr to the cause of truth, but as the great atonement sacrifice,—he shed his blood for the remission of sins. That Divine Person, the Holy Spirit, does strive with you; He urges you to fly to the Lamb of God who taketh away the sin of the world. Come, then, sinner! the way is open for your salvation. All things are now ready. Cling to the Cross of Christ, and the grace of the Lord Jesus Christ, the love of God, and the communion of the Holy Spirit will abide with you forever.

That through the merits of the glorious Mediator, the benediction of the TRIUNE GOD may rest upon the writer, and upon his readers, is my earnest prayer.

JOSEPH R. JOHNSON.

De Ruyter, August 19, 1841.

*I take some care to avoid using the term, "Unitarian," for, according to its primary import, I am an Unitarian; and so is every one who believes in the Unity of God.

DEITY OF CHRIST.

BY DR. MASON.

We can not find, in the lively oracles, a single distinctive mark of deity which is not applied, without reserve or limitation, to the only begotten Son. All things whatsoever the Father hath are his. Who is that mysterious word, that was in the beginning with God? Who is the Alpha and Omega, the beginning and the ending, the first and the last, the Almighty? Who is he that knows what is in man, because he searches the deep and dark recesses of the heart? Who is the Omnipotent, that has promised, Wherever two or three are gathered in my name, there am I in the midst of them? the light of whose countenance is, at the same moment, the joy of heaven and the salvation of the earth? who is encircled by the seraphim on high, and walks in the midst of the golden candlesticks?—who is in this assembly? in all the assemblies of his people? in every worshiping family? in every closet of prayer? in every holy heart? Whose hands have stretched out the heavens and laid the foundations of the earth? Who hath replenished them with inhabitants, and garnished them with beauty, hath created all things that are in both, visible and invisible, whether they be thrones, or dominions, or principalities, or powers? By whom do all things exist? Who is Governor among the nations, having on his vesture and on his thigh a name written, King of kings and Lord of lords? Whom is it the Father's will that all men should honor even as they honor himself? Whom has he commanded his angels to worship? whom to obey? Before whom do the devils tremble? Who is qualified to redeem millions of sinners from the wrath to come, and preserve them by his grace, to his everlasting kingdom? Who raiseth the dead, having life in himself, to quicken whom he will, so that at his voice, all who are in their graves shall come forth; and death and hell surrender their numerous and forgotten captives? Who shall weigh, in the balance of judgment, the destinies of angels and men? dispose of the thrones of paradise? and bestow eternal life?—Shall I submit to the decision of reason? Shall I ask a response from heaven? Shall I summon the devils from their chains of darkness? The response from heaven sounds in my ears; reason approves and the devils confess. This, O Christian, is none other than the great God our Savior!

Indeed, the doctrine of our Lord's divinity is not, as a fact, more interesting to our faith, than as a principle, it is essential to our hope. If he were not the true God he could not be eternal life. When pressed down by guilt, and languishing for happiness, I look around for a deliverer such as my conscience, and my heart, and the word of God assure me I need, insult not my agony, by directing me to a creature—to a man, a man like myself! A creature! a man! My Redeemer owns my person. My immortal spirit is his property. When I come to die, I must commit it into his hands. My soul! my infinitely precious soul committed to a mere man! I would not thus intrust my body to the highest angel who burns in the temple above. It is only the Father of spirits that can have property in spirits, and be their refuge in the hour of transition from the present to the approaching world. In short, my brethren, the divinity of Jesus is, in the system of grace, the sun to which all its parts are subordinate, and all their stations refer—which binds them in sacred concord, and imparts to them their radiance, and life and vigor. Take from it this central luminary, and the glory is departed—its holy harmonies are broken—the elements rush to chaos—the light of salvation is extinguished forever!

THE MOMENT AFTER DEATH.

"It is a serious thing to die." To leave this world never to return, to part forever with all of earth, to exchange time for eternity, and the probationary opportunities of the present for the sealed and unchanging destiny of the unending future, "to pass from the warm precincts of life, to the cold chambers of the grave is appalling even in thought to human nature." When the thought is permitted to stand clearly before the mind, it strikes the living with solemnity and awe. But the dying man—what an amazing change does he experience in that moment, when the soul is unclothed from its mortal tabernacle, and looks abroad to that mighty journey upon which it has been compelled to enter! Just now he was here. Time and opportunity were his. Friends were around him. The light of the sun was in his eyes. But the moment after, death finds him gone. Time and opportunity are his no more. No more can he look upon friends below, and exchange with them the sweet charities of life, engage in its business, or they administer to his wants, or soothe his spirits. The light of the sun has faded away from his eyes forever; and other scenes have burst upon his view. His first step is taken upon that new and untried way, whose mysteries are hidden from every living eye, and whose length is the duration of unending periods; and the days he travels onward in his course, are measured by the revolutions of ages. He looks for the first time upon eternal scenes. He experiences for the first time the realities of the world, which, to living men, is to come. The moment after death! What wondrous secrets will it disclose? To what amazing realities will it introduce the soul? What unspeakable interests will it decide? To what glorious or fearful destiny will it carry the undying spirit? How then will the great God appear? What fresh disclosures of his Being, and majesty, and power, and truth, and justice, will he make? What displays of his glory unseen by mortal men, will then be exhibited? How will Christ appear? What views of the way of salvation by the Saviour's blood, will then be had? What views of the work of the Holy Spirit in here striving with sinners to bring them to repentance and to Christ; and in renewing the souls of God's people? How will then the sin of neglecting the Gospel and religion, and grieving the Holy Spirit appear? These questions we cannot answer now; but we shall fully know them all the moment after death.—They are questions to be pondered now—to be experienced then. Reader, are you prepared to experience with safety the wonders and events of the moment after death? If to witness the death of others; if to stand by in that sad hour when they give up the ghost and are gone, strike awe into the hearts of the living, what must be the reality to the soul which has just passed the amazing and mysterious change? The soul of him who has truly repented of sin and believed with the heart unto righteousness, whatever may be the peculiar nature of its sensations the moment after death, is unquestionably safe and happy. But who shall tell the sensations of him who dies unprepared to meet his God, where in a moment he finds himself in the world of spirits; not hearing of eternity, but in it? Not asking, Is there a God? but trembling in his awful presence. Perhaps while living he despised the Savior, and stood firm against the thought of eternity. Perhaps he triumphed over the warnings of the Bible; and remained unmoved at death. But where is he? and what his confidence the moment after death? God, and eternity, and his soul can tell.

THE TWO FUNERALS.

There is at least one place where the rich and the poor meet together—it is in the grave yard. Death is a leveller, and a great despiser of earthly distinctions, and although it is attempted by the sculptured tomb, to carry the distinctions of this mortal life within his dominions, yet it is abortive, for "dust to dust" concludes the career of the proudest and the noblest, and corruption and the worm distinguish not between the buried prince and the beggar.

It was at the close of a summer's day, that we saw the pompous funeral procession slowly approach the last resting place of the dead. The carriages of the wealthy were there, the attendants wore the long funeral scarf, the procession was numerous, and when at length the hearse stopped at the gate of the cemetery, the body of the deceased was transferred to the bier, and covered with the black velvet pall. Thus was it borne to the side of the tomb. The coffin covered by black cloth and ornamented with silver edging and escutcheon, which was carefully deposited, not in a simple grave where the earth could come in contact with it, but in a deep place in a walled but subterranean [illegible], with a seeming intention of preventing the inclosed from mingling with its native dust. The ceremony was soon completed, and the attendants began to disperse. We took a position near the gate, and as we desired to derive instruction from such scenes, we scanned the countenances, and listened to the passing conversation of the retiring attendants. Alas, how disappointed!! The marks of sincere sorrow, or even sober reflection, we detected not in a single face. As the living stepped over the boundary which divided the bustling walks of life from the silent residence of the dead, it was evident both in their looks, and in their words, that they were glad to escape from a scene which might induce serious thought. The deceased had been the possessor of great wealth: his city mansion and equipage were indicative of his affluence, he entertained his numerous acquaintance in the costliest manner, and his company was obsequiously courted. He was, however, now buried, and his friends were retiring from his grave with the most heartless indifference. One had his mind engrossed by some profitable speculation, another planning improvements in his property, and still another intent upon some scheme of ambition, not reflecting that the deceased successfully had planned until he had become rich, and increased in goods, and that while saying to his soul, "Soul, take thine ease," was suddenly cut off in the midst of his days, and hurried into an eternity for which he had made no preparation. What, thought we, are wealth and fashion, when such is their end? Death has interposed to arrest the voice of merriment, and to envelop the soul of a proud and thoughtless mortal in the shades of everlasting night.

Scarcely had those who had carried the rich man to his burial dispersed before another funeral train appeared. It was attended by no rich equipages, and all the circumstances of it betokened that this was a burial of the poor. A widow was burying her son. Her tears were sincere, and sincere appeared to be the sympathy of her poor neighbors. Each retired from the humble grave, after a parting look, with sober and sorrowful countenances; and it was evident that the poor man had more friends than the rich one who had just preceded him to the house appointed for all the living. From one of the attendants we learned that the deceased was the stay of his aged mother, that he was humbly pious, that he was beloved by all who knew him, and that his bereaved parent was sustained by heavenly consolations, and was now more intent than ever in setting her house in order for her last journey. Surely, we thought, there is little gloom in that grave. The burial is but the planting of a seed which shall rise again, bearing immortal fruit. Happy the son who has exchanged toil for rest, poverty for ever-enduring riches: and happy the bereaved mother to whom the Lord condescends to minister consolation.

THE CARAITES.—This Jewish sect derive their name from the fact their creed is founded exclusively on the pure and simple text of the Old Testament, rejecting wholly the traditions and interpretations of the Rabbies and Talmuds. They assert that our Savior was a member of their community, and like them rejected the rabbinical interpolations; and they positively deny that any of their sect was in the slightest degree implicated in the crucifixion. They educate their children with great care—provide amply for the poor, are principally engaged in commerce, and are highly esteemed wherever they are met with, enjoying the same privileges as Christians.

Forget not in thy youth to be mindful of thy end: for though the old man can not live long, yet the young man may die quickly.

THOMAS E. BABCOCK is a traveling agent for this paper.

A Noble Spirit.

The following is related of Mrs. Lynde, who was the only lady saved from the wreck of the Erie:

"Mr. Clemens, the engineer of the boat, states that after having struggled with the waves for some time, and having been taken up by Capt. Titus, who, with a few others, were on the yawl boat turned upside down, he saw Mrs. L. floating by, with the life-preserver not more than one quarter filled with air, and she apparently dead. Mr. C. thought that by filling the life-preserver, she might continue to float, and if picked up, be recognized by her friends. With this intention he applied his mouth to the tube and commenced filling it. While so doing Mrs. L. faintly spoke, and said, "you are very kind, sir." Finding she was alive he continued to fill the life-preserver, but so exhausted was he that he could do it but imperfectly. He then drew her toward the yawl, when she revived a little and said, "save me if you can, but rather use all your efforts for yourself, and let me die if I cannot be saved without sacrificing others."—"Such language from a female," said Mr. C. "made me resolve that if I were saved she should be also;"—and his efforts were constantly directed to her, and successfully."

Such nobleness of soul is scarcely to be met with in the human race. Here is exhibited that high-toned philanthropy—that disinterested benevolence, which can be found only among the followers of the Lamb.—This is a specimen of that trust and hope in God which is above all price, and which buoys the soul above the fear of death when within its jaws. From our personal acquaintance with her husband, Charles J. Lynde, while pursuing our Academical studies, we are prepared to say, that his spirit was congenial with hers. In the circle of our acquaintance, we knew of none that bid fairer for usefulness in life than he. But his career is ended, and his soul is at rest.

"I wish Father would'nt drink any more Whiskey."

Such was the expression of a lad who frequently calls at our office. Well might he say thus, for he doubtless begins to see many evils that follow the dram. If he is not already reduced to rags and starvation, he has it in prospect before him. If he has not already been the subject of brutal treatment from a merciless besotted parent, he has no surety that he will long escape. If he has not already seen the finger of scorn pointed at him, with the insulting taunt, "Your father is a drunkard!" and if he has not already felt the disgrace and ruin that are inseparable from drunkenness, he has doubtless realized it vividly in his imagination, and trembled at the consequences of drinking the deadly poison. That father must be a monster incarnate that can entail the consequences of drunkenness, as a legacy, upon his children. He must be lost to all sense of moral and parental obligation, to benumb his own faculties with the fatal poison and thus unfit himself to train up his children for usefulnees in life and happiness beyond the grave.

That heart must be harder than an adamant that will not be moved by the tears of a devoted wife, nor the anxieties of children. The drunkard, beside being the most miserable, is the most loathsome of the human race. All manly and ennobling feelings—all sense of honor and right, and every thing that is good and reputable among men is banished from his heart, and he drags out a miserable existence, a slave to his passions—a disgrace to his species—a pest to society, and a candidate for a wretched existence beyond the grave.

Of all beings the drunkard is the most to be pitied, and has the highest claims to the sympathies and exertions of the philanthropist to rescue him from his deplorable fate. Once he was a man, perhaps possessed of as brilliant an intellect—a nice sense of right—a fair prospect of usefulness—the esteem of all around him, and an unsullied reputation as any. Now he is the wreck of a man—with a benumbed intellect—blighted prospects—blasted reputation, and an outcast from respectable society. He once stood with the respectable and virtuous, and planned his schemes of future usefulness—laid the standard of moral excellence high, and fondly hoped that he would share with the honored and virtuous in their reputation, and enjoy whatever of domestic and social blessings ever falls to the most worthy. Now, he has no higher ambition than to satiate his depraved thirst with the bitter waters of destruction—no sense of right—and becomes a cruel, merciless husband and parent—a tattered vagabond, and a companion with the brute that wallows in the mire.

Ordination.

A Council, consisting of members from the Scott, Lincklæn and 2d Brookfield churches convened with the church in Truxton, by their request, on the 29th inst., to examine and set apart to the gospel ministry Br. Russel G. Burdick. The Council after hearing the experience, call to the ministry, and doctrinal views of the candidate, voted to proceed to his ordination, which took place as follows: Discourse and Consecrating Prayer by Br. S. M. Burdick, Right hand of Fellowship and Charge by J. Bailey, Benediction by the Candidate.

Revival Record.

We are happy to learn that there is an interesting revival in the S. D. Baptist church in Scott. Fourteen have already been baptized and united with the church. Some of these were converted some time since under the efficient labors of Br. A. Campbell.—Others through the instrumentality of Br. J. L. Scott, who is now laboring there.—Many others are inquiring what they must do to be saved.

The Commencement of the Sabbath.

Having in a former number proved that the phrase "In the beginning," as used in Gen. i. 1, pointed out the precise moment of duration in which time began, and from which time must be reckoned, I shall now proceed to show its division by the Creator.

Now, as time certainly began at that august moment, and as there could have been no light previous to its creation; consequently, the portion of time anterior to the creation of light, as mentioned in the third verse, must have been darkness. Light being a created substance, (which cannot be said of its opposite, darkness,) the creation of light was, therefore, one division of time. But it was not until a complete period, both of darkness and light, had transpired, that the Creator declared, that "the evening and morning were the first day." Earth had then performed her first rotation on her axis. Balanced in mid-heaven among the starry gems of ether, she then commenced that septennial millennial course, from which Gabriel must date, to sound the clarion trump that announces Earth's divergent orb to be again merged in Eternity.

As none can dispute but that the word "day," must mean a period of 24 successive hours, or just one diurnal revolution of the Earth, so we unqualifiedly declare, that if that be the case, (as it certainly is,) then the beginning of the first day must date its commencement from that point of which we have been speaking, viz: that instant referred to by the phrase, "In the beginning." Consequently, the first part of the first day which Earth ever saw, was darkness, unless "there was light" before "there was light." But, should it be argued that although at first darkness prevailed; yet, we are not to compute time until the creation of light.—This would militate against the wisdom of Deity in thus arranging creative operations so that darkness should precede light, and yet not suppose time to commence until some time after matter or light was created, when with the same ease light could have been created at the first. Can we suppose that infinite Wisdom would thus act? I trow not. Thus we see that Divine Wisdom designed that the day should begin preceded by darkness, which is evidently corroborated by the constant reference to this arrangement in the expression, the 'evening and the morning were the second,' third, &c., day; always using the word evening prior to morning, which was doubtless designedly thus expressed. Must we not suppose that there was a design in the arrangement at creation, which should precede darkness or light? And as we can only learn what the design of God is except by its fulfillment, (unless otherwise expressed) and as the event goes to prove the previous design, therefore we must believe that it was the design and wish of the Creator that darkness should precede light in the order of time. And, as we have already seen that the first period of darkness and light combined constituted the first day, or period of 24 hours, we must therefore conclude that, as the first day so began, all succeeding days were to thus begin and end. That this was the design and will of God is still farther evident from the fact, that the same wise arrangement is often mentioned in the future history of the bible. How beautiful and wise this arrangement! For, while the chaotic mass of matter in embryo was confusion confounded, darkness brooded over the unfathomable abyss, shielding, as it were, the unshapely land from prying ken. But no sooner had this unwieldly mass become organized, than the voice of Jehovah was heard, "Let there be light!" and far quicker than the lightning's flash shoots through the midnight gloom, did the effulgent radiance of morning burst on earth's primeval darkness. Beautiful sublimity of light first created! Heaven was emptied of its inhabitants to gaze upon the elysian scene; the morning stars sang a joyful response, and the sons of God shouted for joy, while the ethereal vault responded the voice of the Almighty that it was "Good!" How wise such an arrangement! how beneficial to man's highest good! how kind in our Creator thus to commence the day in the silence of evening, thus to give man an opportunity to prepare his soul for the active duties of the coming light! Thus we see that the period of time called day, as used in Gen. i., commenced being preceded by darkness.—And if the first day thus began, all other subsequent days must begin in the same manner, and at the same returning time.—In darkness, then, the first day began, and ended at the close of light on the following diurnal revolution of the earth. Therefore there could be no alteration either in the beginning or ending of any of the following days either during that week, or even during any future time of earth's period, without either a loss or gain of days. And who will presume to take the responsibility of such alterations upon himself?

Having thus established both the commencement and the division of time, as fixed by God, I conclude this number by saying, that the subject is one of vital importance to the cause of religion and the institution of the Sabbath, at the same time wishing that all would give it a prayerful examination, and act as the Spirit of God dictates.

My apology for remisness is the almost constant occupancy of my time. In a future number the subject will be continued, if permitted.

Yes, "Interrogator," we will rouse for a Temperance effort.

We are verily guilty for slumbering so long.

The perilous condition of some inebriates; the increase of moderate drinking; the fearful exposure of our young men and boys; the inactivity of our present temperance organization; the knowledge of God's special interposition in behalf of the temperance reform, by the manifestation of his mercy to a class of men whose case was deemed hopeless; the shortness of our probation; and the scenes of the approaching Judgment—all conspire in pressing the demand that we now awake, and put forth our united energies for the promotion of the cause of Temperance.

RESPONDENT.

De Ruyter, Mond. morning, Aug. 23.

Congressional News.

From the New-Yorker.

WASHINGTON CORRESPONDENCE.

Wednesday, August 11.

The President pro tem. laid before the Senate to-day a communication from the Secretary of the Navy, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate, giving a list of all articles imported duty free, with the amount of duties on and the value of the goods imported, bearing a less duty than 20 per cent. ad valorem, in the years 1837, '38 and 39; which was laid on the table and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Calhoun offered resolutions of a meeting of Isle of Wright Co., Virginia, against the Extra Session, a National Bank, Distribution, and avowing the right of repeal of the Bank. He expressed his concurrence in the sentiments of the resolution, and moved their printing; which was rejected, by Yeas 19, Nays 20.

Mr. Buchanan presented a memorial in favor of the defense of our Northern frontier and Lakes, and communicated important information with relation to British movements on that frontier. The petition was referred to the Military Committee.

Repeal of the Sub-Treasury.

Mr. Clay, from the Committee on finance, reported the bill for the repeal of the Sub-Treasury, with amendments of the House. He moved that it be immediately taken up.

A conversation arose by Messrs. Clay, of Ala., Benton and King, opposing the taking of it up. The motion was then carried by Yeas 26, Nays 21, and the bill taken up.

Mr. Clay stated that the amendments of the House were but two, which had received the sanction of the Finance Committee, and which, he hoped, would be concurred in.

Mr. Calhoun said this bill was useless, if the bank bill was passed, as it would by that act be suspended; and wrong, if the bank bill was vetoed, as the public money would then be left without the protection place. It was, moreover, indelicate to take it up now, and thus bring this bill before the President with the bank bill; as, if he approved of this, no alternative would be left to him, but to sign the bank bill. He moved to postpone the bill to Saturday next, when it was probable the President would have disposed of the bill now before him.

Mr. Clay opposed this motion, and wished the bill acted on now. He replied briefly to the arguments of Mr. Calhoun, contending that a part only of the provisions of the Sub-Treasury would be suspended by a bank act. He had had no design to connect the two matters before the President; but thought he would be enabled to act more understandingly by having the two subjects before him at the same time; and they should act on business at once before them.

Mr. Rives desired that the bill be acted on now, and contended if the amendments were rejected, which he hoped would be the case, that the public Treasury would again be regulated by the Deposite Act of 1836. He had no communication whatever, direct or indirect, with the President, but believed he would have no objections to having both matters before him at the same time.

The motion to postpone the bill to Saturday was then rejected: Yeas 21, Nays 28.

The question then being on concurrence in the first amendment, which repeals the Deposit Act of 1836, except the 13th and 14th sections, it was adopted, by Yeas 25, Nays 23, the Whigs voting for it, with the exception of Messrs. Rives and Archer, who voted against it.

The second amendment to repeal the law of 1837, which prohibits the payment by Government, or by the General Post Office, of notes of a less denomination than twenty dollars, was adopted by Yeas 26, Nays 23, Mr. Rives voting with the Loco-Focos against it.

The title of the bill having been slightly modified, the amendments were completed. Thus the bill wants but the signature of the President to become a law.

The Distribution Bill was then taken, and the amendment of Mr. Young, embracing the graduation principle, and repealing the law exempting the public land for five years after its sale from taxation, was rejected.

Mr. Linn offered an amendment to strike out the distribution feature of the bill, and insert a provision to appropriate the proceeds of the lands to the defense of the country.

The Senate adjourned without taking the question on this.

The House of Representatives have to-day been engaged in the consideration of the Bankrupt Bill.

Messrs. Fessenden, Linn and Pendleton advocated the bill.

Mr. Trumbull opposed the voluntary provisions of the bill, and also the including of corporations. He did not commit himself as to his vote.

Mr. Payne, of Ala., opposed the bill in its present form, but would vote for it if an amendment which he should offer were adopted, providing that the bankruptcy shall not apply to individuals indebted to States, or to any corporations owned wholly or in part by States, without the assent of the States, or to principals, without the knowledge and consent of the surities, and the opportunity of the benefits of the act extended to them.

The House adjourned at half-past 3 o'clock.

Thursday, August 12.

In the Senate, to-day, Mr. Tappan presented a memorial of citizens of Ohio, against a National Bank, Distribution, the propriety of this Extra Session, and declaring the right of repeal of the Bank, which, without debate, was laid on the table and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Buchanan presented a memorial of Merchants of Philadelphia against so high a duty as 20 per cent. on silks, laces, &c., and stating that if levied, there ought to be two months or more notice given.

Mr. Clay presented a memorial of citizens of Philadelphia for a duty on chloride of lime, and bleaching powder, and against a duty on indigo; both of which were laid on the table.

The resolution of Mr. Clay, of Ala., calling on the Secretary of the Treasury for the number of removals and appointment of clerks by the present Commissioner of the General Land Office, was taken up, an amendment having been offered by Mr. Preston. To this Mr. Smith of Ia. offered an amendment; both of which were adopted, and farther call for the list of removals and appointments in the General Land Office for the four years from 1829, from 1833, and from '37, and the number of extra clerks employed during that time, their services, compensation, and total amount of wages. The resolution, as amended was adopted.

The Distribution and Pre-emption bill was again taken up, the question being on Mr. Linn's amendment to strike out the distribution sections, and insert a provision applying the net proceeds of the public lands to the defense of the Country.

Messrs. Linn and Benton dwelt at length on the circumstances threatening a war with Great Britain, both confidently predicting such an event, and showing the importance of placing the Country in a state of defense, and of maintaining its honor inviolate from foreign aggression. Mr. Linn yesterday, in recounting the indignities and insolence of the British Government, mentioned the threat of the British Minister in relation to the release of McLeod, entreating the President to "take into his most deliberate conviction the serious nature of the consequences which must ensue from a rejection of this demand." He said he would hang McLeod, if for nothing else than this!—and this he repeated. He, however, thinking it too strong an expression, subsequently modified it.

Mr. Wright supported the amendment in one of his best efforts, also entering briefly into the distribution subject, particularly in reply to the opening speech of Mr. Smith of Ia. In a most masterly manner he sketched the want of defense of the Country, and then of his State, containing the great commercial emporium of the Union, which was in an entirely defenseless condition, the protection of which not only interested that State, but the whole Union, whose commerce centered there.

He then spoke of the extended lake coast of New York as in no state of defense, on which was situated the most important town of the Union, of those not on the Atlantic coast, according to its population, which was within gun-shot of British soil, and without the necessary means for its protection. He knew the share of New York in the distribution would be great, but taking all these circumstances into view, and also the additional cause of excitement with regard to McLeod, now imprisoned there and waiting trial, he held that this fund would be infinitely better employed for means of defense in his State than by distribution.

Mr. Tallmadge felt called to reply briefly to his colleague. He should infer, (he said,) from his colleague's remarks, that the issue was between defending the country from foreign aggression and leaving it undefended. This was a false issue. He should be ready to go as far as any man for the purpose of defense. New York had some claim on this Government; she had given up the control of her duties, after much hesitation, to this Government, which were three-fifths of the whole revenue of the Union from customs. They could give the proceeds of the lands in no way so effectual for the defense of the country as by distribution. The three millions from the lands, given according to this bill, would be worth twenty millions any other way. The country was to be defended by the abilities of the people to defend it. This distribution would be applied by New-York to the completion of her works of internal improvement, which, if they had existed during the late war, would have saved in one campaign all the cost of their construction! By it those works would be completed, and this increased the value of property; it had already raised land on the Cayuga Lake from $5 or $10 an acre, to $50 or $60, and other property in an equal ratio. If applied as proposed by the amendment, it would be far too small for the defense of the country; but by distribution, they would relieve the States from their present embarrassment, and enable them to bear the burdens of the country. If a war arose, and the States were called on to bear their share in the expenses, and $500,000 were necessary from New York, one half mill per cent. on her property, thus increased from distribution, would pay this sum, and it would not be felt. The distribution would build up the States and Country, and go further to prepare for war than any other disposition of the proceeds of the lands.

The amendment was rejected: Yeas 18, Nays 28.

Mr. Sturgeon moved an amendment, to strike out the section giving the ten per cent. to the new States. This was rejected; Yeas 11, Nays 35. A second amendment of Mr. Sturgeon was rejected, and Mr. Archer having moved an amendment the Senate adjourned.

In the House of Representatives, Mr. Barnard introduced a resolution to take the Bankrupt Bill out of Committee, Friday, (to-morrow,) at 12 o'clock.

Mr. Wise moved to amend it so as to take it out to-day at 3 o'clock.

A motion of Mr. Andrews of Ky. to lay the resolution on the table, having been rejected without a division, the question was taken and the amendment rejected; after which the resolution was lost, by Yeas 79, Nays 89.

The Bankrupt Bill was then again taken up in Committee of the Whole, and debated during the day by Messrs. Hunt, Allen of Me., and Milton Brown of Tenn. in support, and by Mr. Pope in opposition.

The House adjourned at three o'clock.

Friday, Aug. 13.

In Senate, after the usual morning business, the Land Bill was taken up, and Mr. Archer moved to strike out of the ninth section, that which requires the application of the lands granted to the new States to purposes of Internal Improvement. Mr Clay of Ala. briefly opposed this, and it was rejected without a division.

Mr. McRoberts moved to strike out the section directing the grant of lands to New States, and insert larger amounts. Rejected: Yeas 19, Nays 25.

Mr. Walker moved that the unsold lands in Tennessee be now ceded to that State, and those of the other States likewise, when they shall have been respectively as long in the Union as Tennessee has been. Rejected: Yeas 14, Nays 20.

Mr. Clay of Ala. moved to strike out the tenth section, which debars from the benefits of Pre-emption under this act, all who shall have obtained Pre-emptions under former acts. Carried: Yeas 23, Nays 20.

Mr. Sevier moved that the Senate adjourn over to Monday. Messrs. Berrien and Buchanan opposed this motion, the former on the ground that the business of the Senate was far behind that of the House; the latter anxious for an early adjournment.

In the House, Mr. Sergeant moved that the House, when it adjourn, adjourn over to Monday. Carried: 112 to 49.

Mr. Barnard moved that the debate on the Bankrupt Bill be closed at 2 o'clock to-day. Carried: 71 to 61.

The House now went into Committee of the Whole on the Bankrupt Bill, and Mr. Birdseye of N. Y. spoke an hour against the bill in its present form, and was followed by Mr. McKay of N. C. in general opposition. On motion of Mr. Smith of Conn., the Committee then rose (79 to 59) and Mr. Smith moved a reconsideration of the vote by which the House had just agreed to arrest the debate at 2 o'clock.—Mr. Wise moved a call of the House. Refused: 71 to 82. Mr. Proffit moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table. Negatived; 87 to 98. Mr. Smith having moved the Previous Question, it was seconded: 93 to 76; and the motion to reconsider prevailed: Yeas 102, Nays 98.

Mr. Atherton moved a reconsideration of the vote by which the House had agreed to adjourn over to Monday. Laid on the table on motion of Mr. Pendleton: Yeas 101, Nays 94.

The House now went again into Committee, and Mr. Wise gave the majority a dressing for the votes they had just given. He said it was evident that the Bankrupts were to be sacrificed by their pretended friends—that the passage of this bill was to be delayed, and its defeat held in terrorem over the head of the President, as a punishment for vetoing the Bank Bill, should he venture to do so. He wished the Bankrupts to understand now that they were betrayed, and that they would get no relief this Session. He further remarked on the palpable juggle of reconsidering and prolonging the discussion when nobody wished to speak on the bill.

Messrs. Briggs of Mass., and Morgan of N. Y. replied to Mr. Wise; after which Messrs. White of Ind., and Sollers of Md. spoke in favor of the bill, and Mr. Williams of Md. against it. Mr. Holmes of S. C. then obtained the floor, and the Committee rose.

The House then took up the bill to provide for printing the returns of the Census, which was so amended as to order the printing of 20,000 (instead of 10,000) copies of the abstract, and engrossed for a third reading. Adjourned.

Saturday, August 14.

The Sub-Treasury act is at length repealed, the bill for that purpose having received the signature of the President on the 13th inst., as was to-day announced to the Senate.

In Senate, the bill to extend the time for issuing Virginia Military Land Warrants was taken up, and after some debate passed.

The resolution to distribute among the States and Territories 7000 copies of the printed returns of the Sixth Census, and to reserve 3,000 copies in the Library of Congress for future disposition, was adopted.

The resolution of Mr. Clay of Ala. inquiring of the Secretary of the Treasury why he has not previously laid before the Senate, in compliance with its resolution of last session, information relative to the issues of scrip connected with military land warrants, was taken up, and after a brief debate, adopted.

The orders of the day were called for, viz. the Distribution Bill, when a motion was made to postpone it, many of the Senators being absent. Some conversation arose, in which Mr. Sevier insisted on proceeding with the bill; as they had rejected his motion to adjourn over to Monday, he was here and ready to go on with business, which ought not to be retarded by those who had seen fit to absent themselves. The motion to lay over was carried: Yeas 25, Nays 10.

A motion to adjourn was lost by Ayes 16, Noes 18, and the Senate went into Executive session.

The House has not been in session to-day, as it was the day set apart to visit the U. S. ship Delaware, at Annapolis, and has been improved in that manner by many members of the House, with some of the Senate. The day has been delightful.—The President, contrary to expectation, did not go.

Monday, Aug 16.

The Veto Message was to-day received in the Senate, in anticipation of which the galleries and the Chamber were crowded at an early hour. It was received at a quarter past 12 o'clock, the Bank Bill being returned with it, and immediately, other business suspended, was read to the Senate. Of the Message it is unnessary to speak, as you have it in full. It is, however, received with applause by the Opposition, and in the contrary manner by many of the Whigs. Immediately after its reading, a slight expression of feeling was manifested in the galleries, and Mr. Benton instantly rose and uttered severe deprecations against the "Bank ruffians" and "Bank bullies" who had insulted the Message, and in that the President, the Senate, and the country.—He moved that those who were instrumental in it be removed from the gallery by the Sergeant-at-Arms, and brought to the bar of the Senate.

The hissing and approbation were very faint, of short duration, and unheard by many of the Senators.

Messrs. Rives, Benton, Buchanan and others, spoke on this motion, maintaining the necessity of preserving the honor and dignity of the Senate inviolate from disturbances of this kind; and in this instance the disturbance being so slight, and being entirely unheard by some of them, suggesting and pressing the propriety of suffering this to pass without formal action. The most conspicuous of the disturbers was, in the mean time, taken from the gallery by an officer of the Senate and put in custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms. After a conversation of some length, the subject was dropped and the person ordered to be discharged.

Mr. Clay, in his usually concise manner, stated the situation of the bill which had passed both branches of Congress, and having been presented to the President for his signature, was now returned with his objections. The course now marked out in the Constitution was to reconsider the bill, and if it passed both Houses by a vote of two-thirds, it became a law of the land, independently of the objections. He would not now debate the subject; it would not be treating it with the gravity due to the cor-ordinate branch of the Government, to themselves, and to the Country, without time for the consideration of the objections. He therefore moved that it be taken up for consideration to-morrow at 12 o'clock, and, in the mean time, be printed.

After some conversation as to the hour of taking it up to-morrow, the motion was carried; and, on motion of Mr. King, 6,000 extra copies ordered to be printed.

The Senate then went into Executive session. Prior to this, in the morning hour, Mr. Clay presented resolutions and proceedings of a meeting of the highly respectable County of Buckingham, Virginia, in favor of the measures of this Session, viz; a National Bank, declaring its constitutionality, and expressing an earnest desire for its establishment at this Session; for distribution, and for a Bankrupt Law: against the Sub-Treasury, and desiring its repeal.

He was glad to say that this latter part of the request had been complied with; and he hoped, although it was hoping against hope, that the former one would be, and that a National Bank would be established at this Session.

Mr. Wright presented a communication of importers of jewelry of New York, expressing their opinion that an increase of duty on articles of jewelry would diminish the revenue from them, as it would increase the smuggling of them, to which there was so much facility.

The resolution of Mr. Linn, requesting the President to give notice to the British Government to put an end to the joint communication of Oregon Territory was taken up, and, after some debate, laid over.

The resolution of Mr. Sevier, calling on the Post-Master General for the changes in the transportation of the mails in the States and Territories was adopted.

In the House numerous petitions were presented.

Mr. Irwin, from the Select Committee on General Retrenchment, reported a resolution empowering the Committee to sit during the recess of Congress, which was laid on the table, at the motion of Mr. Andrews of Ky.: Yeas 129, Nays 40.

The Census Bill was taken up and passed.

The Bankrupt Bill was again taken up in Committee of the Whole, Mr. Tillinghast in the Chair.

The interest of the day has been in the Senate, where assembled many of the members of the House, leaving that nearly vacated. The House, not feeling in a working mood, adjourned at an early hour.

Tuesday, Aug. 17.

In the House of Representatives, a resolution offered by Mr. Barnard, was adopted, to take the Bankrupt Bill out of Committee to-day. At two o'clock, the various amendments having been rejected with the exception of one, providing that the act take effect the first of February next, the bill was reported to the House. An amendment to the amendment moved by Mr. Clifford, was under the operation of the previous question, adopted, and provides that this shall not interfere with any State Bankrupt Law.

Mr. Underwood of Ky. then moved to lay the bill and amendments on the table, to give an opportunity, as he said, for more thorough investigation of the subject next Session. The motion was carried by Yeas 110, Nays 97—the Loco Focos, with most of the Whigs of Kentucky and Virginia voting in the affirmative, and the remainder of the Whigs generally in the negative.

Thus, the Bankrupt Bill, to the deep regret of a large proportion of the community has failed for this Session; unless, perchance, the vote should be re-considered, a motion for which, may, perhaps, be made to-morrow.

The house then adjourned at an early hour.

The Senate, it was anticipated, would be the theatre of intense and uncommon interest to-day, by a discussion on the Bank Bill and Veto. Accordingly, at an early hour, the Galleries and Chamber were densely crowded. At 12 o'clock, the subject was announced in order, and then, by a vote of Yeas 29, Nays 20, laid over till to-morrow at the same time.

The Whig Members having been in Caucus, had agreed on no course of action on the Bank bill, which probably caused the delay, and on which measure depends the action on the Distribution and Revenue bills, and the length of the Session.

The resolution of Mr. Linn requesting the President to give notice to the British Government, in order to put an end to the joint occupation of Oregon Territory, was debated, after other slight business, during the morning hour by Mr. Benton and laid over.

The Distribution bill was under consideration the remainder of the day. Several amendments were offered, of a similar character to others before rejected, and were accompanied with some running debate.

Without final action on the bill, the Senate adjourned.

Wednesday, Aug. 18.

The Bankrupt Bill, in the House of Representatives, was to-day taken from the table and passed, was sent to the Senate, where the amendment was concurred in; and thus wants only the signature of the President to become the law of the land.

Mr. Gamble moved to re-consider the vote, by which it was yesterday laid on the table.

Mr. Cave Johnson moved to lay that motion on the table; which motion, after a call of the House, was lost: Yeas 92, Nays 112.

The motion to re-consider was then adopted: Yeas 108, Nays 98.

The question then recurred on the motion of Mr. Underwood, made yesterday, to lay the bill on the table. Mr. U. refusing to withdraw it, the question was taken, and the motion lost; Yeas 99, Nays 112.

The vote on the amendment of Mr. Clifford, yesterday adopted, was re-considered by a vote of Yeas 116, Nays 93; and then the amendment was rejected.

The amendment of Mr. Barnard, adopted in Committee, deferring the time for the act to take effect to the 1st of February next, was then adopted without a division.

The question being on the final passage of the bill, Mr. Wise moved a call of the House, which was negatived; Yeas 89, Nays 116.

The Bill was then passed; Yeas 111, Nays 106.

Mr. Morgan, to make it fast, moved a re-consideration of the vote on the passage, which was negatived: Yeas 99, Nays 115.

The bill to extend the Charters of the Banks of the District of Columbia was taken up in Committee of the Whole, and advocated by Messrs. Underwood and Powell, and opposed by Mr. Cave Johnson. It was then reported to the House, when a motion to adjourn having failed by 70 to 79, and an amendment having been rejected, the bill was passed: Ayes 111, Noes 106.

In Senate, the resolution of Mr. Benton directing the Secretary of the Treasury to communicate to the Senate the quantity of public lands now surveyed and prepared for market, was adopted.

The President laid before the Senate, a report from the Commissioner of the General Land Office, in conformity with the resolution of the Senate, showing the number of removals and appointment of clerks made by him, and also those in the four years from 1829, from '33, and from '37.

The hour of twelve, which was again looked to with great interest, arrived, and the Bank Bill and Veto Message were taken up; and on motion of Mr. Berrien, assigning, as a reason, first, the necessity of further opportunity of consideration on this important subject, were laid over till to-morrow, at the same hour, by a vote of Yeas 29, Nays 21.

The Distribution Bill was then again taken up, and debated at length with reference to amendments. An interesting debate arose between Messrs. White, Benton, King, Linn, Clay, and others, as to the cause of the delay of the bill, already so long. Mr. W. expressed the conviction that this measure would pass this Session, and other measures with it. The Locos above named took fire at this declaration, and construed this into an avowal that the bill was connected with other measures, which they, with much ado, denounced.

Mr. Clay thought this bill would pass. It would not be alone, but in good company. He mentioned the bills passed this Session; and last, though not least, was the Bank Bill, which, he hoped, though it was hoping against hope, would still be passed before they adjourned.

The Bankrupt Bill having been received from the House, the Distribution Bill was, on motion of Mr. Walker, laid on the table by Yeas 26, Nays 21; and the Bankrupt Bill taken up, the question being on concurring with the amendment of the House.

After a brief conversation, Mr. Allen moved to lay the bill and amendment on the table to the 1st of February next. This motion was lost by Yeas 23, Nays 26.

The amendment was then agreed to, and the Senate adjourned.

Thursday, Aug. 19.

The suspense is over—the anxiously-expected deliberation by the Senate of the Bank Bill and the President's Veto has to-day taken place, in the presence of a dense crowd in the Senate, who have listened with the utmost silence for a period of five hours to this subject.

The bill was taken up at 12 o'clock to-day, the question being, "shall this bill pass?"

[After a protracted debate between Messrs. Clay, of Ky., and Rives, of Va., partaking too strongly of a political character to find a place in our columns,]

The question was then taken, according to the Constitution, on the passage of the bill; it was lost by Yeas 25, Nays 24—two-thirds not voting therefor.

In the morning hour, a resolution of Mr. Wright, instructing an enquiry into the expediency of the appointment by the President and Senate, of commissioned officers in the Revenue Cutter service, was adopted.

The resolution of Mr. Woodbury, instructing the Committee on the District of Columbia to inquire into the nature of disturbances in the galleries of the Senate, at the passage of the Bank Bill and the reading of the Veto Message, and at the President's House the night of the Veto, and into the proper measures for repressing similar disturbances in future, was discussed briefly, and laid over to the next Session of Congress.

The Distribution was taken up, and an amendment of Mr. Benton to give the new States 12 1-2 instead of 10 per cent. on the sales of the lands, and one of Mr. Clay of Ala., to reduce, after a certain time, the prices of the lands to one dollar, and then to seventy-five cents per acre, were rejected.

In the House, the amendments of the Senate to the Fortification Bill were taken up, in Committee of the Whole, and after some consideration, several being disagreed to in Committee, the bill was reported to the House, and it then adjourned.

Friday, Aug. 20.

In Senate, the bill to revive and extend the charters of the Banks in the District of Columbia came back from the House amended. The amendments were concurred in: Yeas 24, Nays 14.

Mr. Kennedy of Md. introduced a resolution in favor of simplyfying the duties and reducing the number of officers of the Customs. Adopted.

M. J. G. Floyd called up his resolution calling for documents connected with the McLeod affair. After some debate, Mr. Maxwell moved that it do lie on the table. Lost; Yeas 78, Nays 111. The subject was then laid over to Monday.

The Fortification Bill was taken up, considered, some of the Senate's amendments agreed to, others rejected, and the bill returned to the Senate.

Mr. Sergeant, of Pa., now moved that the House go into Committee and take up bill 14, being the House (not the Senate,) bill to create a Fiscal Bank. The motion prevailed. Mr. S. now moved that the whole bill be stricken out, and another inserted, identical with the former in most of its provisions, but differing in the following respects:

1. The Capital to be $21,000,000 (instead of thirty;)

2. To deal wholly in Exchanges; no Discounts;

3. The title to be 'Fiscal Corporation' (instead of Bank;)

4. To have Agencies in the States (instead of Branches.)

After debate, the new bill was ordered to be printed, and then the House adjourned.

Saturday, Aug. 21.

In the Senate, to-day, the Distribution Bill was taken out of Committee, and considered with reference to amendments during the day.

Mr. McRoberts renewed his motion to insert, the Territories of Wiskonsan, Iowa, and Florida, so as to share the distribution. It was adopted, Yeas 22, Nays 18.

Mr. Berrien offered an amendment providing that the distribution shall cease, if, after the 20th June, 1842, the rate of duties on imports shall be increased beyond 20 per cent., ad valorem, to operate again whenever the duty shall be advanced to 20 per cent.

An interesting, and, at the close, excited debate followed on this amendment, extending into the general subject of the tariff question. Messrs. Bates and Huntington opposed, introducing in the Distribution Bill, a provision that should deprive Government of the power of supplying its necessary wants, by an imposition of duty, Messrs. Benton, Calhoun, King and Walker, made a violent outcry against the amendment, as treacherously intending a violation of the compromise Act. The Senate then adjourned.

In the House of Representatives, Mr. Sergeant introduced a resolution to take the Fiscal Corporation Bill out of Committee on Monday next, at 4 o'clock P. M., and called the previous question.

After a long and angry debate the resolution was adopted: Yeas 116, Nays 75.

The bill was then taken up in Committee of the Whole, Mr. Dawson of Ga. in the Chair.

Mr. Sergeant, in his usually clear and practical manner, supported the bill. Mr. Wise of course opposed it.

Mr. Turney then moved to strike out the enacting clause of the bill, and on this motion Mr. Wise took the floor, and succeeded in speaking another hour, which he devoted to manifestations of the bitterness of his feelings against Mr. Clay.

Mr. Proffit asked leave to offer a resolution asserting the power of Congress to repeal the charter of a fiscal agent, if established. The resolution was objected to.

Mr. Marshall of Ky. took the floor on the Fiscal bill, and the Committee rose, and the House adjourned.

Monday, Aug. 23.

The Distribution Bill, in the Senate, was to-day ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, by Yeas 28, Nays 22.

The important amendment offered by Mr. Berrien, Saturday, and modified to-day, was adopted, providing for the suspension of the distribution, while the duties on any article of imports are above 20 per cent. ad valorem.

The resolution of Mr. Tappan to adjourn Congress on the 30th inst., was laid on the table.

A resolution from the Committee on Naval Affairs for the purchase of American water-rotted hemp, for the use of the Navy, was debated at some length, and laid over till to-morrow.

The President laid before the Senate a communication from the Commissioners of the General Land Office, in answer to a call of the Senate, stating that the quantity of public lands now prepared for, but not brought into market, was over eight millions of acres.

In the House of Representatives, the Fiscal Corporation Bill was passed. It was taken up soon after the meeting this morning, under the resolution to take it out of Committee at 4 o'clock.

Mr. Marshall strongly advocated the bill, and answered with great effect the speech of Mr. Wise. Mr. W. had opposed the bill, not from principle, but because it would be vetoed. This Mr. M. did not believe would be the case; but they ought to go on and do their duty, whatever might befall it elsewhere. He was listened to by a vast assembly, and by the Members, with much interest.

Mr. Proffit with much animation addressed the House, defending the course of the President, ridiculing the Fiscal Bank Bill and approving the Veto. He admired the course of Mr. Wise, and declared himself under the banner of John Tyler.

Mr. Gilmer took similar grounds. The bill was also advocated by Messrs. Wm. Cost Johnson, Pope, Everett, and Underwood. The question was then taken, the hour of four having arrived. The motion to strike out the enacting clause was lost by a large majority. No amendments were adopted in Committee except those of Mr. Sergeant. The bill was then reported to the House, and the same amendments agreed to, those under the operation of the Previous Question, and the bill ordered to be engrossed, by Yeas 129, Nays 94—29 majority. The bill was then read by its title, 3d time, and the question being on its passage, some twenty persons sprung to their feet, among whom Mr. Wise was prominent, and cried "Mr. Speaker," "Mr. Speaker!" The Speaker gave the floor to A. L. Foster, who moved the Previous Question. Mr. Wise raised a point of order, and insisted that the entire bill be read, that they might have a "fair start" for the floor. It was read entire, and consumed about an hour. There was now a great scramble for the floor—Mr. Wise again failed of getting the floor, and the Previous Question was moved on the passage.

Mr. Irwin moved to postpone the bill to the 1st Monday in December. The motion was decided out of order.

Mr. Cave Johnson moved to lay the bill on the table; which was negatived: Yeas 98, Nays 126.

The question was then taken, and the bill finally passed, by Yeas 125, Nays 94—a majority of 31!

Mr. J. C. Clark moved a reconsideration of the vote, which (as he intended,) was negatived.

The title was then amended on motion of Mr. Sergeant, and is "an act to provide for the safe-keeping and disbursement of the public revenues; and to create a Fiscal Corporation for National purposes."

This was agreed to under the operation of the Previous Question.

Mr. Wise then got the floor and moved a re-consideration of the last vote, and on this undertook a speech on the merits of the bill, and in reply to Mr. Marshall; but after being several times called to order, took his seat, withdrew his motion, and then the House adjourned, after a more than nine hours' session.

The Illinois members have arrived, Mr. Stuart yesterday, and Messrs. Casey and Reynolds to-day, were qualified and took their seats.

Tuesday, Aug. 24.

In the Senate, this morning, the "Fiscal Corporation" bill was received from the House. Mr. Berrien moved that it be read by its title, a first and second time, for the purpose of reference. It was by general consent, once read. To the second reading Mr. Allen objected, and the question was taken and carried: Ayes 18, Noes 17. The President then stated the question, 'shall it now be read.' No objection being made, the Secretary commenced the reading. Mr. Allen interrupted it and objected. Mr. Tallmadge said it was too late for objection, opportunity for which had been given, and the reading had now commenced. Messrs. Calhoun, Tappan and Mouton contended that it was then in order to object. It was decided not in order by the Chair, and the reading was completed.

Mr. Tappan immediately rose, and moved to postpone the bill indefinitely, and called the Yeas and Nays. The Whigs were thus taken completely by surprise and astonishment, as many of their members had not yet taken their seats. The question was announced by the Chair, and there appeared a strong probability that it would be carried.

Mr. Berrien took the floor, and cried "Mr. President." After a pause, indicating his surprise at the dilemma in which they were placed, and his consciousness that the question must not be taken till more of his friends were present, he called on the Senators to consider if this was the proper course to take on this bill. They had repealed the Sub-Treasury, it was their duty to protect the Public Treasury; and now they proposed to destroy for the Session a measure for this object, and thus defeat the action of the House and the will of the people. Several Whigs now coming in, he took his seat, and the question was taken and the motion lost: Yeas 21, Nays 24.

The bill was then referred to a Select Committee, and not to the regular Committee, that on Finance, of which Mr. Clay is Chairman, and who expressed his desire not to have the guardianship of this bill, as well as a doubt whether he should vote for it.

The Distribution Bill was then read a third time—the entire bill, and the question being on its passage, Mr. Calhoun spoke about an hour and a half with his characteristic ability, in opposition to the bill, as unconstitutional—most fatally so, and inexpedient.

Mr. Archer differed from either party on this question. The authority given Congress by the Constitution, to "dispose" of the lands, gave them the broadest power, and it was their duty to make the best use of them. If any other better use could be shown he would not vote for the bill. He did not conclude his remarks; and the Senate went into Executive Session.

In the House of Representatives, petitions were presented by Mr. Coles of citizens of Lynchburg, Va., against a Bankrupt Law; and by Mr. Adams of citizens New-Hampshire to extend the right of suffrage to the District of Columbia, which were laid on the table.

The resolution for the distribution of the Census Report was passed.

The Bill making an appropriation of more than four hundred thousand dollars, to enable the Post-Office Department to settle its dues, was taken up and debated during the day by various members.

No question was taken, and the House adjourned.

News of the Day.

A lawsuit was recently decided in one of the courts of Mercer co., Pa., in which the original debt was $7,07 and the costs $204,94.

Slavery at the West.—A decision was not long ago made by the Ohio courts, that a slave voluntarily brought into the State should be free. A writer in the Cincinnati Gazette says, that another decision is in prospect, and will be insisted on, to this effect. "That no slave can be reclaimed, if he be freed in the State, except he have escaped from some one of the original thirteen State. The Constitution gives no authority to arrest fugitive slaves, to new slave States. It was confined to the old States, and has never been extended. If this decision shall be made, it will have a great influence.

Mormon Purgatory.—It seems that the purgatory has been adopted as a Mormon doctrine. An easy way is also fixed to get people out of difficulty, by the payment of a good round sum. The doctrine is that a friend of any one dead may be baptized in his name, and the substitution is the same as if the heretic himself had been baptized. For this good purpose two old soldiers have recently been baptised in Illinois by a Mormon Elder, one by the name and on behalf of George Washington, and one by the name of and in behalf of Wm. H. Harrison.—The plan of substitution by the Mormons must be dangerous to the Roman priests, for it operates quicker and cheaper than masses, and just as good exactly.—J. of Com.

U. S. Steam Ship Mississippi.—This steam-ship was built at the Navy Yard in Philadelphia, and is nearly completed. The Philadelphia Inquirer contains a particular description of her. Her length is 229 feet. Her breadth of beam 40 feet, and from her upper deck to the keelson, 23 1-2 feet. Her burthen is 1800 tons. Her armament consists of 6 Paixhan guns, which are placed on the upper deck. Of these, two have a bore of 10 inches, and four of 8 inches. She has two engines which weigh 500 tons; each is of 250 horse power. She is provided with nine boats, which would probably carry three hundred men. Her cost when finished will be about $500 000, and it is supposed that she will form a part of the Home Squadron which has just been provided for by an act of Congress.

Hard Work.—The Boston Morning Star of the 5th of August, says:

"John Hawkins, the apostle of temperance, returned to this city yesterday, having been absent twenty days, and during that time has delivered 36 lectures, and raised up a mighty army of tee-totalers in Maine."

In France out of a population of thirty-two millions, twenty-two millions have but six cents a day to defray all expenses—food, lodging, raiment and education. England and Ireland are in no better condition.

Alexander Wm. Holmes, one of the crew of the ill-fated 'William Brown,' has been arrested and committed for trial on a charge of murder, committed in throwing over the passengers in that vessel from the boat in which they had taken refuge, as already published. The testimony against him is positive, and the jury will be called to decide whether the conduct of the crew was or was not murderous.

Wool.—We understand that the business with this article has again commenced. The first quality sells in this market at rates varying from forty-four to fifty cents, cash. Common wools from thirty to forty cents, also for cash. This is some improvement over the state of things for two or three years past.—Po'keepsie Eagle.

What would the world be without the Yankees.—We are informed by the Nashua Telegraph, that Mr. Samuel Shepard, of that town, has just completed a set of machines, for planing, tonging and grooving, pannel and moulding, mortising, and sash-making, which are to be shipped for St. Petersburgh, Russia, this week, to an establishment to whose order they were made.

Mormonism.—The Ottawa (Ill.) Free Trader of the 14th inst. states that within the ten days previous, between 3 and 400 Mormons passed through that place, on their way to the Mormon settlement in Hancock Co. The editor of the Free Trader recently counted, in one day, seventeen wagons, filled with men, women and children, all wending their way towards the settlements of the "Latter Day Saints." They hailed from western New-York, and their appearance was quite respectable. The settlement is now said to contain between 10 and 15,000 inhabitants, and the city of Nauvoo is represented as being in a flourishing condition. The sect are now engaged in building a large temple, containing a baptismal font supported by twelve oxen overlaid with gold.

Casualty.—On the 15th inst. Mr. Stephen Baker of Adams, being engaged in repairing the roof of a building, fell from a scaffold into a cistern, and was so much injured by the fall, that he survived but a few hours. Mr. Baker was a respectable member of the Seventh-Day Baptist church, in Adams. There is "hope in his death."—Sackets Harbor Journal.

POETRY.

Who is thy Neighbor!

BY MISS H. F. GOULD.

Thy neighbor? It is he whom thou
Hast power to aid and bless;
Whose aching heart and burning brow
Thy soothing hand may press.

Thy neighbor! 'Tis the fainting poor,
Whose eye with want is dim;
Whom hunger sends from door to door;
Go thou and succor him.

Thy neighbor! 'Tis the weary man,
Whose years are at the brim,
Bent low with sickness, cares and pain;
Go thou and comfort him.

Thy neighbor! 'Tis the heart bereft
Of every earthly gem;
Widow and orphan helpless left;
Go thou and shelter them.

Thy neighbor! Yonder toiling slave,
Fetter'd in thought and limb,
Whose thoughts are all beyond the grave;
Go thou and ransom him.

Whene'er thou meetst a human form
Less favor'd than thine own,
Remember 'tis thy neighbor worm,
Thy brother, or thy son.

O pass not, pass not heedless by;
Perhaps thou canst redeem
The broken heart from misery;
Go, share thy lot with him.

From the Knickerbocker, for August.

THE WHITE MOUNTAINS, NEW HAMPSHIRE.

Thirty miles north of Lake Winnepisiogee—a wretched misnomer, by the way, of the old Indian Winneepissaukee—is the nice little village of Conway. From here the views of the White Hills are exceedingly grand, their huge bodies embracing the whole horizon from the West around to the North-East, and their tops wreathed in clouds of snow. As you advance North, they fill up more of the space on every side, until at last you find yourself completely begirt with them, their rough sides hemming you in every where. As you approach them, population becomes more sparse, the land more rough and sterile, and every thing begins to assume an appearance of unformed, chaotic matter. We went on our way very cheerfully, over glade, and brook, and dingle, now threading the thickening forest, and now slowly passing the frail and tremulous bridge. "Speak well of the bridge that carries you safe over," says the adage, and I am sure that I never felt so much disposition to do a series of bridges justice; for while they always discharged their duty, they always left one wondering how they were able to do it. Here and there a log house appeared in the midst of a clearing, its wood chimney, and wood-plastered sides, and windowless holes, looking cheerless enough. Generally speaking, there is too little neatness around log-houses to give the picturesque cottage air, so attractive to the traveler; and the squalid children crowding out of the door to gaze at the passer-by, or rolling with the pigs in the mud and sand, make the tout ensemble of a new settler's habitation very repulsive.

The valley, which is traversed by all travelers visiting the White Hills, is intersected by the Saco river. A most delicious valley it is, shut in all around by mountains, fertile in the greenest grasses, and the loftiest trees, and most lovely, because it is the only level spot the eye rests upon in its reach over the huge elevations around. In the midst of this valley is the house of the elder Crawford. His sons, whom we shall have occasion to mention hereafter, all of them mountain men, descendants, in height and strength of limb, from Anak, live farther on. They pass a strange life of it, these Crawfords—three months in the year receiving and entertaining visiters from all parts of the world, and the other nine living in utter solitude. Still they are well content with their lot: hale, hearty, jovial fellows, all; ready to oblige the visiters to the hills in every possible way, and intimately associated in the traveler's mind with the curiosities of the place. It is here that you begin first to take in the greatness of these mountains. All around you, over-topping each other, they rise, and their immense size contrasts strangely with the house, the trees, every thing, indeed, near you. Your ideas are enlarged by taking in objects so much greater than you have ever seen before; and for a time there is a painful sensation in bringing the mind up to all this greatness and grandeur. As you get accustomed to them, the gratification is increased, and you are never tired of looking at the variety of prospects presented to you as you pass along. Now there is the deep and sacred indentation which the avalanche has left; then the dense, dark forest, into which no intruder has ever been, and on the trees of which no axe has ever fallen. Here is the deep precipice, and over it leaps the silvery streamlet; while there is some narrow and winding pathway, past rock, and moor, and hillock. Sometimes you find the solid body of rock torn all in fragments, and the huge boulders scattered in thick profusion over the ground, making whole miles the very 'abomination of desolation.' Farther on, the dwarf-oak and clustered hazles cover acres of ground, contrasting strangely with the high-towering forests around. The summits of the mountains are generally bare of all vegetation, and, except for one summer month, are covered with snow. The hot days of the last of July and the first of August usually melt away most of the old snow, although many of the crevices hold it unmelted from year to year, while by the first of September, and oftentimes before that, the morning breaks upon the snow-covered tops [illegible]

The younger Crawford, who has been the guide up the hills for many years, tells a great many laughable stories of the pertinacity of travelers in making the ascent after the season has passed. He gives his advice only as to the practicability of ascending, or the probability of a clear sky from the top, leaving the traveler to decide as to whether he will attempt it. A South Carolinian came here a few years since, on the last of September, which is a month later than the ascent is ever made. Mr. Crawford gave him his advice; told him of the difficulties of ascent so late in the year, and urged him against it. All would not do.—He had traveled hundreds of miles to stand on the highest land in the States, and he was not to be diverted from his purpose. He was accordingly furnished with horses, provisions, blankets, and all necessary comforts, and by early light, on the first clear morning, he set off with his guide in the perilous undertaking. After reaching the foot of the hill, they dismounted, secured their horses, and commenced the ascent. Before half of the labor had been accomplished, the clouds covered the heavens, and a thick fall of snow set in upon them. Still our traveler was undismayed, and encouraged and urged forward his guide. The snow fell so fast that the difficulty of moving onward increased every moment; and worse than all, the usual landmarks were buried from sight, so that the guide declared he was uncertain of the way. The stranger, however, was resolute; and through snow mid-leg deep, and the howling of a furious storm he urged on the fainting courage of his guide. Late at night the top of the mountain was reached, through difficulties that none but those who have been to the top of Mount Washington can imagine. When the guide proclaimed that the point had been gained, and that they stood on the very top, our traveler doubted, fearing that the guide, finding all persuasions to return fruitless, had determined to deceive him. "Is this positively the top of the hill?" "Yes, sir, positively." "Will you swear to it?"—"Yes, sir." "Hold up your right hand." The guide held it up. "You solemnly swear, that to your knowledge this place on which we stand is commonly called the top of Mount Washington, and is the spot to which you conduct all travelers who come to ascend the mountain So help you God!" The guide took the oath, and added, "This, sir, is the pile of stones which the travelers who come up here have heaped up." The gentleman put his hand upon the pile, and exclaimed, "I am satisfied; now let us return." The descent was accomplished with great difficulty, and at imminent peril, for the snow had so covered the path that it could not be seen at all, and it was not until noon of the next day that they arrived safely back at Crawford's.

We reached the Notch just after noon.—The entrance of the chasm is formed by two rocks standing perpendicularly at the distance of twenty-two feet from each other; one about twenty, the other twelve feet in hight. This opens you into a narrow defile, extending two miles in length, between two huge cliffs, apparently rent asunder by some great convulsion of Nature. This convulsion Dr. Dwight thinks was the Deluge, since there are no proofs of volcanic action any where in this region. Half the space is occupied by the Saco River, and the other half by the road. As you proceed in this pass, the huge mountains of bare cliffs and rocks tower above you on either side, and the view behind you is completely shut in, while that before opens upon bluffs and precipices of granite. Trees spring out from the rough projections, and wrench themselves from the narrow crevices, giving an air of caprice to the scene. The river winds along, bubbling over a rocky bed in some places, running in a deep channel in others, turning this moment round its mimic whirlpool, and the next starting rapidly off in its deep-worn channel. And then the cascades, up to the very skies, leaping in white foam down precipice after precipice, looking like some pure white riband floating in the air! How the waters sparkle in the sunshine, and tremble in the breeze, and bend downward a thousand ways in their rapid course! The fine basin of solid rock, too, in which they lie, so still, and pure and cool:

> 'A place itself so sweet and lonely,
> Seems fit for lovers, and lovers only.'

The deep, dark forest is in keeping with the whole; its low, sea-like music lulling your whole spirit into symphony with the beauty and grandeur of rock, water, and scaur. More than half-way through this valley stands the house occupied by the Wileys, the unfortunate family who were buried in an avalanche of the mountains in 1824. The story is a sad one, and every one who remembers the interest to which the tale was listened, after the event happened, visits the place with melancholy associations.

After you emerge from the Notch, the mountains begin to speedily open with increased majesty, and often rise to a perpendicular hight little less than a mile. The bosom of both ranges on each side of you is overspread by a mixture of evergreens with the large forest trees. The conical firs and spruces cover the tops of the smaller hills, and give an eastern air to the scenery. Farther up, vegetation seems stinted, and a forest of trees, scarce higher than one's head, shows the region of sterility and cold. Farther still, the smooth gray rocks, or the scanty earth, enveloped in a shroud of dark-colored moss, point out the region of perpetual winter.

A few hours' ride from the Notch brings one to the house of ETHAN A. CRAWFORD, par eminence the Man of the Hills. No person who has visited the White Hills, will ever forget the good nature, directness, honesty, and mirthfulness of mine host of the mountains. In personal appearance he is a most imposing man, standing six feet seven inches in his stockings, and exceedingly stout and well-proportioned. As a runner and wrestler, he is well known at the village gatherings, while in leaping he would easily outdo the famous juvenile feat of old Christopher North; nor would he fear to encounter 'the flying tailor o' Eurick, auld Hirplin Hurcheon, wha at hap-stap and loup, bate Christopher a' till sticks.' He is very strong, too, having oftentimes carried a lady in his arms half-way up Mount Washington. Imagine such a man, with a rough, brown face, well tanned by exposure to sun and wind, but smiling benevolence upon you, putting on a fur hat, over which brush has never been drawn, with a coarse homespun coat and pantaloons, a shirt-collar open at the neck, and stout cow-hide shoes, and you have a glimpse of our host and friend, Ethan A. Crawford. Go up to him and ask him whatever question you please, so it be but civilly put, and mark the good nature streaming out from his eyes as he answers you. Request from him a favor to yourself or your friends, and see how readily and cheerfully he moves to do it. Follow up your questions and demands; ask things which you know he cannot obtain for you without great inconvenience to himself or household; nay more, worry his dogs, over-ride his horses, leave open his garden gate, dirty his parlor, and still he is the same imperturbably good-natured Ethan A. Crawford.

The family are of Scotch descent, and have lived for three generations among the mountains. I was told the following anecdote some years ago, respecting the manner in which the property now belonging to the Crawfords was obtained from old Governor Wentworth.

The Governor, who was fond of seeing human nature under every form, and in the absence of all ceremony and constraint—a taste which the dignity of his station prevented from being gratified at his own house—was in the habit, while he resided at Woolfborough, of making excursions, without ceremony, and often unattended, into the various parts of the State. In one of these tours, he came upon the new log-house of the Scotch squatter, and finding the good man away at his work, he endeavored to render himself very agreeable to the buxom wife at home. Ignorant of the high station of her guest, the lady stoutly opposed his proffered gallantries, and on the return of her husband from the woods, complained to him of the incivility of the stranger. Crawford, who, like his descendants of this day, was a man of great good nature, rather fancying the appearance of the Governor, and tired of his long solitude among the mountains, passed off the complaint as a good joke upon the old man, and invited him to stay all night. The Governor assented, and Crawford, adjusting his out-of-doors work, returned to the house, his tongue loaded with inquiries, and his heart full of glee. The Governor was pleasant and facetious; the host became free-hearted and jovial, till at last, with a friendly and most familiar salutation betwixt the guest's shoulders, and a hearty and protracted shake of the hand, the gudeman declared he was the 'best fellow he had met wi' sin the days o' the baillie o' Glasgow, wha was aye fou' six days out o' the seven, and ended his life at last ae drifty night amang the snaw.'

As the night passed away, the ale flowed more freely, and the song resounded from the old rafters: the Governor's wit enraptured the host, and the lady even, overcoming her first dislike, grew gracious to so merry-hearted a guest. Early in the morning the stranger departed, not, however, without insisting upon a visit from his kind-hearted and hospitable landlord, at his house in Woolfborough, where, under the name of 'old Wentworth,' he was, as he alleged, sufficiently well known.

The visit in the course of time was paid and the attendants, being apprised of the jest, had Crawford introduced, very much to his surprise and confusion, into the Governor's presence. Here he was banqueted and feasted for some days, in a most princely manner, and dismissed at last with a deed of a thousand acres of land where he had settled.

The evening view of the scenery from Crawford's house was exceedingly fine. The afternoon had threatened rain, but as night came on, the last lingering among the dark clouds moved off, leaving only those high masses of white vapor, which among the mountains are the surest indication of fair weather. The pale moon rode high among them, pillowed as they were upon the deep blue of the sky, forming towers, and palaces, and islets, so changeful and fleeting that they seemed like the creations of fairy land. Some lofty pine trees near the house, in the greenness of their foliage, sighed gently in the soft breeze that had sprung up in the west, and the uneven, dark outline of the mountains loomed out in the faint moonlight, with a mysterious depth of shadow, well suited to the solemnity and stillness of the hour. Wearied with the journey and the intense excitement we had felt all the day, our party bade each other good night, and retired to rest, assured by our host that the morning would bring us a bright sky for our projected ascent of Mount Washington.

A NOBLE EXAMPLE.—Many years ago, in an obscure country school in Massachusetts, an humble, conscientious boy was to be seen, and it was evident to all that his soul was beginning to act and thirst for some intellectual good. He was alive to knowledge. Next we see him put forth on foot, to settle in a remote town in this State and pursue his fortunes as a Shoe-Maker, his tools being carefully sent on before him. In short time he is busied in the post of county surveyor for Litchfield County, being the most accomplished mathematician in that section of the state. Before he is twenty-five years old, we find him supplying the astronomical matter of an almanac published in New-York. Next he is admitted to the bar, a self fitted lawyer. Now he is found on the bench of the Superior Court. Next he becomes a member of the Continental Congress. Then he is a member of the committee of six to declare the Declaration of Independence. He continued a member of Congress for nearly twenty years, and was acknowledged to be one of the most useful men and wisest councillors of the land. At length, having discharged every office with a perfect ability, and honored in every sphere the name of a Christian, he dies regreted and loved by his state and nation. This man was ROGER SHERMAN.—Connecticut Paper.

A GOOD REASON FOR DANCING.—A party of ladies and gentlemen (who elsewhere pass for intelligent beings) assemble at a ballroom. Soon they array themselves in opposing lines; presently a young lady jumps up from the floor, shakes one foot, and comes down again. Again she springs up, & the other foot quivers. Then she turns round in her place, springs up, and shakes both her feet. Her intelligent partner opposite performs the same operations. Then both rush forward, seize each other's hand, and jump up again; then shake their feet, and stand still. The next lady and gentleman very rationally and soberly follow the example just set by them, jumping, shaking, and turning, and so on to the end: all for no other reason, that I can perceive, than because black Cuffee sits in the corner drawing a horsehair across a catgut.

ANECDOTE.—A young minister received a call from two different societies at once, to become their pastor. One was rich and able to give him a large salary, and was well united. The other was poor, and so divided that they had driven away their minister. In this condition he applied to his father for his advice. An aged negro servant, who overheard what was said, made this reply: "Massa, go where is the least money and the most devil." He took the advice, and was made the instrument of uniting a distracted church, and converting many souls unto Christ.

A FEMALE SLAVE.—I had purchased her for her great beauty, but soon found that she was active, intelligent and lively. At first our only means of conversing was by signs, and her eyes sparkled with pleasure whenever she succeeded in comprehending my meaning. After the task of preparing the evening meal had been concluded, I frequently called her to my side and endeavored to acquire her language, which was of a silvery sweetness, every word terminating in a vowel. Sometimes she sang the wild and plaintive airs of her country; and when I had explained to her that this also was not my native land, she would point me in the direction of her own, and her eyes would fill with tears at the recollection of her own happy home.—Wellsteds City of Caliphs.

ABSTRACTION.—Sir Isaac Newton, finding himself extremely cold one evening in winter drew his chair very close to the grate, in which a large fire had recently been kindled. By degrees, the fire kindled, Sir Isaac felt the heat intolerably intense, and rang his bell with unusual violence. His servant was not at hand at the moment, but he soon made his appearance. By this time Sir Isaac was almost literally roasted. "Remove that grate, you lazy rascal!" he exclaimed, in a tone of irritation very uncommon with that amiable and bland philosopher; "remove the grate, before I am burned to death!" "And pray, master," said the servant, "might you not rather draw back your chair?" "Upon my word," said Sir Isaac, smiling, "I never thought of that."

DIVERTING ACCIDENT.—Madame de Genlis relates in her memoirs, that one day, during dinner, the Dutchess of Mazarine, conceived the idea of giving a fete champetre at her splendid mansion in Paris. She assembled an immense crowd in her saloon, then just decorated and dazzling with mirrors which covered the walls from the ceiling to the floor. At the extremity of the saloon was a cabinet full of foliage and flowers, and on opening a gate, a transparency was to appear, showing a real flock of sheep, very white and well washed, defiling in a woodland, and led by a shepherdess, a dancer from the opera. Whilst this ingenious scene was preparing, and the company were dancing in the saloon, the imprisoned sheep escaped, it is not known how, and without dog or shepherdess, suddenly burst into the room, dispersed the dancers, and began butting their heads against the mirrors. The leaps and bleating of the affrighted flock, the noise they made in breaking the mirrors to pieces, the cries and fright of the women, the roars of laughter from the dancers, formed a much more amusing scene than that of the pastoral, which the company lost by accident.

ABSENCE OF MIND.—A very absent divine, finding his sight begin to fail, purchased a pair of spectacles; and on the first day of using them, preached for a brother clergyman, but was observed to to have them at the top of his forehead during the whole sermon. "So you have, at last, taken to spectacles, doctor?" said a friend after the service. "Yes," returned the unconscious absentee, "I found I could not do without them, and I wonder now I never used them till to-day!"

LA FONTAINE.—La Fontaine is recorded to have been one of the most absent of men; and Furetiere relates a circumstance which, if true, is one of the most singular distractions possible. La Fontaine attended the burial of one of his friends, and some time afterward he called to visit him. At first he was shocked at the information of his death; but, recovering from his surprise, he observed, "It is true enough, for now I recollect I went to his burial."

Science Important to the Mechanic.

BY D. G. WELLS.

From the earliest period of man's existence, down to the present time, the Mechanic has performed a most important part in the affairs of life. The world is indebted to him for that enlarged sphere of human happiness, which she is now permitted to enjoy. Were it not for the Mechanic, instead of our populous cities, scattered so profusely over the land, with their spacious domes and lofty spires, the howling wilderness, or the extensive prairie would greet the eyes of the traveler, and the inhabitants might be compelled to seek shelter within the dens and caves of the earth. The Art of Printing would never have been attempted, and we, instead of enjoying that knowledge of science and history which it is able to unfold, might this day be bound down with the iron chains of ignorance and superstition. The farmer would be compelled to resort to those means which nature alone has placed in his power for the cultivation of the soil, and for gathering the golden harvest which now so richly crowns his labor, and without the Mechanic the traveler would again be driven to the extremity of mounting his beast and performing the tedious journey of a week, which has now become but the relaxations and pleasures of a day. Consequently, on the Mechanic, to a great degree depend all those finer modes of living, which distinguish the enlightened from the savage nations.

The occupation of the Mechanic has been regarded by some as stamped with indignity and contempt; but of all the occupations of life none are more exalted; of all the varied employments of men, none are so well calculated to unfold the powers of the mind, and lead it on from discovery to discovery, and from invention to invention, as the pursuit of the different branches of Mechanical Science. A new field is ever open to him, and a rich harvest is the reward of his toil. The mind has always a fresh fund of materials, upon which to exercise itself; capable, by a thousand changes and combinations, of being improved without limit, yet without ever reaching the point of absolute perfection.

How noble and how useful are the Mechanic Arts! How well calculated to enlist the inquiring mind in the pursuit of those improvements which enlarge the sphere of human happiness, and strengthen the dominion of the intellectual over the material world! The Mechanic fills an honorable station in society—"a place," said Franklin, "more honorable than to be a ruler of nations."—England may boast of her titled aristocracy, and assert the infinite superiority of her wealthy nobles over those less favored in their birth or fortune; the rich and the proud of our own land may point to the industrious Mechanic with the finger of scorn, but in my estimation he should be ranked among the first of those whose exertions contribute most to the advancement of happiness in community.

But the Mechanic is too often disregarded by those who owe to him their highest esteem. Perhaps no class of society has been so poorly represented in the world of letters as this. Almost every other department of life teems with its advocates and champions. Literary Periodicals everywhere abound; political papers have multiplied until every party, and fragment of a party, has its hoard of documents; theology has its heralds: law its supporters and champions; medicine, surgery, and phrenology their defenders, and practitioners; and even animal magnetism, and the Graham system of sublimating the mind on bran bread and Taunton water, have received the support of the press. But the interests of the Mechanic have been almost entirely forgotten. The noble and glorious object of promoting his intellectual improvement, the dormant powers of his mind which by cultivation may spring up into active usefulness, and the various means by which he may become useful in society have scarcely been deemed worthy the attention of an enlightened people. It has been deemed enough for him that he pursues the beaten and unimproved track of his master, as if labor was the only means on which he could rely for success in life, and as if interchange of opinion, diffusion of knowledge, and intellectual cultivation were but the delusive dreams of imagination, or not worth the pursuit.

But the dark ages of ignorance have passed away, and those on whom the prosperity, wealth, and glory of our country so much depend, are assuming a position more adequate to their real worth. Yes the day is fast approaching when the intelligent Mechanic will be ranked as high in society as those who now hold important offices in government. We see no surer mark of the progress of society in the paths of refinement, than the elevation of the Mechanic to his proper station, where his mental powers as well as his physical strength are brought into action. It is the indispensable duty of every Mechanic to render himself competent to act upon all occasions, and in all circumstances of life. Intelligence and a knowledge of the various branches of science are within the reach of every one, and it only remains for him to extend his hand and receive the rich boon which is so freely proffered to all.

But, with regard to the master Mechanic how important is his station! how great the responsibilities resting upon him! He has placed under his care, those whose minds he has the power of moulding for extensive usefulness. How important, then that he rightly performs his duty! He is bound by the strongest ties to watch over them, and instil into their uncultured minds the genial rays of science and morality.—How honorable it will be to him in after life, to see his apprentices become useful and intelligent citizens; while they will remember him with grateful affection to their dying hour. But on the other hand, if he manifests no interest in their welfare—never gives them a word of caution—never laments over their follies, or rejoices in their deeds of benevolence, they will be glad to be released from his company, and use every means in their power to rid themselves of so unworthy a master. Let him be anxious for the welfare of his apprentices, and he will have the satisfaction of knowing that he is forming characters that will be respectable, intelligent, and virtuous in society.

The Mechanic has every encouragement to cheer him on in the delightful paths of scientific research, as well as mechanical skill. Contrast the light of the present age with the darkness of the fourteenth century. Then the Art of Printing was unknown; but by this grand mechanical invention, the dark clouds of ignorance were dispelled, and the genial rays of science began to dawn upon a race of intelligent beings.—Since that time, the inventive genius of man has been continually progressing, until it has reached its present state of perfection. By the union of science with the arts, he has been able to plough the rough sea with a rapidity that has excited the astonishment of man; he has been able to rush over the land with almost electric speed, and even to soar on high, and gently float upon the breeze, or ride upon the furious winds; and perhaps still greater inventions than these are yet to be made by the scientific mechanic. Let him then, no longer linger around the shrine of ignorance, paying excessive homage to this impious monster; but let him rend the vail that darkness his most noble feature, and emerge from the obscurity which has so long enveloped him. Let him become versed in science and the arts, and he will become truly great. Let him become virtuous, and the smiles of heaven will beam brightly along his pathway.

THE PRIVILEGE OF PRAYER.

"Prayer, ardent, opens heaven—lets down a flood
Of glory on the consecrated hour
Of man in audience with the Deity." YOUNG.

We are so familiar with the privilege of retiring for secret devotion or of meeting together for social prayer, that it is difficult for us to conceive what must have been the emotions of the first Christian who was permitted to speak to God, with the expectation of being heard and answered. We read in Genesis iv. 26—at the birth of Enos, the son of Seth—"then began men to call on the name of the Lord." Previously to this time, sacrifice alone seems to have been required or accepted. But when by a typical atonement, access to the mercy seat had been procured, permission was granted to man to make known his requests unto God, through the medium of prayer.

Let us endeavor to place ourselves for a moment in the situation of the first mortal who ever entered the presence chamber of the King of kings to open his heart, with all its depravity, and sorrows, and wants, before him. What emotion must have agitated his bosom! Could he be certain that God would hear his petition, across the immense space which separates this earth from the heaven of heavens? Would not so humble a suppliant be overlooked amid the myriads of bright intelligences who bow before the throne? Might he expect that the ear even of infinite mercy would stoop to listen to praises so slow, when the music of the celestial choir is filling all the heaven with harmony? Faith whispers words of encouragement, and the first faint breathings of desire ascend to an unseen God, while with trembling expectation he waits for the answer. Under such circumstances, could the Christian utter unmeaning and heartless words, or go away without waiting to hear what God would say in return? We feel this to impossible, and are sure that prayer must then have been an intensely interesting and solemn service, in which the soul dealt honestly with itself and with its Maker.—And why should it not be so now? Is it less a privilege to speak to our Father in heaven, because the sacrifice of Jesus has made the throne of grace accessible at all times, and to every individual of the human family?

The passage in the Hebrews, translated, "Let us come boldly to the throne of grace," is literally "Let us come speaking freely." How this sweet expression simplifies prayer, without lowering at all either its character or spirit! It presents God to us as a Father, who listens to the oft-told story of the wants and complaints of his child with an interest which love alone can supply. Surely, fellow-Christian, we have sufficient encouragement to speak freely in prayer, whether we look at the word or the providences of God. Who ever called upon him with the whole heart, and was not answered? Who ever presented a petition in the name of Jesus, and was turned away unheard? Blessed Redeemer, we are thy witnesses that every gracious word thou hast uttered in reference to hearing prayer, has been a thousand times fulfilled in our own experience. When we have called upon thee thou hast heard and answered, even while we were yet speaking, and thy munificent goodness has exceeded the thoughts or wishes of our hearts. We are ashamed, when we remember how lightly we have esteemed a privilege purchased for us at such an infinite expense, and how slow we have been to avail ourselves of its rich blessings. Christians, have you any thing to say unto God? say it in the name of Jesus, simply, freely, and with childlike confidence in his ability and willingness to hear, and you cannot be disappointed. "Without faith, it is impossible to please God;" and this is undoubtedly the reason why so many prayers remain unanswered. The Christian feels some desire for the thing he requests of the Lord, but has no belief that it will be granted, and in fact often forgets to watch for the answer. Is it wonderful that such an one goes empty away? He has rendered it impossible for Jehovah to answer his petitions without compromising his character in the eyes of all intelligent beings.—Whosoever would come acceptably to God, must believe not only that he is, but that he is the rewarder of all those who diligently seek him. We must believe that when we ask for things agreeable to his will, he always heareth us; and, if we know that we have the things desired of him, for his own mouth has promised it—and hath He spoken, and shall he not make it good? They that wait upon the Lord in the way of obedience and faith, shall never be disappointed nor confounded, world without end.

THE FALLEN FAMILY ALTAR.

It was fair and beautiful when it was standing; for it was a monument of man's regard for his Maker; may I not say, of man's regard for those most near and dear to him. What an agency for good to the whole family circle is the domestic altar! Its incense pleases Him in whom all the families of the earth are blessed. How many mercies silently distil upon that household, because its altar stands. How many evils are averted because that is an house of prayer! How powerful and happy the restraining influences over the whole circle of worshipers, are those scenes of domestic worship! How many temptations have they repelled! How many insiduous snares of Satan have escaped through their influence! They have been like the pillar of fire by night, and the pillar of cloud by day.

But the altar is fallen! No incense burns there. That beautiful monument is prostrate in the dust. Surely none but ruthless hands could make such a desolation. Who is the destroyer?

That pious wife did not do it. It was her zeal and love, that most powerfully contributed to its erection. And she has upheld it with an unwavering and resolute hand. As it trembled to its fall, did she not tremble! And when it fell, did she not deeply mourn the desolation? There is not a spectacle of sadness more painful to her, than that fallen family altar.

Did the loved little ones of that domestic circle pull the altar down? They? They were surprised and astonished when it fell! Their little hearts felt that something sad had occurred in their home. The stated hour of worship came; but there was no worship, for the altar was gone!—They were sad. They felt bereaved.—They asked a mother's explanation. She answered with her tears.

Did the Reason and Conscience of the husband and father pull that altar down?—They never did such a dreadful work. They interposed. They sent a remonstrance that shook the soul of him that was proposing the altars overthrow. His soul has not forgotten the rebuke which, like injured friends, they poured upon it, the day that he threw the altar down.

Will that altar rise again? If the tears of a pious wife could do it—if the spiritual wants of that lovely group of children could do it—if conscience might be heard, then would the altar be raised again. But these have all failed. Their voice of remonstrance and entreaty has poured forth long and loud the powerful appeal. But the altar rises not!

What responsibility is his who suffers it to lie in the dust! He robs God of his Glory. Robs his domestic circle of the most powerful dissuasions from vice, the most powerful agencies of virtue and piety. He robs his own soul of substantial happiness. He cannot do all this, and not arm a just and holy God against him. It will be sad for him to die reflecting upon the FALLEN FAMILY ALTAR.—Boston Recorder.

THE UNCONVERTED MOTHER.

Perhaps the eye of some may rest on these pages, who are conscious that they cannot be addressed as CHRISTIAN MOTHERS in the sense of the term; and if there be one such, permit me to ask that one, if she is conscious of what she is doing? As you are voluntary agents, I am not at this time to object to the ruin of your own souls, but I have a right to ask you whether you have a right to ruin the souls of your own children? If you ask, are not our children our own? I answer with emphasis, surely they are not. They are a sacred trust committed to your care; they were lent to you of God, and they belong to him. But even conceding that they were your own, are they yours to destroy, oh what a satyr on a mother's love, is a mother's irreligious, impenitent, worldly heart! We are told in history, that when Egypt was once under the direful scourge of a universal famine, it was no unusual thing for parents with most unnatural appetites to feed on the bodies of their children; and when asked how they could do this desperate act, many a mother has been heard to say, stung to agony by the reproach and well nigh maddened by hunger; "Is not the child my own, and had I not better feed on its mangled limbs than that the stranger should do it?" We shudder with horror, and yet more cruel is that mother who by precept or example, or both, leads her children to the ruin of eternal death. And yet this refinement of cruelty is the acheivement of every mother who keeps her own heart from the submission of obedience to the gospel of Christ. Tell me, unconverted mother, do you desire that your children should be saved? What folly to suppose they will embrace the religion which you reject—that they will give their hearts to the Savior from whom you keep your own—that they will yield to the love which you trample underfoot, and obey the grace to which you daily do despite. If you love their souls, I tell you you exhibit some love for your own. You must bring your heart to the altar of the Savior, and then you may expect to take your children with you. If you wish them to go to Jesus Christ, you must imitate the conduct of the Mother in the gospel, and bring them to him. Oh, where in the world of woe will there be a sight more appalling to the spirits of the lost, than father, mother, children a family of hell! Say not I am harsh, the theme demands it, and I would rouse you impenitent mothers, to a sense of your condition; not only by the salvation of your own souls, but by the tenderest plea which nature, or rather nature's God, puts into my mouth, a mother's love, I beseech you to have mercy on your own souls, that your children may escape from a ruin how little less than inevitable. "Give no sleep to your eyelids," till "it is well with you," and then will hope for your children's souls date its birth from the moment that it sprung into being within your own bosoms; and thus, saved yourselves, you may be the honored instrument of their rescue from eternal ruin, and with them rejoice forever in the bliss of a secured salvation. If there is a sight which may kindle a new rapture in the bosoms of the saints made perfect, it will be the sight of A FAMILY IN HEAVEN.—Dr. Iredell.

DEATH THE SUPPORT OF LIFE.

"There is neither waste nor ruin in Nature!" for the smallest particle of matter in the vast universe around us, is composed of an infinite number of atoms, which can never be destroyed, but being united with other atoms, constitute a new combination. One plant decays, scatters its seed, and another springs up perhaps more beautiful, in the place which it occupied. Even that which we look upon with disgust and horror, is a "step in the progress of life." The tiniest thing that moves—we behold decay moving through its veins, and its corruption, unconscious to itself, engenders new tribes of life. There is not such a thing as beauty, there is not such a thing as life, that does not generate from among its corruption, "a loathsome life for others."

The dust which we trod under foot has become a beauteous rose-bud, filling the air with its fragrance; or a lofty oak, imparting its shade to every thing around. It may have formed a part of the winged eagle, who hovers in regions of space, or the gigantic elephant, who treads the earth with majesty. It may have tended the formation of the human frame. How strange that the dust of the earth should give to the lip of lovliness its richest glow! to the ear its innumerable and exquisitely minute cavities! and to the eye its floating humors, and brilliant collorings! How strange that it should form the enclosures to the "divine itself"—the soul! That it should form the tenement of the earthly fancy, that loves to soar in unknown regions. The memory, that treasurer of the soul!—the reason, that weighs and ballances, that guides, determines and proves! Changes are continually going on among all living bodies. The drop of water that to-day sparkles in the diamond, and to-morrow gives its calm quiet beauty to the pearl, soon becomes the fleecy heavy cloud, floating in the blue sky, and again descending, gives freshness and health to the humble night flower, or the burning blush to the cheek of the early rose.

"The Snow-Flake of winter revives when the sunbeams are yellow and warm." and form a gem for the spotless cup of the lilly, or is restored in the blossom of the jessamine. Although change and decay are stamped upon all animated nature,—although the flower which buds and blossoms in the morning, in the evening lies withered and dead—although the frame of youth, with its health and strength and beauty, reposes in the dark sepulchre—yet there is one thing earthly, which mocks death and decay—the never-dying soul; that which alone tests man's divine origin—alone renders him superior to the brute creation. The soul is immortal, eternal. It undergoes NO CHANGE, suffers no decomposition: but when decay has fixed its signet upon the human frame, it rises like a brilliant Phœnix, from the funeral pile. Free and unveiled, it embraces its divine destiny. The torch of DEATH renews its youth.—South. Lit. Mess.

SATAN IN THE PULPIT.

MESSRS EDITORS:—With your permission, I will take the trouble of exposing to the public, (through the medium of your welcome visitor the Record,) the name of a certain individual, with whom I (once at least) had a conflict. I do not expect to be accused of unjust slander, by making this exposure, especially by that portion of our readers whose duty it is (with the writer) to teach from the pulpit, as I have no reason to believe that they entertain a better opinion of the individual, than your humble correspondent, and perhaps have often been intruded upon by him, in the same way of which I complain.

The particulars of what I have to relate are as follows:—

Upon a fine Sabbath morning in June, I repaired to the sanctuary of God, at the usual time for public worship, with my mind dwelling upon the subject which I had selected as suitable to present to the people of my charge at that time. Being a few minutes before the time, (as my custom is.) I exchanged a few civilities with those who had already assembled, and then passed into the pulpit, to spend the time of waiting in meditating upon the subject in hand, and ejaculatory prayer to God for his blessing to descend upon me and the congregation, when to my grief, I found the individual of whom I speak, already in the pulpit. The time of his entering was something of a mystery to me; whether he had gone in previous to my arrival, or had slipped up (unobserved by me) at the time of my entering, I am not prepared to determine: sufficient to know that he was there, and that without an invitation.

Having had some previous acquaintance with him as a preacher, (though I do not recollect ever seeing the epithet Reverend prefixed to his name, as is common to those of modern preachers,) and judging from the general tenor of his doctrine, I thought that his services would not be profitable for the people under existing circumstances. I therefore sat down without speaking to him; upon which, (without any seeming notice of my coolness and to my great annoyance, he immediately commenced whispering to me.

"A fine morning, sir,—you are likely to have a large congregation to display your talents before, to-day." I merely answered that I was pleased to have the opportunity of preaching the truth (by Divine assistance) to a large number of hearers, especially if they are attentive ones.—and still manifested coolness and indifference towards him, which I wished him to notice.

"On occasions like this," said he, "it would be expedient to present and discuss popular subjects." "To what end?" I asked. "That we might gain popularity ourselves." "Applause, then, seems to be your aim." "No farther than usefulness is concerned," replied he. "And," inquired I, "what are the popular subjects of which you speak?" "Oh! the popular subjects, sir, are many; for instance, Morality is quite popular in the world—enough more so than Holiness, even among the rich and influential part of mankind; and this is the class of people whose favor we ought, by all means, to secure, that we may the more easily procure means for our temporal support and comfort; and if we would gain the good will and high esteem of such folks, (which indeed is very important,) we must not be so earnest in pressing upon their minds the necessity of sanctification, experimental religion, or such entire dependence upon the merits and grace of Christ as the manner of some is. Neither must we present such a numerous train of benevolent objects for their action, if we would reserve a good living for ourselves; nor insist on such a strict observance of church discipline." Happy for us, thought I, that you were not called upon to preach in this place. "But, sir, what is of still greater importance in this matter is, that we give all diligence to cultivate a more pleasing and graceful style of delivery by which alone, popularity is gained; for people of good taste at the present day, are apt to give more heed to the manner than to the matter of a sermon, which prevailing disposition should certainly cause us (their servants,) to direct the greater part of our attention to that department of study, by doing which, we shall make sure of one advantage, if no more, viz: that of worldly prosperity, which is of no small moment in these latter times."

I was so disgusted by this time, that, without making any reply whatever, I drew out my watch to ascertain the time, and was happy to find that the hour of preaching had arrived, and as I was just about to rise, he begged leave finally, to express his "doubts of the propriety of preaching at all for the time being, owing to the disappointment occasioned by the unexpected smallness of the audience." I bid him be still, and proceeded to discharge the duties of the hour.

Now, courteous reader, if you will permit me to express my opinion respecting this individual, I shall pronounce him to be the same that preached to our mother Eve, in the Garden of Eden, the effects of which sermon we all feel, more or less to the present day. You will therefore surmise by this, that his name (which I promise to expose,) is Satan. I. M. C.

DEATH.

"What a gloomy word!" methinks I hear some dear lively child exclaim, whose red cheeks and bright eyes are full of health and joy. "I shall not stay to read about that; if it was some pretty anecdote about the happy death of some Sunday scholar, such as this paper often tells us, why I would read it; but I'am too well and happy to read or hear any thing about Death." Stop a minute, dear child! Stop a minute, and I will not take up much of your time in showing you now, instead of thinking this a gloomy word, you may consider it one of the pleasantest words in language. So will you not pay attention while I notice three things: Firstly, the uncertainty of the approach of death,—Secondly, the cause and "sting" of it; and Thirdly, the great victor who has taken away its sting.

Do not think I am going to make a sermon, because I thus divide what I have to say; but you know method and order in any subject, help us to remember it so much better. First, then, the uncertainty of the day and the hour when death will approach you. And oh, that I could make you feel the truth of this in such a way, that you could not rest till you felt yourself prepared by the dear Savior of the young, to meet death without terror. One day this spring, I met a little boy between three and four years old, walking with his sister. He was very beautiful; his smooth cheek was very rosy with health, and he had such sparkling, large, dark eyes. As I looked at him, and kissed him, I thought I had never seen a child so beautiful. The day, too, was one of those sweet spring days, when the air seems to make the heart leap up with joy, and when we feel as we loved everything, & every one loved us. I dare say you know what such feelings are. The little boy and his sister seemed to be enjoying the new life and health that were abroad in the pleasant air.

In a short time from that, (just long enough to turn the buds into leaves,) I saw the little boy again. I went up into his nursery; the shutters were all closed, and I could but just see him on his little bed; and oh, how my heart ached when I see him. He did not know anything, for the inflammation on his brain had taken away his senses, and the doctors said he must die. His father was sitting by his side, holding his hand, and his sister was bathing his poor head, and his mother, walking up and down the room in agony; but all their love could not save him, or ease one of the pangs that caused such piercing shrieks. So this little lamb died, and was put in the grave.

You see then how uncertain the time when death may come. He will not stay his approach because you are young; he loves to choose the young, and leave the old to linger; neither will he because you are beautiful; for very often he seizes the fairest in a family, and they fade first; nor will he because you are so happy, and have thought of so many pleasures that you expect to enjoy in the bright summer; no, dear child, summer is frequently the harvest time for death, and he reaps down young children, as farmers do the pretty flowers that grow among the wheat. Then try and think often, that you cannot tell when you must die.

Secondly; attend to the "sting" of death. "The sting of death is sin." There are a great many reasons why we should hate sin. It is the only cause of God's anger and wrath. Jesus Christ was crucified for our sin. Yes, dear child, such a deadly and terrible evil was sin in the sight of God, that nothing but the shameful death of the cross borne by His Holy Son in human flesh could not atone for it. Sin grieves the Holy Spirit, & brought death into the world and all our woe. Every pain of body that makes us groan, and every sorrow of heart that fills us with tears, is the effects of sin. How we should hate it, and repent of it, and flee quickly (the younger we are the better,) to the only refuge from it.

This brings me to the joyful part of what I have to say. The same Jesus that was once crucified, is the great victor over death, who has disarmed him of his sting. Now, my dear child, as you do not know when you may die, it may be next week, or to-morrow, will you not go directly to God? Kneel down, and ask him to show you what a hateful thing your own sin is; then lift your heart to the Savior, and beseech him to take it, and put His Holy Spirit in it, that it may be pure and lowly, and full of love. Jesus will not say you are too young to enter his flock. O, no, he takes particular care of his lambs, He watches over them, and even "Carries them in his bosom." Then how happy you will be! How much more you will enjoy life, and how ready you will be to meet death. It will no longer be a gloomy world, making you think of the shroud, and tight coffin, and the damp earth; but a pleasant word bringing the thoughts of heaven, of the glorious Savior, of the angels and their harps and songs, surrounding the great White Throne, and all that the BIBLE tells us about that happy place. Death will have no "sting" for you! He will only seem like the doorkeeper of heaven; you cannot get in without passing him, and that may cost you a hard struggle, but you will not forget it directly; for the King of the palace will be waiting to receive you. And when, after the judgment, all CHRISTIANS, old and young, shall be gathered in, all will sit down to the marriage supper of the Lamb; "the door will be shut," and never opened again; the grim door-keeper will not be needed, but "Death himself shall die." Passing Events.

It is the duty of the Christian to prayerfully watch passing events. While we are eager to search ancient historical records, and to pry into the prophecies, we may be sadly deficient in not noticing what now transpires.

It is not unusual to meet with those who deeply blush if found to hesitate relative to a fact, or even a name or date in the page of history, yet consider it no disparagement to them, if they are unable to give the slightest account of some momentous event which has transpired in their own country, within a month past.

The Christian, while he studies the past, and humbly inquires what God has said concerning the future—must study on his knees the aspects of the present time. The Christian knows that God is the Governor of the Universe; and he knows that all events are under his control.

What mere men of the world speculate upon as lucky or unlucky chances, the Christian regards as varied links in that great chain of events, which God orders in reference to that final consummation of some magnificently glorious plan.

Hence, the doings of Congress, whether relating to financial affairs, or to those topics which more directly involve questions of a moral nature—are in his view filled with interest. That one vote, or that one veto, he well understands may be so joined with other events of the times, and also with coming events, as to reach the most sacred rights of coming generations. If these thoughts are correct, what enlightened Christian will fail to duly appreciate the secular intelligence which he finds in his religious periodical?

The Beauties of the Psalms.

Who can read the Psalms of David without being impressed with their beauty and sublimity? Look at his zeal to serve God in the temple, and we can but be struck with the beautiful expression that runs through his whole language. "As the hart panteth after the water-brooks, so panteth my soul after thee, O God. My soul thirsteth for God, for the living God; when shall I come and appear before God? My tears have been my meat day and night, while they continually say unto me, Where is thy God? When I remember these things, I pour out my soul in me," &c.—How beautiful the train of thought, and yet how sublime!

"As the hart panteth after the water-brooks." We must admire the simile, when we consider that in those countries of the East, where the sweet Psalmist resided, barren sandy deserts abounded, with but now and then, and these far between, an oasis or a rill, springing up for the refreshment of man or beast; and that while wandering over, perhaps, some great desert like the Sahara, the thirst must have become intolerably intense; So, "as the hart panteth after the water-brooks," the soul of the pious David panted after God. His spirit thirsted after the living God.

"My tears have been my meat, day and night." How rich the expression! and how fraught with tender emotions! Tears have a voice that speak louder than words. Who has not been melted at the sight of the fast-falling tear? Look at the fond mother, as she bids adieu to her only child, the daughter of her bosom, and read her thoughts and anxieties in her tears. See that manly face of the father suffused in the liquid element as it flows from the deepest recesses of the heart; and say that tears do not speak. How delightful and how truly instructing to read the Psalms of David! That deep thought and rich may be traced through them that cannot be equalled by modern authors. The meekness and humility, the confidence and delight, in which he always expressed himself are bright memorials of the sincerity of his heart, and well might we copy after the Psalmist even at this late day of modern intelligence.

Arrest of Mills, the Horse Thief.

Our readers in this section of the country have doubtless been advised of the fact that a desperado, by the name of JOHN MILLS, who has been at the head of a gang of horse thieves, committing depredations upon the people of Madison, Cortland, and Chenango counties for a few months past, has been arrested. It will also be gratifying to them to learn that, notwithstanding the numerous tales of wo which have reached the ear concerning his capture, and his threats that the first man who attempted to make a prisoner of him "would pay the penalty with his life!" he was arrested without bloodshed. We would remark, by the way, that this notorious rogue formerly belonged to a "Circus" Company, which is a striking testimony in favor of the demoralizing influence of all such associations as the "Circus," the "Theatre," and the like.

We are favored with the following letter to M. Spear, P. M., from the Sheriff of Chenango co., which gives particulars.

SOUTH NEW-BERLIN, Aug. 28, 1841.

To the Post-Master of De Ruyter:

DEAR SIR,—One of my neighbors had a valuable Horse stolen on the night of the 15th inst., and you have probably seen an account of the taking of the thief in Albany, and the finding of the Horse. Believing the citizens of your place would like to know whether said thief was Mills, I thought proper to drop you this line.

I have just returned from Schoharie Court House, where I found said thief, who had thus far concealed his real name and residence. Upon seeing him, I asked him if he knew me; he denied. I told him I very well knew him. He then took me by the hand and said, "the evidence is such against me that I may as well tell the truth;" and said, "Gentlemen, I stole the Horse in question," and freely told me, when in his room alone with him, the particulars of taking the Horse, &c., being very careful not to criminate any other person. I also endeavored to get from him something that might lead to the finding of other Horses that have been stolen, but without much success; but he said I might say to those who had lost Horses that if they would come and see him, perhaps he could tell them something that would be a benefit to them, if they would do the thing that is right.

Mills was taken on an advertisement and placed in Schoharie County Jail. The Sheriff of Otsego County went with me with a Warrant, issued on complaint of the owner of said Horse, to take the thief from said Jail and bring him to Otsego County; but the Sheriff of Schoharie refused to deliver him, which I think to be an unwarrantable course. After said demand and refusal, a complaint was made before a Justice of that place, by Johnson, the man that took Mills on the advertisement, and Mills was brought into one of the Jury rooms in the Court House to confess the taking of the Horse before the Justice; and as soon as this was done, the Sheriff of Otsego made a prisoner of Mills, but was forcibly resisted in the removal of him by the Sheriff of Schoharie. The Justice then made out a mittimus, and he was again locked up, and Sheriff Jones, of Otsego, was obliged to return without him; and all this with no other reason given, than "I won't give him up—he shan't be removed!" My opinion is, that he will soon be removed to Otsego; that is, if he don't break Jail.

These proceedings, as related, I conceive to be entirely out of order, and I think it will be soon straitened out. He says Johnson has now in his hands $510 of Mills' money, and Mills told me that he placed some $300 more in the hands of a fellow that he liberated from Albany Jail.

Mills appears to be perfectly at his ease, and says, he regrets most that he is detected as a Horse thief. He says if he had robbed some man, or a Bank, of $80 or $100,000, "he should then be a Gentleman, but now, nothing but a horse thief!" It is really interesting to hear him talk. He is the most perfect rogue I ever saw. The little interview I had with him, would make quite a narrative, if I had time to write it. In great haste,

I am your ob't serv't,
ENOS S. HALBERT.

Beneficent.

Over $2,000 have been raised to aid the sufferers by the late explosion at Syracuse. The cool weather having been favorable for a few days past, the wounded are recovering with much greater facility than had been anticipated.

"The Northern Light."

Our readers have been favored already with a number of "original papers" from the "Northern Light," and they may have been able, ere this, to have formed some opinion in regard to the merits of the work. It is a Journal rich in merit, and ranks with the highest class of Literary periodicals in our country; nor, indeed, should we do injustice to any other class of periodicals by remarking that, in point of utility and useful knowledge, the "Northern Light" has not its rival in Periodical Literature. It is, in fact, different from any other periodical extant. To our young men—yes, and ladies, too—we would hint, if you seek Useful Knowledge in Periodical Literature, it may be obtained from the Northern Light. It is entitled to more real merit than all the trashy "Gentlemen's Magazines," "Boston Notions," "New Worlds," "Rural Repositorys," &c. &c.

It is devoted to "Free Discussion, and the Diffusion of Useful Knowledge," and is under the editorial supervision of such men as JOHN A. DIX, GIDEON HAWLEY, AMOS DEAN, T. ROMEYN BECK, THOS. W. OLCOTT, and EDWARD C. DELEVAN, with a host of contributors of acknowledged talent. Published at Albany, monthly, (16 pp. quarto,) at $1 per annum, always in advance.

Sears' Blue Writing Fluid.

We have for a few days been using a Writing Fluid prepared by Capt. O. M. SEARS, of this village, and we take pleasure in recommending the article to the notice of the public; especially, as it speaks for the enterprize of our citizens. It appears perfect in all respects, and well adapted for all purposes where a firm and durable color is desired, as in the various branches of Book-keeping, Records, etc. Much care, however, should be observed to keep the Fluid entirely free from the effects of Black Ink.

☞ The article is prepared and sold wholesale and retail, by O. M. Sears.

Congressional News and the Mails.

We have received no city papers of this week, in consequence of the almost unendurable derangement in the mails on this route; we are left, therefore, without any later advices from Washington. We live in hope, however, that we shall soon have a daily mail again, as our enterprizing citizens have strongly petitioned the Post-Master General upon this subject, without distinction of party. May success attend the petition!

THE TEMPERANCE CAUSE IN DE RUYTER AND ITS IMMEDIATE VICINITY.—From what our correspondents "Interrogator" and "Respondent" have said, our readers will naturally infer that the Temperance Cause is not advancing in De Ruyter and vicinity, as it is in many parts of our country. We can say nothing to prove the unsoundness of this inference, but we wish to do something to remove the facts—the humiliating facts on which it rests. Of course, we do not wish to see other communities advance with less rapidity in the good cause, lest we should continue to suffer by comparison—but we say, let us wake up, and "act well our part."

NEW TEMPERANCE HOUSE.—With pleasure we announce to our readers, and the traveling public generally, that Mr. ARDON MEAD, a gentleman respected and esteemed wherever known, has opened the "AUBURN HOUSE" on Temperance principles. This augurs well for the Temperance reform, and every friend of good order will doubtless rejoice to learn that such a house has been opened for their accommodation by the enterprising proprietor in the flourishing village of Auburn. We wish Mr. Mead all success in his undertaking, and would say to our friends who are traveling through, to drop into the "Auburn House."

NEW-YORK STATE ANTI-SLAVERY SOCIETY.—The Sixth Annual Meeting of this Society is to be held at Utica, commencing on Wednesday, the 15th inst., at 10 o'clock, A. M.

NOTICE.

The adjourned yearly meeting of the Stockholders of De Ruyter Institute will occur on Monday, the 4th of October next, at 1 o'clock, P. M., at the Institute, to elect four Trustees to fill the seats of Alexander Campbell, Perry Burdick, Benjamin Enos, and William Maxson, to hold their office 3 years, (the seats of the above being vacated at that time,) and to transact such other business as may be found necessary on the occasion.

Every Stockholder is entitled to one vote for each share of $25. Those wishing to vote by proxy can do so by forwarding their votes to the Secretary, or any of the Stockholders, naming the persons whom they wish to elect, and requesting such individual to act for them, noting, also, their number of shares.

De Ruyter, Sept. 7, 1841.

News of the Day.

☞ The following, (says the Sackets Harbor Journal,) we clip from the British Whig published in Kingston, Canada:

"MR. McLEOD.—This gentleman is tried to-day at Utica. In the event of his acquittal (not very probable at the hands of a vulgar, brutal and prejudiced Yankee Jury,) it is our firm conviction, that the mob will do him some grievous personal injury, even to the taking of his life, In a country without law, what else can be expected."

Our neighbor is informed that McLEOD is not expected to be tried short of about four weeks. There is law enough in this country to bring every offender to justice, and Jurymen possessing as much intelligence and polish, and withal as profound a sense of honor as our neighbors can boast; and as to mobs & riots, we refer to the Englishmen and Canadians, as masters of the art. If McLEOD is found guilty (which we think he will not be) HE WILL BE HUNG! If not, he will be allowed to return to Canada without injury. He is well treated at present, being allowed the use of the jailor's parlor.

Farming on a large Scale.—Extract of a letter from a gentleman in Indiana to a forwarding house in Rochester, dated

MICHIGAN-CITY, Aug. 11th, 1811

I have bought 10,000 bushels of wheat of one Farmer, and of his own raising, and it is only about half of his crop. The same Farmer has 800 acres of Corn, and 2,500 hogs to fat next fall, together with lots of other Stock and Spring Crops. I have never seen fairer Wheat, than the new crop is here."

From all accounts, says the Democrat, it is very evident that greater quantities of wheat have been raised in the new States this year, than ever before; and Western New York is compelled for once to knock under in large farming operations to Indiand. We are in no danger of famine for bread, and hope to maintain our political integrity.

From the Emancipator.

Who Shall Feed the Hungry?—From the tenor of the latest English intelligence, it is not improbable, that before this time, the inquiry as we stated may have assumed a most intense interest in our mother country. It is plain, that if there were a few days of unfavorable weather subsequent to the sailing of the Columbia, it must have greatly injured the harvest, already in a critical state, through the wetness of the ground. So great has been the increase of population in that country, that even the extraordinary improvements which have taken place in their agriculture hardly suffice, in a most favorable season, to yield a bare subsistence for the millions of mouths. A writer in the Genesee Farmer, evidently an Englishman of intelligence having reference to the desire expressed in this country for a repeal of the English Corn Laws, exclaims:

"Talk of feeding England from the United States! For twenty-five years previous to 1835, all the foreign Corn imported into England did not amount to more than one week's supply. Since that time in 1831, a year of very short crops, all the grain imported amounted to but 25 day's consumption, and only one-seventh part or three and a half days supply, was received from the United States of America."

This writer has either not seen the "Wheat Memorial," or has not studied it with requisite attention, so as to have fully understood the state of things which that document describes. We forward a copy to the Genesee Farmer for its correspondent whose signature, however, we have not preserved.

The consumption of wheat in England is about 160,000 bushels per day. If the present should be as bad as 1831, requiring an importation of 25 days consumption, how much of it could the United States supply?

MICHIGAN—The Troy Whig, says, a gentleman of Michigan writes that the surplus wheat product of the state will be this year 2,500,000 bushels; and the surplus pork 300,000 barrels.

The Hon. Henry W. Taylor, formerly a member of Congress, from Ontario County, now a resident of Michigan, writes to the Canadaigua Repository the following flattering account of the product of that state:

"I have no doubt Michigan will have from 2,000,000 to 2,500,000 bushels of wheat at the least, of surplus, for market. With a steady demand, at 75 cents a bushel, the present population would at once furnish 5,000,000 bushels for export, with ease, for it is cultivated with less labor than in New York.

"The other crops here, without exception, present the animating and delightful aspect. The Indian corn surpasses any thing I have ever seen, in vigor, richness, and luxuriance. But it will be needed, for the "swinish multitude," has waxed amazingly prolific. There are, I think, over 600,000 of these animals now in the state & if so, the surplus of pork the coming fall and winter will come to near or quite 300,000 barrels.

"But the most profitable staple article for exportation, by Wolverines, will hereafter, be WOOL. Without deducting at all from the State, 500,000 of sheep may be easily kept. It is only necessary for a farmer to purchase 5 or 600 acres of those oak openings, which he may get for $5 per acre, enclose the whole, cultivate 100 acres, or enough to sustain his stock through our generally short winters, and he is prepared off hand, to keep 2,000 head of sheep.

"There is no doubt that all cattle, and sheep especially thrive better upon the native grasses and shrubs found in the openings of this State than they do upon the best cultivated grasses of New York. I have no doubt it is the best state for sheep husbandry in the Union; and the great ease and cheapness with which wool can be marketed at Boston and New York, renders it admirably fitted for the staple of our interior country. Our farmers are becoming convinced of this, for every one is trying to commence or increase the flock. The numbers now coming in from Ohio and other States are immense; and I have no doubt the sheep now in the state double the last year's return. Money to buy them alone is wanting, and that number would double 12 fold in twelve months to come.

"I ought to add, that, for the nine months I have resided here, I have never knew a healthier land. The green hills of New England, so far, do not surpass it."

OHIO—The Massillon Gazette, Ohio, published at an inland town on the Ohio Canal, says:

"The gross amount of flour cleared at this collector's office during the last year, was 10,921 barrels of flour, which was equal to 201,605 bushels of wheat. And of wheat there was cleared 810,572 bushels; making an amount equal to 1,199,277 bushels of wheat; and this amount annually increasing with the rapid strides making in agriculture by our industrious farmers."

A Correspondent of the Boston Courier, writing at Worcester, Mass., August 11th, certified by the respectable editor to be "known to us a man of observation, intelligence, and integrity," says:—

"Having just returned from a tour thro' Pennsylvania, Ohio, Virginia, Kentucky, Tennessee, Indiana, Illinois, Michigan and New York, and having journeyed by land more than a 1000 miles through the interior of those states, while the wheat crop was being harvested, I not only took particular notice of the crops, but made diligent enquiries of gentlemen from every portion of the Wheat-Growing country respecting the crop; and from the information I have obtained I do not hesitate to assert my belief that the Wheat Crop of the present season, far exceeds that of any former year. It is true that there are several counties in the western parts of the states of Pennsylvania and New York, and perhaps some in Ohio, where the Wheat-Crop is rather light; but the increases over any other former year in the states of Indiana, Illinois and Michigan, will make up for this deficiency, with an increase of ten fold.

"Two years ago, I journeyed over a large extent of country, in the then New State of Illinois, the settlement of which was then but just commenced, and there was scarcely Wheat enough growing, at that time for the use of the inhabitants. I passed over the same tract of country the present and although I expected to witness great improvement, my expectations were more than realized. Those rich prairies were now covered with thousands of acres of the finest Wheat I ever beheld; and the fields of Corn were often several miles in length. In those portions of the state which has been settled some years, particularly the Rock River country I learned that nearly all the farmers had large quantities of old Wheat remaining on hand. The price in this region has been but thirty seven and a half cents per bushel for the last two years, which readily accounts for its not having been carried to market. The northern part of Illinois generally market their Wheat at Chicago, whence it is sent around the Lakes to Buffalo, at an expense of only ten cents per bushel."

"At the mouth of St. Joseph's River, in Michigan, there were 300,0000 barrels of flour, ready to be sent down the Lakes, and this amount is but a small portion of what will be shipped at that place, within the next twelve months."

ILLINOIS.—An intelligent gentleman of our acquaintance who resides on the Illinois River, in a letter, written in Illinois Aug. 12th, fully confirms all these representations, Our friend, who is a man of business, says:—

"The crops in northern Illinois and Wisconsin, and also in Iowa, are fair and more abundant than in any previous year. I have just taken a journey through the Rock River country to the Mississippi and find the crops excellent. In general, much more land has been cultivated by the same persons than in any former year, not to mention the great additions that have been made to the farming population by emigrants and others who have been compelled to "dig or die," by the stoppage of the public works & the general derangement of business. In fact you can hardly be extravagant in your calculations, as to the vast resources of this region of country, when circumstances shall develope them. The country is full of land; (you take my meaning,) and that of the very best quality, and in a climate the most favorable for the production of bread stuffs. A few years will enable it to feed the world, even if they all turn Grahamites, EAT nothing but flour in various shapes, omitting the SAW-DUST, entirely. This may seem extravagant to some who have never taken the trouble to examine the subject; but should they examine it, they will be inclined to say, that "truth is stranger than fiction."

The state of Michigan, which now offers from two to two millions and half bushels of wheat for export in the year 1831 had about 30,000 inhabitants, who import flour from Buffalo. Northern Illinois and Indiana imported flour so late as 1838. Wisconsin and Iowa have been settled cheifly since 1837. Now these states will offer a surplus from the present harvest, estimated at not far from 5,000,000 of bushels—more than equal to the whole import required in England in the hard year of 1831.

As to prices, let our Genesee friend look at the New York price current of Tuesday, August 24th.

Flour & Meal—The improvement in the western flour consequent upon light receipt and favorable advices from abroad, was succeeded on Saturday by a further advance of 25 cents, and on Monday a still further improvement of 25 cents was established, the market closing very firmly on $6 75 for common brands, Genesee.

The London Sun, Aug. 3rd, says, however, with an evident desire to quiet the alarm in the market—

"The averages, though worked upon by speculators, (and we know not why they should not be worked upon, for the speculators only wish to bring in corn at as low a duty as possible, and thereby benefit the people,) are no index to the actual price."

The Liverpool papers of August 5th, says:

"A return of unfavorable weather since that of Tuesday, giving renewed activity to the demand for bonded wheat and flour, we have to report considerable transaction in these articles at advanced rates: 28s. 6d. per barrel has been paid for the best brands of U. S. flour. [Bonded, i. e. duty unpaid. —ED. EMAN.] Carolina sweet flour, has brought 37s. to 38s. per barrel; English superfine 54s. to 55s.

Death of Hon. Gideon Lee—Hon. GIDEON LEE, formerly mayor of the city of New-York, member of Congress, &c. died at his residence, in Geneva, on Sunday 22d inst., in the 61st year of his age. Mr. Lee was long and actively engaged in the leather business in this city, by industry & talent acquired a handsome fortune. Of unblemished character and worth, Mr. Lee was esteemed through life, and his death is extensively regretted.

Debt of Upper Canada.—It appears by documents lately laid on the table of the Assembly by the Receiver General that the outstanding debentures amount to £213,673 Besides which there is payable in London £663,000, and sold in this country £209,650. Making a total of £1,190,000, currency. Part of this enormous debt bears 6 & the remainder 5 per cent yearly interest.

Lower Canada Debt—The same document also shows that the whole debt of Lower Canada is under £114,000. Less than one tenth of the debt due by Upper Canada.—Toronto Examiner.

The Texian Congress has passed a law exempting the slave property from all liability for debts of the owners, except debts to the Texian Government! The object of the law is well understood. The Slave States of our Union are indebted to the free States, not far from $150,000, and their slaves are daily attached & sold at auction, to satisfy the northern creditors. The law of Texas invites these worthy debtors to come to Texas, and bring their slaves, by assuring them that they shall be safe henceforth from the pursuit of their creditors; or as a Texas newspaper very quaintly remarks, "this act will go far to convince many southern gentleman of the salubrity of our climate.—Anti Slavery Standard.

Destructive Hail Storm.—Sunday afternoon we had a heavy dash of rain, and a little sprinkling of hail in the west part of the city, and were not aware that any damage had been sustained when our paper went to press Monday morning. But soon after day light, we began to hear of the ravages of hail and wind, east and north of the city, such as we have never before known in this vicinity.

A vein of hail, it seems, passed over Mt. Hope, in the direction of Alexander's tavern, and as far northeast as we have heard, tearing every thing of the vegetable kind in pieces, half a mile or more in width, and breaking nearly every pane of window glass in its course. The hail stones were so large that birds and even geese were killed by them—and even slaughter cattle in the open fields, (when butchered in the evening) bore marks of the bruises in their flesh as though they had been pounded with a large hammer.—The damage the farmers especially have sustained, is inestimable. We dread to hear the consequences of this terrible visitation.—Rochester Democrat.

The Hail.—The keeper of the Poor House says 550 lights of glass were broken out of that establishment by the hail on Sunday. Every light of glass was broken out of Ellwanger & Barry's Green House, and we regret to add their plants and young trees were much injured. The front windows of B. Alexander's tavern were completely riddled. Mr. Schenk lost most of his peaches and apples, worth probably $1000. A gardener near Capt. Goodman's lost all his fruit, and his vegetables were much injured—say $300.

We rode out to view the ruins yesterday morning, eighteen hours after the storm, and the hail then lay in several gullies beside the road in cart loads, and many of the stones were as large as the largest hickory nuts. Many trees were torn up by the roots, and railed fences levelled with the earth.—Ib.

Tornado at Dansville.—We learn by a gentleman from Genesee that Sunday afternoon about 5 o'clock, a violent wind swept over the village of Dansville, prostrating a new three story house, unroofing other buildings, untopping chimneys, &c. One man was said to be severely injured.—Ib.

Libel Suit.—The managers of the U. S. Bank in New York, have brought a libel suit against the Editors of the Journal of Commerce—damages $100,000!

The National Intelligencer states that the Secretary of the Treasury has obtained the loan of one million of dollars lately advertised, at 5 1-2 per cent per annum.

The flouring mill and machine shop belonging to the Peru Iron Company at Clintonville, was destroyed on the 19th inst. by fire—damage $5000—believed to be fully insured.

McLeod's Trial.—As many inquiries are made respecting the time and place of this trial, we will state, for the information of the public, that the Court of Oyer and Terminer, and Circuit Court, at which he will be tried, will commence its session at the Academy, in the city of Utica, on Monday, the 27th of September; that a panel of forty-eight petit jurors had been ordered, and will be drawn by the County Clerk, in the presence of the first Judge and the Sheriff of the County, at the County Clerk's office in this city, on Thursday next, at 10 A. M. The drawing is public, and all who feel any interest have a right to be present.—The jurors are drawn from boxes in which their names are placed; which names are taken from lists returned to the Clerk's office once in three years by the town officers. There can be no partiality, fraud or corruption exercised in the drawing, and the character of the drawing officers is above suspicion or reproach even if there could. The Chief Justice, Hon. Samuel Nelson, will preside on this trial. The Attorney General will prosecute, and Mr. J. A. Spencer will defend the prisoner.—He will have a fair trial without prejudice or partiality; and if guilty, be convicted; if innocent, be acquitted.—Utica Democrat.

Robbery at the Buffalo American Hotel.—A most audacious robbery was committed at the American on Thursday night, by some villains with false keys. Several trunks were opened and some $500 in bills and drafts stolen. A couple of genteel dressed persons, named G. W. Drake and D. O'Brien were arrested, but in the absence of conclusive testimony, were kept unexamined. A small boy belonging to Rochester, in company with the men, is also detained until something satisfactory is elicited.—Buffalo Com. Adv.

Great Fire at Lowell.—We learn from the Mail of this morning, that a fire broke out in Lowell last night about half past 11, in a part of the city called "The Acre," and before the progress of the flames could be arrested, five entire blocks of wooden buildings, and parts of others, were consumed! Several workshops were also destroyed. About fifty poor families were burnt out, losing the greater portion of their furniture and effects. It is said that a Mrs. McLaughlin and her infant were buried in some of the ruins.—Boston Transcript.

The Loss of the Erie.—The investigation of the causes which led to the destruction of the Erie, closed at Buffalo on Monday the 16th. After patiently hearing all the testimony which could be adduced from the survivors of those who were on board of her at the time of the burning, the jurors have unanimously arrived at the conclusion "that the fire was caused by the burning of one or more demijohns of spirits of turpentine standing on the boiler deck, and communicating with the fire in the furnace of the boilers over which they were placed, and that the boat had been lately painted and varnished, and this, together with the high wind, drove the flames so rapidly through the boat that it was impossible for those on board to stop the fire, or prevent the destruction of said boat." The jury also recommended to boat owners to furnish their boats with a sufficient number of life boats to sustain all the passengers they may carry; also, as auxiliary, to carry a suitable number of pine or white-wood plank, and that they be so placed as to be easily thrown overboard; also, life preservers sufficient for one hundred passengers, and that they be inflated and placed in the berths immediately after leaving port.

Incidents connected with the destruction of the Erie.—There were, as might be supposed, not a few Providential escapes from the danger which befel even the survivors of the dreadful destruction of the Erie.

A gentleman from the East was on his way to the boat in company with three others, when he accidentally met with a friend with whom he had some business to transact. His baggage had gone on, and he very reluctantly consented to recall it, and remain for the next boat. This circumstance—so annoying at the time, may have saved his life.

Another gentleman who, with his wife, took the packet at Rochester, hearing when he reached Lockport, that the Erie was to leave in the afternoon, left the packet, and took the cars, with the hope of reaching Buffalo in season. He just reached the city in time to see the Erie shove out into the Lake!

We learn that a gentleman and lady from this city went on board the Erie to return home; but on learning the name of the boat the lady refused to remain on board, as several accidents had before happened to her. Their baggage was consequently removed, and their lives saved.

Two gentlemen from Essex Co., were at the boat when she got ready to start, but by some fortunate blunder, their baggage was not sent down from the hotel. They were obliged to stay back—much to their annoyance at the time, but to their great joy since.

We have heard of several others who would have taken passage in the Erie, but they were unwilling to travel on the Sabbath, and did not reach Buffalo until late in the evening.

The most affecting incidents connected with this fearful calamity are doubtless developed when the sad fate of the lost is communicated to surviving friends. The chamber-maid on board of the Erie was the well-beloved daughter of a most worthy old woman in this city, and her wailings, when told of the death of her child, were fearful and heart-rending. She was robbed of the solace of her gray hairs, and would not be comforted.—Detroit Daily Advertiser.

General Ebenezer Elmer, of Bridgeton, is now the sole survivor of the original members of the New Jersey Society of Cincinnati.

The Case of Miss Rogers.—Morse, who was the individual arrested near Worcester, Mass., on suspicion of having been implicated in the murder of Miss Rogers, has proved to the satisfaction of the Police, at least, that he was somewhere else on the fatal day and night, and has consequently been discharged from custody. He was subsequently arrested on the charge of assault and battery against his wife, but that difficulty appears to be settled, and Morse is now at large.

This throws the whole affair into impenetrable mystery again. No clue can be discovered in any direction. The opinion is fast gaining ground that the poor girl met her fate on this side of the river, and not many blocks from her mother's door. It is devoutly to be hoped that such a shocking outrage will not be suffered to be buried in obscurity.

The New Bankrupt Law.—The principal provisions of the Bankrupt Law just passed, are these: 1. All persons whatever, owing debts not created by defalcations as public officers, executors, administrators, guardians, or trustees, may present a petition to the United States Court for the District in which they live, setting forth a complete list of their creditors, the amounts due, &c., and also a full inventory of their property, upon oath, declaring their inability to pay their debts, and may thereupon be decreed to be bankrupts, and upon an equal division of their property, among their creditors, receive a certificate discharging them from all their debts.

2. All merchants, bankers, factors, brokers, under-writers, or marine insurers, owing debts to the amount of two thousand dollars, may be proceeded against as bankrupts, upon petition of one or more of their creditors, to whom they are indebted to the amount of five hundred dollars.

These two provisions contain the substance of the whole act. The remainder being devoted to the describing of the mode of proceeding, and stating the principles which shall govern the assignees in taking possession of the property of the bankrupt, selling and distributing it, and conducting suits in regard to it.—New York Evangelist.

Science preparing the way for Religion.—The Albany Advertiser says that H. Rawls & Co., of that city, have prepared some very valuable philosophical apparatus, which has been purchased for the use of the misionaries in India. One of the greatest obstacles to the spread of Christianity there, has been the conflict between the missionaries and the Brahmins on questions of natural science. The religion of the latter strictly forbids the use of animal food in any shape; the missionary with the microscope shows them that every drop of water teems with animal life, and that a strict compliance with their tenets is impossible. The Brahmin believes that in an eclipse the moon is swallowed up by a great fish; the telescope forever dispels this absurdity. The same thing is true of nearly all their popular prejudices; they may be dispelled, and a way prepared for the reception of religious truth, by the simplest philosophical inventions. Christianity and Science may then go hand in hand.—Tribune.

Look at the Business.—The late Chief Justice Platt, declared that for thirty years he had kept written notes respecting several hundreds who had been engaged in the manufacture or sale of alcoholic liquors; and of them he could truly say, that 24 out of 25 had become drunkards, or some of their families had; and 27 out of 28 had lost money by the business. The most of whom had made themselves bankrupt in fortune and character. Is not God's curse on the "business"? Who encourages it? The moderate drinker principally. What is the amount of the responsibility of every one of these? Eternity alone can tell; so vast it is.—Temp. Recorder.

Extensive Bank Robbery.—We learn from the Richmond papers of Friday, that the Danville branch of the Farmers' Bank of Virginia, was entered on Saturday or Sunday night last, by means of false keys, and robbed of NINETY-TWO THOUSAND ONE HUNDRED AND THIRTY-FIVE DOLLARS. Fortunately for the bank, $72,132 of this large amount were mutilated notes, issued by the branch, stamped on the face "Cancelled," which it is hoped may aid in the detection of the burglars.

The remaining $20,000 consist in part of issues of the Danville office, say $1,082 of various denominations, $15,818 were of the mother bank and branches; Bank of Virginia and branch notes, Exchange Bank and branch notes, likewise of various denominations, and a note of $100 of the old issue of the Bank of the United States.

A reward of $5000 is offered for the apprehension and conviction of the robber or robbers, and the recovery of the money, or in proportion to the amount recovered.—N. Y. Com. Advertiser.

INTERESTING FROM FLORIDA.

Florida, Aug. 21.—Hitherto I have been one of those despairing spirits, who have considered this war interminable—but I am happy to say, that present appearances have convinced me that I was in error—and I now believe before 3 months shall have passed away, this long continued war will be brought to a termination. To the skill, activity and superior judgment of the present commander, Col. Worth, seconded by such an officer as Lt. Col. Riley, the country is indebted for the favorable result which has been brought about.

By an express received from Tampa Bay, we learn that over two hundred Indians are now at that post, ready to be shipped for their new homes, West of the Mississippi.—Ten Indians, the balance of 25 of Halleck's band, who became disaffected to their chief, are now on their way to Tampa—and Tigertail has sent in word to Col. Worth that he can stand it no longer—and that he will collect his people together, with the few Creeks who have been acting with him—and have them all in the neighborhood of Annutaliza by the 7th or 8th of next month, ready to come in for emigration.

The health of the troops is improving, and by the 1st of October the army will be ready to take the field to operate South against Sam Jones and Hospitarka, should they not take it into their heads to come in before that time; which would not be at all surprising.

On the 14th or 15th inst., Lieut. Anderson, 2nd Infantry, in command of a party of mounted men, captured an Indian near the Oclawaha, that belonged to Halleck Tustenuggee's band, who proved to be Halleck Hadjo, the fighting captain, and a chief of importance. When first discovered he was asleep. On awakening, he endeavored to escape, but was prevented by Lieut. Rogers, 2d Dragoons, running over him on horseback. He gave the information that Halleck was encamped on Juniper creek, which enters Lake George. Major Fauntleroy, 2d Dragoons, on obtaining the information planned an expedition against Halleck. He ordered a company of dragoons to cross the Oclawaha at Fort Brooks, and to move up by Lake Churchill to Fort Butler; another company he took in a steamboat and landed at Fort Gates to scout the St. Johns to the same place. A detachment with boats was to leave the steamer in Lake George and to go up Juniper creek. The result of the boat expedition has been reported: the officer in command found three large camps on Juniper creek, abandoned within two or three days; the trail leading in a south west direction, hopes are entertained that the two dragoon companies will fall in with this company.

The commander of Florida has ordered two companies of dragoons from Pilatka, one to re-establish Fort Gates, and the other to re-occupy Fort Butler on the St. Johns.

From the National Intelligencer.

FROM FLORIDA.

Despatches have been received at the War Department from Col. Worth, commanding the Army in Florida, up to the 18th inst. They furnish gratifying evidence of the continued activity of the troops in exploring the hiding places of the enemy, and in promptly pursuing predatory parties among the settlements.

The sections of country lying in the Horwasassa and Wacasassa rivers have been explored by land and water; in the former, forty acres of Indian cultivation were discovered and destroyed. The neighborhood of the Timoka and Halifax rivers has been minutely examined, but without meeting with any indications of the enemy. The expedition into the Everglades had not been heard from. Along the line of the settlements and in Middle Florida the troops are kept constantly in motion.—Much of the country, nearly impracticable at the best season, is now rendered doubly so by unusual inundation, owing to continued rains. The zeal of officers and men, and their perseverance in scouting under such complicated difficulties, deserves all praise.

The Colonel commanding reports the coming in of ten Indians since the report of the 8th of August, and the capture, by Liet. Col. Riley, of a sub-chief of Halleck Tustenuggee's band; from the possession of whom he expects material assistance in the furtherance of his plans.

It is believed that the settlements can be sufficiently protected without the necessity of calling out militia. In connection with this object, Col. Worth has happily conceived the plan of recalling to their plantations the settlers who have been driven away by Indians, and of encouraging the citizens to form new settlements; promising to such as may avail themselves of the proposed arrangement, rations and armed force to aid them in protecting themselves, whenever such protection shall be necessary and practicable. Under the direction of Major Wilcox, a zealous and efficient officer, to whom this service has been confided, the project has met with great success; two hundred and ninety-eight persons having already been enrolled to form new settlements and to re-occupy old ones—of whom one hundred and four are able to bear arms. These armed settlements are chiefly in a section of country heretofore much annoyed by Indian depredations, and may be expected to exert the happiest influence in repressing the inroads of the enemy, and giving confidence to the border settlers.

In regard to the district of Middle Florida, where some refugee Creeks, and perhaps a few straggling Seminoles have committed several murders upon mail-riders and others, and in consequence of which great desire has been expressed to call out a large militia force, Col. Worth thus writes, under date of 17th instant:

"I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of the letter to Gov. Call, with instructions in the case. I respectfully ask a careful perusal of the enclosed reports from Major Wilson, commanding the Western District, received by the same mail; from which it will appear that, sympathizing to the fullest extent in the Governor's solicitude for the safety of the settlers, not only in Middle Florida, but at every other exposed point, (not doubting the enemy, after being routed, his fields and towns destroyed, would seek both food and vengeance in the settlements,) before the general movement in June was completed, reinforcements were sent to that quarter to guard against anticipated inroads, and the greatest activity and vigilance enjoined, as will appear by correspondence heretofore transmitted. Again, on the 24th ult, the attention of the officer commanding the western district was pointedly called to the very localities referred to by the Governor's correspondent, Mr. Bryan."

REPORT FROM MAJOR WILSON.

"The Major General commanding will perceive on the perusal of Major Wilson's reports, a high degree of zeal and activity; also, that it is not in human foresight or sagacity to guard against the occasional acts of violence of an enemy so resolute and vindictive. Turning aside from a general system of operations, to pursue small bands, would be but to play the enemy's game.—Unfortunately, the older Indians believe that no quarters will be granted, and the younger, come to maturity since the contest commenced, only know the whites as enemies, whom it is their highest duty to slay. I am sending on messengers in all directions, and doing all in my power to disabuse them of these impressions. Once assured of kind treatment, I shall entertain no doubt of closing the contest; meantime the exhibition of a determined pursuit will, it is believed, rather aid than retard the result.

"A company of dragoons and two additional companies of foot have been ordered to Major Wilson's command; when his force, including several mounted detachments, will be ample, as it is now believed to be, to look to every exposed point."

Col. Worth has forwarded minute reports of the recent operations in Middle Florida, an abstract of which will be given hereafter, by which it will be seen that all proper efforts have been made to keep the hostile Indians out of the settlements, or to expel them whenever they may intrude.

Injunction.—An injunction, says the Jour. of Commerce, of yesterday, has been served to-day upon the officers of the North American Trust and Banking Co., requiring them to show cause why receivers should not be appointed to wind up the affairs of the Institution.—Eve. Jour. of Sept. 2d.

The U. S. ship Delaware has taken on board ten very long and large life-preservers, each capable of sustaining in the water more than fifty men: and the whole, lashed together, could rescue the whole crew, if the ship should founder.

The steamboats on Lake Erie are now beginning to take on board several thick white and basswood planks, in addition to their life-preservers, which are placed where they can be easily thrown overboard. A prudent movement, and one which, if earlier adopted, might have saved scores from the Erie.

A heavy haul of counterfeiters was made at Buffalo on the 16th inst., in which four were arrested, with a large amount of spurious money, embracing bogus and wild cat bills innumerable.

The Philadelphia Ledger says that the charges alleged against Dr. Eldridge will probably fall to the ground at present. At the last Court of General Sessions, the counsel for the prosecution forgot to force the defendant to renew his recognizance.—He is at present liberated from all liabilities.

The Advantage of Getting "a Sub."—It is stated in the Natchez Free Trader that Tim Greene, now one of the oldest printers in Virginia, was drafted for service in the Revolutionary war; but, believing with Jack Falstaff that "discretion was the better part of valor," at the expense of a pretty round sum of money, he procured a substitute, who answered at the first enrolment to the name, as well as the place of Tim Greene. In the first battle after the enrolment, Greene's substitute was killed, and thus the name of the principal went upon the books of the war department as slain. Under the pension law the children of that old slain soldier, Tim Greene, who is even now alive, have for years received the substantial gratitude of their country.

POETRY.

An Evening Reverie.

BY W. C. BRYANT.

The summer day has closed, the sun is set.
Well have they done their office, those bright hours,
The latest in whose train goes softly out
In the red west. The green blade of the ground
Has risen, and herds have cropt it; the young twig
Has spread its plaited tissues to the sun;
Flowers of the garden and the waste have blown
From bursting cells, and in their graves await
Their resurrection. Insects from the pools
Have filled the air awhile with humming wings,
That now are still forever; painted moths
Have wandered the blue sky, and died again;
The mother-bird hath broken, for her brood,
Their prison-shells, or shoved them from the nest,
Plumed for the earliest flight. In bright alcoves,
In woodland cottages with barky walls,
In noisesome cells of the tumultuous town,
Mothers have clasped with joy the new-born babe.
Graves by the lonely forest, by the shore
Of river and of ocean, by the ways
Of the thronged city, have been hollowed out
And filled, and closed. This day hath parted friends,
That ne'er before were parted; it hath knit
New friendships; it hath seen the maiden plight
Her faith and trust, her peace to him who long
Had wooed, and it hath heard, from lips which late
Were eloquent of love, the first harsh word
That told the wedded one her peace was flown.

Farewell to the sweet sunshine! One glad day
Is added now to childhood's merry days,
And one calm day to those of quiet age.
Still the fleet hours run on; and as I lean
Amid the thickening darkness, lamps are lit,
By those who watch the dead, and those who twine
Flowers for the bride. The mother from the eyes
Of her sick infant shades the painful light,
And sadly listens to his quick drawn breath.

Oh thou great Movement of the Universe,
Or Change, or Flight of Time, for ye are one!
That bearest, silently this visible scene
Into night's shadow and the streaming rays
Of starlight, whither art thou bearing me?
I feel the mighty current sweep me on,
Yet know not whither. Man foretells afar
The courses of the stars: the very hour
He knows, when they shall darken or grow bright.
Yet doth the eclipse of sorrow and of death
Come unforewarned. Who next of those I love
Shall pass from life, or sadder yet, shall fall
From virtue? Strife with foes, or bitter strife
With friends, or shame and general scorn of men:
Which who can bear?—or the fierce rack of pain,
Lie they within my path? Or shall the years
Hush me, with soft and inoffensive pace,
Into the stilly twilight of my age?
Or do the portals of another life
Even now, while I am glorying in my strength,
Impend around me? Oh! beyond that bourne,
In the vast cycle of which begins
At the dread threshhold, with what fairer forms
Shall the great law of change and progress clothe
Its workings? Gently—so have good men taught—
Gently, and without grief, the old shall glide
Into the new; the eternal flow of things,
Like a bright river of the fields of heaven,
Shall journey onward in perpetual peace.

THE RESCUE.

BY MRS. E. S. SMITH.

The incident about to be related is one of the many similar ones which occured during the early settlement of America. Those who sought a home in the savage wilds, which then covered the land, wedded themselves to a life of peril and hardship. The dangers which continually threatened them called forth all the heroic qualities of their nature. Such deeds should not sink into oblivion, for they belong to the history of our country, and as such, should be recorded and remembered.

We would present a picture to the imagination of the reader. There is a broad and beautiful stream, with deep and still waters, flowing on between banks covered by luxuriant foliage; and its bright surface dotted here and there with fairy little isles, where graceful shrubs and fragrant flowers bud and blossom undisturbed in wild and lonely loveliness. Bright plumed birds, of many varieties, are winging their way over the quiet water,& the surrounding scene echoes with their tuneful minstrelsy. On the borders of the river, at the edge of a forest that stretches far away over hill and dale, stands the rude but picturesque dwelling of a back-woodsman; with the blue smoke curling up from its lowly roof, and its humble walls glancing out from the green foliage that surrounds them. There are some indications of taste and refinement near the woodman's home, which give a cheerful appearance to that otherwise wild and lonely scene. A graceful vine curtains the lowly window, and many bright flowers, natives of a distant soil, shed their grateful perfume around. Near the door hangs a cage, containing a rare and beautiful bird, whose song of gladness breaks sweetly upon the stillness of that solitary place.

On a low seat at the entrance of the dwelling, is seen a young woman, caressing an infant.—She has lost the blooming loveliness of early youth, her cheek is pale, and her brow wears that thoughtful expression which is imprinted by the touch of care; yet she is still beautiful in form and feature, and none may look upon her without admiration. As she bends over her child in her arms, her eye fills with unutterable tenderness and love which are only seen in the eye of a mother, and which make the face of a beautiful woman angelic. Now and then she turns from the child to send an anxious glance towards the forest, as if she watched for the approach of some one from that direction. She is momentarily expecting her husband. He left his home—the hour appointed for his return passed away—the shadows of the trees are lengthening in the rays of the setting sun, and yet he comes not. The fond wife begins to tremble for his safety—a fearful foreboding of evil steals over her mind, and the dark dread of some approaching calamity haunts her imagination.

She has reason to fear; for that portion of country was, at this time, the theatre of many a tragic scene. Sometimes the woodman in penetrating too far into the pathless recesses of the forest, lost his way, and wandered for days in the wilderness, suffering many miseries, and perishing at last by the pangs of hunger. Sometimes a hungry beast of prey would cross the path of the wanderer, and doom him to a dreadful death. Sometimes the wily red man, who yet lurked about these lonely wilds, entrapped the white hunter,and from a spirit of revenge, or the thirst for blood,sacrificed his victim with the most barbarous cruelty.

As the anxious wife thought of these things,her fears and forebodings became almost insupportable. Hushing the infant to sleep, she carried it into the dwelling, and deposited it in its cradle bed. She then hastened forth, and wandered along the path that led to the forest,anxiously looking forward the while for her husband. She walked onward for some time,fondly hoping to see the object of her search, but her hopes were vain, and sending one more searching glance around, and seeing nothing but the gloomy shadows of the trees, she turned with a heavy heart to retrace her steps. As she was proceeding homeward, a sudden fear for her child, whom she had left alone, crossed her mind, and caused her to hasten forward. Drawing nearer to the dwelling, this fear became so intense, that it amounted almost to a conviction of some terrible calamity. Flying rather than walking she reached the house, and sprang to the cradle—it was empty,and the child no where to be seen! With frantic eagerness she rushed to the back door of the dwelling, which she had left closed, and which she now found open. She was just in time to see a party of Indians making rapidly to the woods. Her heart whispered the fearful assurance that they bore away its treasure. Here was a trying situation for a timid and helpless woman—her husband afar off—perhaps in the peril—her child—her first born, and only one, torn away by the rude hand of a savage—dread night approaching, and no earthly arm to aid!

Without pausing for reflection, the mother flew along the path which the Indians had taken. Now and then she caught a glimpse of their forms, as they moved rapidly through the trees, but as the twilight deepened, and surrounding objects became more indistinct, even that slight comfort was denied her, and she traced her gloomy pathway without knowing whether or not it would bring her nearer the object of her pursuit. Yet she paused not a moment in indecision, but hastened onward through the increasing darkness, unconscious of the uncertainty of her search, and the wildness of her expedition. She had but one thought—one hope; and that was to be near her child—to save it, if it could be saved, or perish with it, if perish it must. Strong in this determination, she pushed forward thoughtless of fatigue and fearless of peril. As the night advanced, the wind rose and sighed among the trees with a mournful and heart-chilling sound. The stars, that hitherto shed a faint light through the branches, were now veiled in black clouds, that seemed to presage a storm; and ever and anon the shrill croaking of a night-bird, or the prolonged howl of a beast of prey, was borne to the ear of the unhappy wanderer, waking fearful thoughts, and warning her of the dangers by which she was surrounded.

Those who have never roamed in a forest at midnight, can scarcely realize how much that is terrifying is connected with such a journey. At one time, the howl of the hungry wolf will burst so suddenly and clearly on the ear, that we can scarcely persuade ourselves that the monster is not close at our side—at another, the falling of a decayed branch will produce such a loud and fearful sound that we deem it the fatal plunge which must doom it to destruction. Now the wind will come with a fitful and mourning cadence, so like the human voice, that we for an instant believe it to be the wail of an agonized being—and again it will sweep by with a rushing sound like a troop of enraged monsters, bent on a mission of death. Sometimes an unseen,low-drooping branch will softly touch the shoulder, congealing the warm current of life with the idea that a spectral hand has suddenly arrested our progress; and again a black and blasted tree, with one or two branches protruding from its side, will, for an instant, still the pulsation of the heart, as we behold in it a frightful phantom, stretching forth its arm to grasp our shrinking forms.

All this, and more, must one feel and fear in a lonely midnight walk through the forest; and all this the mother endured as she pursued her almost hopeless enterprise.—She had traveled far, very far, for the darkness of night, and the intricacies of the wood had scarcely lessened the speed with which she commenced her walk, and she had been many hours on her way. Weariness was beginning to overcome her—hope was departing from her heart—and despair chilling all her energies, when she discovered afar off, through the trees, a light!—It was but a feeble glimmer, yet, oh! how it irradiated the path of the wanderer. The instant she beheld it, hope sprang back to her heart, and strength invigorated her frame. That faint and far-off ray seemed the light of returning happiness, and she watched it as eagerly as the mariner watches the star which guides him over the ocean's stormy waves. She now hastened onward with redoubled energy, and though her steps sometimes faltered, and her heart sunk within her as the light disappeared behind some intervening object, she still kept her eyes steadily in the direction of the beacon, and soon gained a position where it shone brightly before her, and she could approach without losing sight of it again. As she drew near, she gazed upon the scene which that light revealed, with mingled feelings of astonishment, hope, and fear.

There was a large fire built of dried branches of trees, and around it lay the dusky forms of five or six Indians, reposing upon the ground. Their appearance was savage and fearful in the extreme; each with his painted feathers lighted by the fitful glare of the fire, and his tomahawk and scalping knife gleaming at his side. Near them were implements of hunting, and around the fire lay scattered bones and fragments of a recent rude and hasty repast. The whole scene was calculated to strike terror into the heart of the delicate being who gazed upon it.

But she scarcely saw the rude savages or their implements of death, for her whole soul was absorbed in contemplating a portion of the scene which we have not yet described, which riveted her attention with a thrilling and magic power. Bound to a tree was the form of her husband; and at his feet on the cold ground, lay her child. The father's face was pale and stained with blood; the infant was covered with its dress, and its form was motionless as if chilled by the cold hand of death. How felt the fond wife and mother when that sight of horror met her eye? Repressing by a mighty effort the shriek of agony that rose to her lips, and conquering, by the strength of a heroic soul, the almost irresistible desire she felt to rush forward and clasp those dear ones to her aching heart, she stood gazing upon the scene with feelings that can not be described. She saw with a throb of sudden joy that her husband lived, but her heart grew cold again as she watched the motionless form of her child. She longed to fly to its side and ascertain the truth, for the suspense that preyed upon her spirit was terrible; but again her resolute mind restrained her, and she began to deliberate upon the situation of her husband, and to devise means for releasing him.

The vivid light cast by the fire on all things near it, enabled the wife to note the scene distinctly. She saw with a thankful heart that the savages all slept, and that she could reach the side of her husband without passing near enough to wake them; but she also saw that he was bound by strong cords, which she could not hope, in her wearied state to unfasten, and she looked about for something to sever them.—There was nothing save the knives which the Indians wore in their sides. Looking more intently she saw that one of these had slipped from its place, and lay on the ground by its owner, so near that his hand almost touched the hilt. A pang of intense fear shot through her frame when she thought of approaching so close to the terrific form of the savage; but another look upon the pale face of the prisoner reassured her, and she determined to rescue him or perish in the attempt. She could not approach the Indians without revealing herself to the eyes of her husband, and she feared in that case an exclamation of surprise would follow her appearance, and rouse the foe from their slumber. After pondering a moment upon the best mode of proceeding, she determined to steal softly back of the tree, place her hand on the lip of the captive, whisper a few words of explanation, to implore him not by the slightest murmur to frustrate her plans. With a throbbing heart she commenced her perilous undertaking. Noiselessly she made her way to the tree and accomplished her purpose.

There was no time for delay, yet one instant the mother turned to look upon her child, yearning to clasp it to her bosom, but not daring to lift the cloth which concealed its features, and assure herself whether or not it lived. A little while before she would have given worlds to be able to do this, but now she felt that to behold it wrapped in the slumber of death, would unnerve her arm, and render her unfit for the further prosecution of her trying task. With firmness that would have done honor to a stoic, she conquered the promptings of natural love, and hastened away. With a step as noiseless as the falling dew, she glided towards the slumbering savages; as she drew near, her frame trembled so violently that she could scarcely support herself; and when she put forth her hand to take the knife, the beating of her heart was so audible she feared it would awake the sleepers, and she pressed her hand convulsively upon it to still its tumultuous throbbings. One terrible instant she thought the eyes of the Indians opened, and glared upon her with fierce and malignant expression, but this was mere fancy, for he still slept, and the next moment she was gliding away with the knife firmly grasped in her hand. With a few rapid strokes she liberated her husband, and then bent down and uncovered the child. To her unspeakable joy, she found it in a slumber as sweet and peaceful as though it had been hushed to rest upon its mother's bosom. With a prayer of gratitude upon her lips she lifted it from its rude resting place, turned to her companion and motioned the way to their home.

With rapid and noiseless steps they hurried away, speeding onward with tremulous yet hopeful hearts. Not a moment did the fond mother spare to caress her infant—not a word did she utter to greet her husband. The spell of a new found uncertain happiness had settled upon her spirit, and she feared to break its thrilling charm. For a time, they traveled thus in silence, and in darkness, moving as near as they could judge in the direction of their home, and anxious to be farther, still farther away from their enemies. At length, weariness compelled them to rest awhile, and as the dawning day began to shed a trembling light abroad, they crept into a thicket and sought repose.

The beams of the rising sun lighted the wanderers on their homeward pathway;—and when that sun was sinking to repose, its parting rays fell over the woodman's humble home, revealing a scene of bliss such as seldom visits the abode of man.—How radiant with grateful joy was the face of the fond mother, as she clasped her recovered treasure to her bosom; how full of admiring love was the eye of the rescued husband,as it rested upon its fair preserver; and oh! how warm and fervent was the prayer breathed in that hour of safety,bearing up to heaven the deep devotion of thankful and happy hearts.

GOLD.—God of the craven heart! Idol of millions how splendid are thy temples, how zealous thy worshipers! They gather around thy smile in the morning, they leave not their devotions at midnight! Thou smilest upon them and they grow mad in the midst of their places. They make themselves monarchs in fancy and conquerors in dreams. Who can withstand thee? Thou leadest the feet of beauty thou directest the arm of the brave! thy pathway is the pathway of triumphs, thy presence the solace of power! Thou silenced the voice of eloquence when the Macedonian held thee up glittering before the eye of the orator, and the mistress of the world rose before thee in the balance! Disposer of empires! thou spreadest over the world. Thy spell nerved the assassin, and urged on the betrayer. Thy yellow visage incited the spoiler when he sought thee on the crimson field, and made himself red in the struggle of carnage. In all ages thou hast triumphed. Whether in the thirty pieces rewarding a Judas or the sparkling crown on the brow of a tyrant; always alike invincible. The man of business bows obsequiously to thee. The man of fashion falls before thee, and the miser clutches thy garment, as though they were the curtains of Heaven! Thou hast a retinue of coaches, and an army of slaves! Thou hast the goal of a splendid misery, where guilt makes her alliance with death! The virgin at the sanctuary fears not thy footsteps, and the shorn priest flies not the power of thy magic.—Ossian.

"In the life of Chief Justice Holt, a curious anecdote is recorded. It appears that when a young man, Holt had a flow of animal spirits which could not well be restrained, and he happened on one occasion with some companions, to stop at an inn in the country, where they contracted a debt of such amount that they were unable to defray it. In this dilemma they appealed to Holt to get them out of the scrape Holt observed that the inn keeper's daughter looked remarkably ill, and was told by her mother that she had an ague. Hereupon he gathered several plants and mixed them together with a great deal of ceremony, afterwards wrapping them up in a piece of parchment, upon which he had scrawled certain letters and marks. The ball thus prepared, he hung it round the young woman's neck, and the ague did not return. After this, the never failing doctor, offered to discharge the bill, but the gratitude of the landlord refused any such thing, and Holt and his companions departed. When he became Lord Chief Justice, a woman was brought before him accused of being a witch. She was the last person tried in England for witchcraft. She made no other defence than that she was in possession of a certain ball which infallibly cured ague. The ball was handed to the Judge, who untied it and found it to be the identical ball which he had made in his youthful days for the purpose of curing the woman's ague and paying his own bil."

DEATH OF ARCHIMEDES.—When Syracuse was taken, Archimedes was describing mathematical figures upon the earth; and when one of the enemy came upon him, sword in hand, and asked his name, he was so engrossed with the desire of preserving the figures entire that he answered only by an earnest request to the soldier to keep off and not break in upon his circle. The soldier, conceiving himself scorned, ran Archimedes through the body, the purple streams gushing from which soon obliterated all traces of the problem on which he had been so intent. Thus fell this illustrious man, from the mere neglect to tell his name; for it is due to the Roman general, Marcellus, to state that he had given special orders to his men to respect the life and person of the philosopher.

INTEGRITY.—Integrity is a great and commendable virtue. A man of integrity is a true man, a bold man, and a steady man; he is to be trusted and relied upon. No bribe can corrupt him, no fear daunt him; his word is slow in coming, but sure. He shines brightest in the fire, and his friend hears of him most, when he most needs him. His courage grows with danger, and conquers opposition by constancy. As he cannot be flattered or frightened into that he dislikes, so he hates flattery and temporising in others. He runs with truth and not with the times—with right and not with might.—Penn's advice to his children.

HUMILITY.—There is nothing more characteristic of a true Christian than humility. "It is the first lesson he learns in the school of Christ, and is the source of contentment and solid peace of mind. If he hear that any one has reviled him, he is ready to say with the philosopher, 'had he known me better, he would have said worse things of me than that.' The fiercest storms of adversity blow over him. Humility gives a pliancy to his mind, which saves it by yielding to the force it cannot resist; like the weak and bending reed that weathers out the tempest which fells the tall and sturdy oak."

"Should any one," said St. Augustine, "ask me concerning the Christian religion, and the people of it, I would answer, that the first, second, and third things therein, and all, is humility."

MR. EDITOR,—I have just received Mr. Johnson's sixth and concluding number of his "Defense of the Doctrine of the Trinity;" and which, according to his express stipulation, was to be a reply to my "reasons for not embracing that doctrine."

In number three of the present volume of the Register, is an article, bearing his signature, in which is the following proposal, viz:—"If Mr. Chadwick will mention some reasons why he regards it inconsistent for himself as a conscientious believer in the proper unity of God, to embrace also the doctrine of the Trinity; I will reply to him, if the Lord permit." But, my Dear Sir, has he replied to me? Has he redeemed his pledge? It is true, he has written an Essay, or Treatise on the doctrine of the Trinity, comprised in sundry articles; and in his 4th number he apparently alludes to my communications, in the following terms, viz:—"In the Register a series of articles consisting of nine numbers has recently been published, enumerating 'reasons for not embracing the doctrine of the Trinity.' To select from those reasons what I may judge demands specific attention, will be the design of my next article." But he carefully avoids the mention of my name through the whole of his performance. At this I should take no exception, if he had replied to my arguments, and to my method of disposing of the Trinitarian proof-texts.

He has, indeed, in his Essay imperfectly noticed certain objections, (by no means all,) as brought against the Trinity, and attempted briefly to answer them; but if this merits the title of a Reply to me, it must be a very indirect one, and by no means what I had reason to expect. It may be that he found it easier to write an Essay than directly to reply to my reasons and expositions of the Scriptures.

In his concluding number, he declares his conviction that "the Trinity is a fundamental doctrine of the Christian system, and that any scheme of religion which rejects this doctrine does not belong to this system." This, with other expressions, shows very clearly that he does not feel disposed to allow that Anti-Trinitarians have any scriptural claim to the Christian character and hopes. He manifestly regards them as being in the high road to ruin.—This uncharitable, disfellowshiping, proscribing spirit, I am extremely sorry to detect: But while I esteem it "a small thing to be judged of him, or of man's judgment," the expression of such views serves to evince the importance of a thorough investigation of the subject. And, surely, Trinitarians ought to have patience with Anti-Trinitarians, and to use all practicable means to reclaim them, if they believe that their views, persisted in, will prove fatal. And, Anti-Trinitarians, although they may not exercise the same proscribing spirit towards Trinitarians, which is often exercised towards themselves, ought, from their acknowledged sense of the importance of the subject, to make the utmost efforts to enlighten them, and to promote the true doctrine concerning "the Father and the Son."

For this reason, I request the privilege of reviewing Mr. Johnson's articles, or of replying to him through the medium of the Register. I will engage to do it candidly and respectfully. And my motive is the correction of error, and the advancement of the cause of truth. This discussion ought not—cannot rest where it is. The public mind is greatly agitated. Professing Christians, and, as I think, real Christians are divided upon the question. And Zion's onward march is thereby greatly impeded. If possible, therfore, let the error, on which ever side it lies, be put away. And how can this be better effected, than by a particular examination of the arguments pro and con?

Mr. Johnson insists, that "all who love the doctrine of the Trinity, must join together for its defense; and must so join that the hurrying world can not fail to see the union." Well, if the cause is good, let it be jointly defended. But let those of the opposite belief be heard, with Christian candor in their defense. We, who believe that "the Father is the only true God," and that Jesus is the Christ—the son of the living God," are not to be put down by assertion, proscription, and long-established systems of man's devising. We must be met by plain scripture proof—by argument—by Christian courtesy and kindness. We are resolved to go by the Bible, whatever men say or think of us [illegible]

We invite a further canvassing of this matter. Let each important proof-text undergo a strict and impartial investigation. The truth has nothing to fear from such a course. I say these things with kind and liberal feelings; but with a full conviction that "I must give an account of myself to God" for my belief as well as my practice.

As ever yours,

JABEZ CHADWICK.

Cheerfulness.

Cheerfulness, when controlled by good sentiments is one of the noblest attributes of our nature. The idea that the grave countenance is a proof either of wisdom or of virtue, fades away before the beaming light of an ordinary mind. Sobriety is on the side of wisdom and virtue, and is to be recommended to all as a commendable qualification. But I do not apprehend that sobriety is opposed to cheerfulness. Who does not know that relaxation is as necessary as labor? Who does not know that the "bow always bent loses its spring"? Once force upon the mind a continually solitary air; once make it wrong to smile; and you freeze up the spirits; you quench the fires of genius, and convert the man into a passionless image.

The mind loses much in solitude. Sorrow becomes stamped upon the countenance, and a settled gloom tells of the awful wreck of hope. Nature wears not a stern unchanging countenance. Sometimes the elements rage; at other times there is no jarring note in the whole system of Creation. At one time outward circumstances seem to afford universal joy. At another time they force to our lips the cup of bitterness. No place, no age, no rank, is exempt from these eternal vicissitudes which always modify human felicity. Principles are the same yesterday, to-day, and forever: but the numberless series of different subjects with which the mind is called into contact, forbids this to be the case with the feelings. One subject exalts and solemnizes the mind in a high degree; another fills it with joy: another with grief. Thus we conclude that a proper indulgence in cheerfulness is justifiable. ANGLE.

The Child's Farewell.

He upward raised his soft blue eye,
The last sad look to take,
And while his friends were watching by,
He thus serenely spake:

My hour is come—
I die—I die;
I go to the home
Of the blest on high.

Then let no tear
Be shed for me;
From every fear
My heart is free.

Friends, do not grieve!
With joy I go,
And early leave
This world of woe.

Oh, dry your tears,
Nor longer weep—
I have no fears
In death to sleep.

I bid farewell
To earth and care—
For I long to dwell
In regions fair.

My hour is come—
I die—I die;
I go to the home
Of the blest on high.

Then like a star at break of day,
That sinks from mortal sight,
His happy spirit winged its way
Up to the world of light.

THE IDLE BOY.

John was always idle. He despised his book and would never study it unless he was compelled to. He would rather roam about the fields and wander in the country than attend to his lessons. Once he was stung very badly by attempting to rob a bee-hive—at another time came near drowning by taking a boat without leave, and sailing in the bay. He was always in mischief. His parents were careless respecting him, and instead of compelling him to obey their command, they endeavored to coax him into a compliance. On this account John could have his own way. And every body knows when a child can do this he is likely to be ruined for this world. —He would not stay at home in the evening, but associate with those characters who were equally as vicious as himself. Thus John went on from bad to worse, till his name became quite popular in the village. All good people shunned him; for whenever they reproved him, he would treat them so untidy that it seemed like casting pearl before swine.—When he was about sixteen years old he broke into a gentleman's store and took a small quantity of money. He was soon detected and lodeged in jail. Now John began to see his error. He regretted what he had done. But all his sorrow was of no avail. He was confined a number of months—and when liberated, he felt so ashamed of his conduct, that he took passage to a distant state, where hs was not heard of for many years.

Children, see the bad effects of idleness, and resolve in the strength of Heaven that you will be studious and diligent. Never waste a moment in idlenes, for you all remember the consequence.

'For satan finds some mischief still
For idle hands to do.'

If you will be industrious, you will grow up useful and respected—if idle, you will become nuisances to society—stumbling blocks in the way of others.—Remember this, and never, never, never idle away a single moment.

THE RESURRECTION.

> "Through what variety of untried being,
> "Thro' what new scenes and changes must we pass?
> "The wide, the unbounded prospect lies before me:
> "Here will I hold." Addison's Cato.

The moral doctrine of the RESURRECTION, transcends every human invention and stamps the BIBLE with a divine originality and an inconceivable importance.—Such a theory, never did, nor never could enter into the heart of depraved man to conceive.—The above lines from Addison seem to imitatate darkly: faith in the metempsychosis. But this, though an evident improvement on the theory of annihilation, or absorption, or any other theory that goes to destroy faith in a future existence or an unchangeable identity of the human species, yet falls infinitely short of the Bible doctrine of the RESURRECTION of the human body. Nothing else is perfectly fitted to soothe anxieties and allay the fears of mortals in relation to a future state, nothing else consoles with adequate hopes the cheerless heart, struggling under the bereavements of providence, nothing else compensates for the disasters of the fall and restores man to his primeval dignity.

There is in man an instinctive dread of annihilation. Existence, under almost any circumstances save those of hopeless misery, is a blessing. We cannot conceive fully of the terrors we would feel, should we stand on the verge of nonentity, with the certain prospect before us of soon taking the fatal and final plunge. Nothing but guilty despair can quell those living fires which immortality has lit up in the recesses of the human soul.

> ———"Why shrinks the soul!
> "Back on herself, and startles at destruction?
> * * * * *
> "'Tis heaven itself that points out an hereafter."

Almost equal to dread annihilation, is that of loosing their proper identity. When we loose a friend the thought comes up anxiously in the mind. Shall we ever see this friend again? If we are assured of the truth of mutual immortality, still the mind anxiously inquires. Shall my future knowledge of my departed friend be under circumstances at all consonant to our acquaintance? Shall I ever again behold this very image of my friend? Shall I recognize him, call him by name, and recall our past friendship and know that it is indeed the very same with whom I held sweet communion in this world? These questions tear the anxious breast, and no consolation can reach and allay the tender sensibilities of the soul, until it reposes, in unruffled quietude of faith upon the affirmative of these questions.

The doctrine of the RESURRECTION completely satisfies the soul's most intense inquiry, and its largest demand. It answers all the exigencies of the case, and guides the troubled spirit through the rough seas of mortal life. It was on this point that the heathen philosophy totally failed. Even where the future existence of the soul was admitted, no just views of a proper and continued identity were conceived.

Transmigration, for instance, admitted a future existence, but destroyed human identity, and left no ground of consolation to those who survived, for the loss of friends. It has been supposed that the Egyptians, having no conception of a resurrection proper, and consequently no hope of meeting their deceased friends again, resorted to the embalming the human body, with a view to give it a sort of immortality, and perpetuate the associations of life by this means. It was to this supposed loss of identity that the apostle refers where he says, "I would not have you ignorant concerning them which are asleep, that ye sorrow not, even as others that have no hope." Death was a hopeless seperation the heathen because they knew of no restoration of the form, features, and proper identity of their friends—they had no knowledge of a resurrection. What sorrow could be equal to such a loss? Of this, thanks be to God, we in Christendom know nothing by experience. What unspeakable comfort does this doctrine lend to the WRECTHED SONS OF FALLEN ADAM. HOPE awakes; and illumines

> "The dread unknown and chaos of the tomb!
> "Melts, and dispels the spectre doubts that roll
> "Chimerian darkness on the parting soul."

THE BLINDNESS OF ATHEISTS.

BY REV. JOHN FORBES

GALILEO, when suspected of the guilt of ATHEISM, took a straw from the floor of his cell in the Inquistion, and informed his accusers, that in the construction and design of that vegetable tube he saw the hand of God most distinctly revealed, without the necessity of any other evidence whatever.

But how should we stand reproved and self condemned, from considering how little according in general there is, between the demonstrations of God which are daily and unceasingly pouring in around us, and the ordinary teno and habitude of our minds? What folly! what inconsideration, what enmity against God, characterize the heart and the thoughts of man! The whole scene of nature and providence is fitted to arrest and fix our attention upon him who ruleth over all, who is every where present, beholding the evil and the good. The morning proclaims his loving-kindness, and the evening his faithfulness. The varied seasons of the year, all speak of him.—Whether it be the howling blast of winter, or the budding spring—the gay luxuriance of blooming summer, or the abundant riches of gathered autumn, that draw our attention to God, all direct us to lift the hymn of gratitude to his name who has fixed their ordinances with a regularity that shall endure as long as the earth remains. The universe is replete with evidences of his presence—the traces and manifestations of his perfections

When you look to the heavens, you behold the magnificence of his creative and constructive power in those vast systems, receding into endless space, 'which perform in unmeasurable fields their majestic and ceasless revolutions. When you walk abroad through nature's landscapes, each scene of loveliness that meets your eye—each object of interest that fixes your attention—all the orgination and beauty that you admire whether in things animate or inanimate—the very flowers of the earth, the grass of the field, or the insect that almost eludes your observation as it fulfils its ephemeral destiny—all proclaim to you the being and the perfections of him who is the universal parent of all; and whose every work reveals him to be excellent in working and wonderful in counsel.

But instead of telling you where you may find God, let us rather ask, Where is he not? Can we flee from his presence, or hide ourselves from his All-Searching Eye, or leave behind you the proofs of his existence, or escape beyond the limits of his authority, and of his laws? The creation, throughout all its departments, is a witness of God, and an impressive demonstration of accordance to his sovereign will. It responds to every impulse of his power, and fulfils, every dictate of his mind. How pointedly does the sun, from day to day, keep his track and observe his time of rising and of going down? What regularity do the waters of the great deep ebb and flow, and all the process of nature observe their appointed courses.

And is it, that the human heart, the seat of unholy passions and rude tumultuous desires, is the only place where God is not obeyed, and his will not complied with? O what a miracle of wickedness is every ungodly, impenitent, man! He appears as a dark blot on the face of creation, that absorbs without reflecting or manifesting the image of its author—a jarring chord, that mars the sacred symphony of that mighty harp whose every string tells, in sweetest music, that the hand which framed and which touches it is divine. Let every irreligious man consider the host of witnesses around him and above him which declare the power and glory of God. Let him meditate upon the Divine Majesty—the infinite excellence of the adorable Jehovah. Let him ponder his Divine and uquestionable right to receive from his rational creatures all praise and honor, blessing and thanksgiving.

"The Lord hath prepared his throne in the heavens and his kingdom extendeth over all. Bless the Lord, ye his angels that excel in strength, that do his commandments, hearkeneth unto the voice of his word. Bless ye the Lord, all ye his hosts, ye ministers of his, that do his pleassure. Bless the Lord, all ye his works in all places of his dominions. Bless the Lord, O my soul!"

From the New York Evangelist.

SELF-DENIAL.

This world, though a fallen, is admirably adapted to be a school and preparation for a better. Our lot may be trying, but such are the disciplinary ends which it subserves, should never be repined at. The very trials and temptations of life, which are the result of sin, develop in their effects, the best traits of character. Selfishness, passion and evil, war against conscience and religion—not indeed that they may subjugate them, but that they may invigorate and strengthen them. We are placed upon a theatre of fierce and protracted conflict, in order that the moral nature may acquire vigor by the contest, and assurance by repeated victory. These trials and conflicts produce, indeed, much evil, and work out sad results; but they make a fit and noble school. The latent moral strength is thus drawn out and confirmed. Were the path of duty strewed with flowers, the soul would never acquire hardness and vigor.—If pleasure coincided, always with duty, and inclination with justice, then there could be no loyalty to duty. If conscience uttered no voice that did not meet a response in the desires, conscience could never assert its supremacy. We are beset with temptations, and passion is allowed to mutiny against reason and conscience, in order that these noble faculties may have the dignity of dominion, and the joy of victory. God has filled the world with rivals to himself, not that we should worship them, but that we may love him freely. He has implanted within us strong desires for inferior objects, not that we should yield to them, but that the desire of excellence may grow stronger than all.

If there were no self-denials to be made, then would the highest and best virtues never be displayed, and the brightest page of man's earthly history be blotted out.—The noblest men have not been those whose current of life has run most smoothly—whose desires have been least opposed, and wishes most gratified. They have rather been those who have made the most complete sacrifice of their appetites, and passions, and interests to duty and to mankind. They are those who have walked rugged paths, and climbed arduous steeps, and clung to good and great ends, amidst persecution, and pain, and death—who have listened to the voice of conscience amidst the solicitations of ambition and ease, or the menaces of tyranny and malice. It is the hero who is true to his country in the times of darkness and peril—who serves her when she has no laurels for his brow, or wealth for his coffers, whose memory lives embalmed in honored recollections. It is the self-sacrificing apostle, the devoted martyr, who has held fast to the truth at the cost of life, and bequeathed it to future ages in blood, whom the church and the world regard with gratitude. All great virtues bear the impress of self-denial; true excellence is the price of difficulty and toil. Without it no good or great thing has ever been achieved; and the soul unstrengthened by its power, and unimpelled by its lofty impulses, sinks into dwarfish imbecility. Never, if we know our true interest, or scan the deep designs of our present probationary state, shall we falter at our difficulties, or repine at our trials. They are most wisely and kindly ordained; and happy is he, who, by yielding to their disciplino, reaps the reward of their conquest.

PASSING AWAY.

"Passing away, is written upon the world and all the world contains."

It is written upon earth's verdant carpet and upon each fragrant flower. It is written upon the purling stream that gently flows over the smooth pebbles with ceaseless murmers. It is written upon the restless wave of the broad blue ocean. It is written upon the Sun as his golden beams are fading in the west. It is written upon the silvery moon, and upon each twinkling star. It is written upon all the works of art—churches, towers, temples. The lofty edifice, the swelling dome, the sculptured marble, the gigantic pyramid, all bear the same impress. It is written upon the tremendous torrent that rushes down the mighty cataract. It is written upon the frowning clouds, and the roaring winds, and the distant thunder that breaks upon the solemn hour of midnight. I wander to the churchyard, and there, while standing by the tomb of a departed friend, passing away, is wafted by the sighing breeze that comes gently whispering through the pendant branches of the weeping willow that mournfully over-shadows the marble urn. Passing away is written upon the dense deep forest. Let me briefly sketch its varying changes. Now I behold it beautifully arrayed in summer's verdant foilage; I look again, and autumn has cast its dying robes around it, and with pestilential breath is rudely severing from its branches the variegated leaves and strewing them upon the earth. But autumn now having accomplished his work of ruin, howling has fled to the verge of winter and there sits mournfully chanting his funeral dirge among the leafless trees. Oh, ruthless time! passing away is written by thy withering hand upon every earthly object, and every scource of earthly enjoyment, our dearest friends not excepted. But because by thy irresistable power now bears such an unlimitted sway that thou art immortal, for thy course will soon be finished, thy sentence is already pronounced against thee, and very soon the archangel will be commissioned from the shining courts of Heaven, to set one foot upon the Land and the other upon the Sea, and declare that time shall be no longer.—Can man reflect upon the fading and transitory things of earth without a fervent desire and earnestly seeking to secure a title to the regions of everlasting bliss that are far beyond the confines of this changing and inconstant world? What are our lives? They are even but a vapor that appeareth but a little while, and then vanisheth away. Then whatever we have to do, to prepare for eternity, must be done quickly, or forever remain unperformed.

Are we conscious that we have important duties to discharge, either to our fellow men or to God, let us perform them now while time may be given us Are we contemplating future acts of benevolence, let us haste to give while the gift can be enjoyed, and remember that our opportunities for doing good will soon have passed away; and as we are passing through this world, let us be prepared to participate in the joys of that bright world

> "Where the spoiler finds no prey,
> "Where lovly things and sweet
> "Pass not away."

THE GLORIOUS APPEARING.

BY THE REV. J. H. STEWART.

He will at his coming be seen in his glory.—The holy Scriptures with particular emphasis, record this part of his advent. Thus he himself declares: "Whosoever shall be ashamed of me and of my words, of him will the Son of Man be ashamed when he comes in his own glory, and of his Father, and all the holy angels." So again, to his disciples: "Then shall appear the sign of the Son of Man in heaven—and then shall they see the Son of Man coming in the clouds of heaven, with power and great glory." The Apostle Paul, also when he speaks of this event, says "Looking for that blessed hope, and the glorious appearing of the great God our Savior Jesus Christ."

The "glorious appearing!" And if you examine the particulars, you will find it well merits this title. For HE comes, himself the incarnate GOD; his seat "a great white throne;" a throne so filled with majesty that its appearance "the heavens and earth flee away, and their place is no more seen." He comes attended by myriads of angels. As kings in visiting their subjects, have a numerous train with them; when the "KING OF KINGS" appears, ten thousand times ten thousand angels form his train. All the host of heaven accompany him. The mighty angels that excel in strength; the seraphim which surrounds the throne; archangels—none are absent; all these happy spirits with joy attend their KING. The "voice" which will proclaim his advent will heighten the solemnity. On great occasions, heralds are sent before to proclaim the coming of a judge, or the near approach of a king: In that day, when the Judge of all the earth draws nigh, Archangels will be the Heralds. The trump of God will sound, and with that voice, that the whole creation will return the echo: "For all that are in their graves will come forth—the sea will give up its dead; DEATH and HELL will give up the dead that are in it."

DAVID BRAINERD.

The best and holiest men that have ever lived, have often been those that have been most persecuted. "The carnal mind is enmity against God," and against those that resemble him. The world could not endure the purity of the Lord Jesus Christ; but put him to death. The opposition which the human heart has to holiness, is the secret cause of all that persecution which has been poured upon the saints of God in every age. Few eminently holy men, who have aimed at the reformation of their fellow men, have escaped persecution. The Hon. Rev. Baptist NOEL in his address to the Church Missionary Society, alludes to the "MISSIONARY BRAINERD," in this connection, in the following manner: "If ever there lived a man superior to all suspicion, and who had more enthusiastically devoted his heart and soul to the sacred cause of the extension of Christianity than another, a man who had devoted his property, and his life to the work of the Lord, and that man was BRAINERD, and yet he, a faithful instructor of the peoplo, and a sincere laborer in the vineyard of Christ, came into collision with individuals of the neighborhood in which he was stationed, and had been designated as being engaged in a Popish plot, and with endeavoring to seduce the Indian population from their friendly feeling toward the English nation." If they call the master of the house Belzebub, will they not much more those of his household?

The ministers of God have no reason to be discouraged because they are opposed, or because their names are cast out as evil. This has been the case always, and it will continue so to be, as long as this world remains under the power of the EVIL ONE. —Epis. Recorder.

THE DYING CHRISTIAN.—O how refreshing, delightful, encouraging to us, on our way to Zion, to perceive around us those who are "living unto the Lord," with their eyes and hearts fixed upon the heavenly inheritance. And O, still happier sight, and yet an awful rejoicing, to behold a brother "dying unto the Lord;" to witness the triumphs of our holy faith in nature's last hour and satan's last buffeting; to observe the trophies of Divine love adorning and cheering the melancholy bed—the tranquil smile, the unwearied trust, the patient contented, thankful resignation; the uplifted hand and eye, the illuminated countenance, the peaceful spirit all the while ready to wing its flight. Go boastful science! go vain philosophy! and visit the death-beds of your votaries: mark well the doubts and fears betraying themselves under the mask of a bold profession; mark the impatience and vexation; the present burden and the miserable foreboding; go and discover your infidel champions, and proud Goliaths of your kingdom, trembling and quailing under the lifted stroke of death; and despairing under the load of unforgiven sin, under the terrors of an insulted and avenging God. Go to your despisers of the crucified Jesus, to those who have been too wise to seek or too busy to find him; see them, as I have seen, stretching out their hands in agony, and saying "Is there none to save a fellow-creature from destruction?" Then, when ye are sickend with such scenes, repair to the bedside of a departing saint, and see how a Christian can die. Go and study a lesson, more instructive and more precious than all your pages of human lore and learning; go and learn from a lovely example, how to live and how to die.—Rev. J. Slade.

Dissipation and Fashionable Life.

There can be no vice which does not arise, in some way or other, from indulgence. It matters not whether it be an indulgence of the body or the mind, it is the same. In the present age there are scarcely any one exempt from its baneful sway; extending alike its demoralizing and destructive influence over the aged, the middle aged and the young, it poisons and prevents the moral and physical faculties from their full development, and finally swallows up both in one mighty chaos. There is a kind of dissipation which brings down the proudest and most gifted; but there is no kind which elevates and refines.

Frivolity and fashion appear to be the great focus at which the attention of the present age is directed, and there is nothing so unstable and demoralizing. The young man commences life in the sunshine of prosperity, with friends, and, perchance, fortune. His may have been the quiet, secluded, unobtrusive course before, but soon he is lead into what the world calls fashionable life, and the scene is changed. He who before was warm-hearted, and pleasant as the sunbeams of a summer morn, is now cold, heartless, and distant. He discards from his society the pious and the plain, and assiduously courts the dissipated, the fashionable and the gay.

Some summers since a case came under our personal observation, which affords an ample demonstration of the evils of dissipation and fashionable life. We relate the circumstance, with a view that it may prevent others from following a like course.

"To-morrow," said my friend James M——, "I leave this secluded, unenviable situation, and go to the city of Boston, to enter the world, and I sincerely rejoice. I have long lived in this old-fashioned, rusty village; and I now leave it to launch into the gay and pleasant scenes of life, there to decide and act for myself, not to be trammeled by any influence."

This was addressed to a particular friend, who said nothing in reply. We could not but fear, that his starting with such views and feelings was to be a dangerous course; that he would necessarily have to pass over many quick-sands, and that it would be almost a miracle if he passed through the ordeal unscathed. He was a young man who had enjoyed the best advantages for an Education, and had improved them. He had lingered long around the Springs, and it was not singular that he longed to enter upon the duties of active life—to mingle among the glittering throng, and to stand forth in society a proud—a fashionable man. He went forth, cherishing all these high hopes, and it is not strange that he fell, as thousands had before, and will continue to do, if the idle visions of fancy continue to glitter around their pathway, instead of the more benign and savory influences of the better judgment.

James M—— entered the city, and for a while he seemed to glide along on a clear and placid stream. His daily avocations received his attention, and he began to rise in merit. But, alas, he soon commenced moving in "fashionable society," and began to dissipate. His fate may be quickly summed up. Ruin and degradation followed, and ere a twelve-month passed over his head, he was hurried to an untimely grave.

Such is the connection between dissipation and fashionable life. With such eagerness do many pursue shadows, that they are brought upon the verge of ruin before they have a moment for serious reflection. Who would not exchange all the frivolities of fashionable life for an inheritance with the saints in glory? Who would not evade the delusive charms of the Theatre, for the more ennobling, enduring realities of the Christian religion? Who would not dash from his oft-tempted lip the maddening bowl, nor regret its continued absence, for a prospect of enjoying the society of angels, in a celestial life?

NOTICE.

The adjourned yearly meeting of the Stockholders of De Ruyter Institute will occur on Monday, the 4th of October next, at 1 o'clock, P. M., at the Institute, to elect four Trustees to fill the seats of Alexander Campbell, Perry Burdick, Benjamin Enos, and William Maxson, to hold their office 3 years, (the seats of the above being vacated at that time,) and to transact such other business as may be found necessary on the occasion.

Every Stockholder is entitled to one vote for each share of $25. Those wishing to vote by proxy can do so by forwarding their votes to the Secretary, or any of the Stockholders, naming the persons whom they wish to elect, and requesting such individual to act for them, noting, also, their number of shares.

Abolition Meeting.

The Rev. Mr. FLETCHER, Pastor of the Baptist Church in Hamilton, Madison co., is expected to deliver an Anti-Slavery Address, at the Presbyterian Church, in this village, on Thursday, 23d inst., at 3 o'clock, P. M.

The well known talents of Mr. Fletcher, his character and standing in the denomination of which he is a member, and his knowledge of the practical influence of the slave system, derived from a number of year's residence at the South, will doubtless ensure a general attendance.

GERRIT SMITH, ESQ., is also expected to address the meeting in the evening.

FOREIGN NEWS.

From the New-York Tribune,—Extra.

ARRIVAL OF THE BRITANNIA.

FIFTEEN DAYS LATER FROM EUROPE.

With the usual punctuality of the Cunard Line, the Steamship Britannia, Capt. R. B. Clelland, arrived at her moorings in East Boston yesterday morning, after a passage of a little over thirteen days, inclusive of a longer than usual detention at Halifax. The news she brings is not important. A general summary may be found below.

The markets remain in the same dull state as per last advices, with the exception of Flour, which had advanced 6s. 6d. on bonded American. The Cotton market, with its rise and fall of prices is about the same, and closing with an improved demand on the 17th. The Money market was tight, and money scarce. Tea had advanced in consequence of the news from China.

The commercial intelligencer from the Continent wears a very gloomy aspect.—Flour and Wheat had risen every where, in consequence of the state of the crops in Great Britain.

The Britannia brings us no news of importance from Great Britain. As our latest advices are up to the evening of the 18th, and as Parliament was not to assemble until a day after, we have no political intelligence of any consequence. Sir Robert Peel had announced his determination not to oppose the re-election of Mr. Shaw Lefevre, the former Whig Speaker.

The London Globe of the 16th, contains the following apparently official announcement:

"As, in her Majesty's present condition, any undertaking involving anxiety or fatigue might prove injurious, we understand that Dr. Locock has interposed his veto; and that the new Parliament will be opened by Commission, instead of by the Queen in person."

Case of McLeod.—The London Times closes a long article on the subject of McLeod's detention, as follows:

"These considerations belong, however, to a stage in these proceedings which is, we fear, already past. Principles and arguments, like those we have been using, doubtless suggested themselves in support of the opinion which Lord Palmerston was pledged to maintain in negotiation with the American Government. To such arguments Mr. Webster's despatch of the 24th of April gives no sufficient answer; but that despatch having been, though conciliatory, quite unsatisfactory, and the judgment of Justice Cowan, having demonstrated that the law as administered at Utica is slowly drawing along the worst consequences, doubts may reasonably be entertained whether all negotiation on the subject is not peremptorily broken off by the decided rejection of those principles by which the British Government declared itself to be guided. Is it becoming to the dignity of this country that we should patiently await the very last, perhaps the fatal stage of those proceedings, against which we have protested from the first? Is it in any way compatible with the safety of McLeod, and the honor of the Crown under which he has served, to reserve our more forcible remonstrances till he is sent by these American judges beyond the reach of succor? If Mc'Leod is to be acquitted by force of evidence, or any other ground, we presume that he will not be placed in greater jeopardy than he now is in by any acts of the mother country. If, as would seem but too probable, his chance of a fair trial is as small as his chance of subsequent pardon, we cannot be too soon prepared to interfere in the only way which remains to us."

The London Atlas says "An immense British fleet, accompanied by a prodigious number of armed steam-ships, is collecting about the shores of North America. What this portends cannot be doubtful."

We also find in other papers the rumor, that four or five sail of line are to be immediately despatched to our coast, where they are joined by several other ships of war and armed steamers, and the object of this naval force is said to be to follow up and support the demand made by the British government upon that of the United States, for the liberation of Mr. McLeod.

Mehemet Ali.—The reply of Mehemet Ali to the addresses of the East India and China Association has been received. It is couched in terms of inter-national friendship, and expresses the Pasha's willingness to continue his exertions for the advancement of civilization and humanity.

CHINA.

We have received, says the Morning Herald, a letter from Macao of the 27th of April, put on board the steamer at Bombay on the 19th of June, after the mail and other despatches had been embarked. It is to the following effect:

MACAO, April 27.

"The Chinese local government has violated the agreement made with Captain Elliott for the renewal of trade with British subjects. We are also surprised to find that since the first, not 1,000 chests of tea have found their way out to foreign vessels by smuggling. We had hopes of doing something in that way, but the unexpected vigilance and activity of the mandarins and soldiers, have disappointed our hopes for the present.

"About the 17th a chop arrived from the Emperor, couched in the most violent terms, ordering all authorities, civil and military, in the provinces of Canton, to destroy all the teas, rhubarb, and other articles necessary for the English barbarians. This order is rigidly obeyed, and probably one half of the crop of tea is already destroyed, and the work is still going on.

"Indemnity is promised by the same chop to those whose property is destroyed, and rewards for those who discover secreted articles.

"We further find in the same chop political intercourse with the English is interdicted, and the lately-appointed commissioners ordered to retire.

"Numerous fire-vessels and rafts have been sent down the river among the foreign shipping, by which several vessels and cargoes have been injured, but no total loss.

"Our commander is deliberating on the propriety of moving all vessels below the second bar into a wider part of the river.

"A report prevails, but to which no credit is attached, that some British subjects were kidnapped by the Chinese on the night of the 25th.

"But little is doing south of Formosa in opium."

FRANCE.

The warlike preparations of France continue, and they now begin to cause considerable anxiety. Levies of workmen, raised at Marseilles and elsewhere, have marched to Toulon to forward the construction of new, and the repair of old vessels of war. One vessel was launched on the 30th of July, another will find its element in December. The "Fanfaron" and "Faune" are to be launched at the beginning of 1842, and "Le Sceptre" and "Castiglione" are rapidly proceeding.

The members of the Committee of Armament of the northern coast of France, placed under the presidency of Gen. Lahitte, had arrived at Havre, after inspecting the whole line of coast between that harbor and Dunkirk.

The French fleet under Admiral Hugon, consisting of twelve sail of the line, a frigate and a corvette, anchored on the morning of the 2d inst.; and the "Friedland," 120 gun ship, arrived at Toulon from Cherbourg on the 6th. These reinforcements may, in some respects, be explained by the anticipated confusion in Spain, and the consequent probable necessity for France to show a strong front towards that country.

SPAIN.

A letter from Madrid of the 7th inst., states that Queen Christina's protest had produced very little impression in the country, contrary to what was at first anticipated. Arguelles was making great changes in the household.

Madrid letters and journals of the 8th inst. have been received. On the 7th the committee appointed to examine the protest forwarded from Paris by General Francisco Narvaez against the election of a guardian, presented its report to the assembly, in which it states that "the offensive language in which it was written, placed it beneath the notice of the Senate." It was rumored that General Ribero, the commander at Pampeluna, was to be superseded in his post by General Rencali.

It appears that since the publication of Espartero's answer to the allocution of the Pope, no clergyman dare show himself in the streets of Madrid, the populace being fully disposed to adopt the opinions of the Regent in this respect, if in no other.

THE EAST.

A German paper brings news from Beyrout of the 8th of July. The negociations with the princess of Lebanon were taking an unfavorable turn for the Sultan. The Bedouins were laying waste the environs of El Arish. The repairs of the fortifications of Acre had been completed, and many important additions have been made by English engineers to their strength. A convent on Mount Carmel had been fixed upon as a garrison for English troops, but having been represented as neutral ground, under the protection of the French, will not be so occupied. The mountaineers appear every where opposed to the restoration of the Turkish domination. The prevailing wish of the Christian population is to form an independent kingdom, having Jerusalem for its capital. This is a notion which nothing but force of arms will incline them to relinquish; and to reduce them to obedience would, it is affirmed, require a Turkish army of not fewer than 50,000 men.

The British forces, still in possession of Alexandria, are strengthening the fortifications of that place.

Mehemet Ali has given orders in France and Belgium for a number of Paixhan's guns for the fortifications there.

Congressional News.

From the New-Yorker.

WASHINGTON CORRESPONDENCE.

Wednesday, Aug. 25.

In Senate, to-day, Mr. Sturgeon presented a petition of the citizens of Pittsburg, for an exemption from duty of articles which enter into the manufacture of glass. Laid on the table.

Mr. Calhoun presented the proceedings and resolutions of a meeting of citizens of Petersburg, Va., against a Protective Tariff and a National Bank, and approving the Veto of the President; also against Distribution, and expressing the hope of the veto of the bill for this purpose, if passed. Laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Tappan moved to take up the resolution offered by him some days since for an adjournment of Congress on the 30th inst. The motion was negatived: Yeas 19, Nays 24.

The Select Committee appointed yesterday by the President of the Senate, to whom the Fiscal Corporation bill is to be referred, consists of the following Senators: Messrs. Berrien, Evans, Archer, Morehead and Huntington.

Mr. King expressed his surprise in seeing this morning that not one of his party had been placed on that Committee. Such a case never before happened since he had been in Congress, except one. It was customary to appoint a majority of the Committee of friends of the measure, but always to have a portion of the other party also members. He therefore moved to add two members to this Committee, to be selected from the minority.

The President stated the facts of the case, and the reasons on which he had acted. One of those appointed had voted against the Bank bill. When the present bill was brought into the Senate, a proposition was made to postpone it indefinitely, and was sustained by 21. This he considered as evidence of deadly hostility to the measure, and none of those had been appointed on the Committee. He had acted according to a rule of Jefferson's Manual, which was that those opposed to a particular feature of a measure might be appointed on the Committee to consider it, but none who were entirely opposed.

Mr. Benton complained of the composition of the Committee; they were all members of the same party, all friends of the measure, and the five junior members of the Senate. He then at some length related various anecdotes connected with this "corporosity,"—as the name would be abbreviated, and considered it merely a renewal of Mr. Biddle's Bank.

After some farther conversation, Mr King withdrew his motion.

The District and P[illegible] taken up and [illegible] Messrs. Woodbury, S[illegible] and Walker in [illegible] Archer and Woodbridge in its support. Mr Cuthbert expressed a desire to speak, and for this purpose, with the understanding that the question be taken on the bill to-morrow, the Senate adjourned.

In the House, the bill making appropriation for the relief of the Post-Office Department, was debated during the day, and besides the merits of the question, much miscellaneous and political matter was introduced. Messrs. Steenrod, Littlefield, Hopkins, and Gordon opposed, and Messrs Briggs and Arnold advocated the bill.

[Here a warm discussion ensued, in which Messrs. Arnold, Ingersoll, Stanley, Botts, Proffit, Dawson, Marshall and Wise, took a part, tinctured too highly with political strife and personal animosities to find a place in our columns.]

The House then adjourned.

Thursday, Aug. 26.

The Senate have to-day been occupied by discussion on the Distribution Bill, which was finally passed by a vote of 28 Yeas to 23 Nays.

Messrs. Cuthbert, McRoberts, Pierce, Benton, Sevier, and Linn opposed the bill during the day, and Mr. Rives briefly advocated it.

Mr. Benton, at the conclusion of his remarks of more than an hour, moved to recommit the bill, with instructions to strike out its "bamboozling" pre-emption sections, (as he styled them,) and insert sections including the pre-emption and graduation principle. This motion was lost by Yeas 22, Nays 29, (the vote being the same as above, except Mr. Preston's, who here voted in the negative.)

The bill was then passed as above stated.

In the House of Representatives, the bill making appropriation for the relief of the Post Office Department, was taken up.

The question was then taken, first being on the amendment of Mr. Gillmer that the appropriation shall be accounted for by the Department, and be hereafter refunded to the Treasury, or be deducted from balances now due that Department from Government.

A motion of Mr. McKay to strike out this latter clause of the amendment was negatived. The original amendment was then adopted, and the bill having been passed in Committee, was reported to the House, where the amendment was concurred in, and the bill passed, by Yeas 127, Nays 46. It appropriates 497,657 to enable the Department to meet its dues to contractors and others.

The bill making an appropriation of $3,088 09 for the expenses of the funeral of William Henry Harrison, was taken up, and after some conversation as to one of the items, was amended so as to give the Auditor of the Treasury power to settle the just accounts; and then passed by a vote of 128 to 23.

The bill making appropriations of $8,600 for the freight from Italy, and for the erection in the Rotunda of the Capitol of Greenough's Statute of Washington, and also appropriating for the balance due for the execution of the work, was taken up and passed. The House then adjourned.

Thus the Land Bill, so long under discussion, has at length passed the Senate. It will be again sent to the House for its concurrence in the amendments. The Revenue bill will probably next be taken up.

Friday, Aug. 27.

In Senate, the Revenue bill came up rather unexpectedly, [illegible] was on the amendment [illegible] nance Committee, pro[illegible] duty on laces, jew[illegible] (when set,) watches [illegible] of gold and silver, [illegible] cent.

Mr. Clay of Ky. [illegible] supported the amen[illegible] Calhoun, Smith of [illegible] King opposed it. [illegible] The question was t[illegible] ment prevailed: Yeas [illegible] Calhoun, Henderson, K[illegible] and Wright—5. The S[illegible] to Executive Session.

In the House the Florid[illegible] came up, but was not acted on. [illegible] providing for the purchase of s[illegible] tifications was discussed for some time [illegible] little purpose. Mr. Dawson of Ga. believed the State of New York owed the United States $2,000,000 on Revolutionary account. Messrs. Ferris, Fillmore and others opposed this suggestion. Finally the [illegible] was laid aside for the day.

A Message was received from the President, stating that he had signed the bill rechartering the Banks of the District of Columbia.

The Land bill came back from the Senate, with amendments. After a spirited running debate, it was referred to the Land Committee.

The bill making appropriations for the Diplomatic Service of the United States was debated at length and passed. Mr. Adams moved a resolution, cutting down the amount of such Diplomatic Service.

The bills providing for the repair of the Potomac Bridge and the repaving of Pennsylvania Avenue were severally considered and passed. Adjourned.

S[illegible]day, Aug. 2[illegible]

In Senate, to-day, Mr. Choate presented a petition of citizens of Boston, praying [illegible] for the postponement of the operation of [illegible] the new tariff [illegible] that [illegible] actually shipped be exempted [illegible] rates.

The bills from the House for the [illegible] tion of Greenough's Statue of Washington in the R[illegible] [illegible] ferred.

The Fortification Bill was [illegible] up, and the amendments of the H[illegible] agreed to—(appropriating $[illegible] defense of Buffalo, by a vote of 2[illegible]) The amendment of the Senate, appropriating $30,000 for South Western Surveys, and that appropriating $75,000 for the expense of purchasing the site for a Western, South Western, or North Western Armory, which were not agreed to by the House, were insisted on by the Senate—the latter by a vote of 24 to 19.

The Revenue bill was then taken up as in Committee of the Whole, and several slight amendments, after Committee, agreed to, exempting from the duty palm-leaf, sumac, bleaching powders, and cream a tartar.

The bill was then passed over, and Mr. Rives, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, reported the bill to carry into effect the treaty under the convention with Mexico, recommending a concurrence in the amendments of the House.

On motion of Mr. Sevier, the bill to provide for the satisfaction of the outstanding Choctaw reservation, under the treaty of Dancing Rabbit Creek, was taken up and after some conversation, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading. The Senate then adjourned.

The Tariff bill will be before the Senate next week, and will probably give rise to considerable debate. The 'Fiscal Corporation' bill is not yet reported from the Select Committee.

In the House of Representatives, the bill making an appropriation for the paving of Pennsylvania Avenue of Washington was lost: Yeas 69, Nays 103.

The bill to carry into effect the treaty with Mexico was taken up, and after brief discussion was passed.

The House then, at an early hour, adjourned.

Monday, Aug. 30.

The Distribution Bill has at length passed both houses of Congress, and needs only the signature of the President to become a law! It was taken up to-day in the House for the purpose of concurring in the amendments of the Senate, all of which were agreed to, except three, apportioning the distribution among the States according to their Federal respective representation in the two Houses of Congress. These were rejected. The amendment suspending the distribution whenever the rate of duty on imports shall exceed 20 per cent. was agreed to, by a vote of Yeas 108 to Nays 94.

Mr. Everett asked leave to offer a resolution that Congress ought not to adjourn till some measure is adopted for the safekeeping of the public revenue; and Mr. Atherton asked to offer a resolution for adjournment on Monday, 6th of Sept., both of which were objected to.

Mr. Wise, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported a resolution calling on the Secretary of the Navy for a list of Naval Officers who have for the last five years been on shore without leave, which was adopted unanimously.

The Fortification bill was taken up, and the House refused by Yeas 87, Nays 94, to agree to the amendment of the Senate, appropriating $30,000 for South Western Surveys. Without taking the question on the other, appropriating $75,000 for the site of an Armory, the House adjourned.

In Senate, Mr. Archer presented resolutions of a meeting of citizens of Orange co., Va., condemning the measures of the [illegible] and approving of the Veto [illegible] Tyler.

[illegible] Clay and Simmons presented [illegible] citizens of Philadelphia, for [illegible] of bleaching powder from [illegible] with the resolutions presented were laid on the table.

[illegible] moved to take up the resolution [illegible] adjournment of Congress, so [illegible] might be fixed on which [illegible] The motion failed: [illegible] 22. An adjournment can [illegible] expected, as Mr. Clay to-day [illegible] would agree on no day till the [illegible] Bank bills were decided on, if [illegible] remained here till Christmas.

[illegible] from the Committee on the [illegible] reported the resolution for the [illegible] of the printed return of the Sixth Census, with a recommendation from the Committee that the amendment of the House be concurred in. This was done, and they provide for the printing of 20,000 copies of a compendium of the returns.

Mr. Berrien, from the Select Committee on that subject, reported the "Fiscal Corporation Bill," from the House, without amendment, and asked that it be made the special order for Wednesday.

The Revenue bill was then taken up, and Mr. Buchanan offered an amendment to repeal the act of 1832, exempting rail road iron from duty, and to subject it to the 20 per cent. duty, except that already imported. To this Mr. Huntington offered an amendment to exempt also from duty, the rail road iron which shall be imported prior to December 1, 1841.

The amendments were debated about four hours; by Messrs. Buchanan, Miller, Huntington, and others in support; and by Messrs. Calhoun, Clay of Ala., King, [illegible] Berrien, and others, in opposition, [illegible] Southern States [illegible] with the commencement of R[illegible] which they commenced [illegible] recorded, [illegible] amendment of [illegible] subsequently [illegible] No [illegible]

[illegible] taken up, [illegible] which [illegible] Messrs. Smith, Clay and [illegible] by Messrs. Benton, [illegible] Clay of Ala. and Tappan, the amendments which were disagreed to by [illegible] by a vote of [illegible] Yeas [illegible] Nays. [illegible] Senate then adjourned.

Tuesday, Aug. 31.

In the House of Representatives, to-day, Mr. Fillmore [illegible] reply of Mr. Wood, stated that the Committee of Ways and Means had determined to make no farther appropriations at the present session for the completion of the Custom-House at New York.

The resolution on the McLeod case was taken up and Mr. Barnard spoke his hour on the general subject, in defense of the course of Mr. Webster, and maintaining that the affair connected with the burning of the Caroline being a trespass on our soil, contrary to the treaty with Great Britain, was a matter between the two Governments. The resolution was laid over.

A bill to enlarge the Corporation of Georgetown, reported by Mr. Underwood, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, was read and referred to the Committee of the Whole.

The Fortification Bill was again taken up, the question being on the amendment of the Senate, appropriating $75,000 for a site for a Western, North Western, or South Western Armory. Various Members spoke, designating almost as many different sites, each one insisting that his selection was the proper one. The House refused to concur in the amendment, and, on motion of Mr. Summers of Va., adopted, by a vote of 120 Yeas to 42 Nays, an amendment appropriating for this purpose $5,000, the selection to be made by the President, and approved by Congress.

Mr. Morgan moved a re-consideration of the vote refusing to concur in the Senate's amendment, appropriating $30,000 for South Western Surveys. The motion failed: Yeas 80, Nays 86. A Committe of Conference was then appointed, and the House adjourned.

The House, much in advance of the Senate, have almost entirely transacted their business, and are prepared for an adjournment whenever the Senate, progressing at the tardy pace which it cannot avoid, owing to the unwearied opposition of the minority at every step, shall have transacted their business. Mr. Buchanan to-day expressed his belief, as well as hope, that this would take place by Monday next; but it seems quite improbable.

In the Senate, Mr. Merrick from the Committee on the District of Columbia, reported the House bill, making an appropriation for the funeral expenses of the late Gen. Harrison; which was taken up, and passed without debate.

The bill making an appropriation for the relief of the Post Office Department, was reported by Mr. Henderson, taken up, and occupied the Senate during the day.

An amendment of the Committee applying $15,000 of the appropriation for the employment of 13 extra clerks for one year, and for stationery, to assist the auditor in bringing up the arrearages of accounts, was adopted.

Much debate was elicited, and the Opposition with the exception of Messrs. Buchanan and Walker, opposed the bill, as being an innovation on long established usage, contrary to the design of the Constitution, and contending that this Department stood alone and should receive no aid from the Treasury.

Mr. Benton offered an amendment, as he professed, for the means of increasing the

News of the Day.

The Second Veto Message.

We are indebted to the New-York Evening Post for an early copy of the Message, which was sent to the House on Thursday, returning, with the President's objections, the "Fiscal Corporation Bill."

MESSAGE.

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

It is with extreme regret that I feel constrained by the duty faithfully to execute the office of President of the United States, and to the best of my ability "to preserve, protect and defend the Constitution of the United States," to return to that House in which it originated, the Bill "to provide for the better collection, safe-keeping, and disbursement of the public revenue by means of a corporation to be styled the Fiscal Corporation of the United States," with my written objections.

In my message sent to the Senate on the 16th day of August last, returning the Bill "to incorporate the subscribers to the Fiscal Bank of the United States," I distinctly declared that "my own opinion had been uniformly proclaimed to be against the exercise "of the power of Congress to create a National Bank to operate per se over the Union," and entertaining that opinion, my main objection to that bill was based upon the highest moral and religious obligations of conscience and the Constitution.

I readily admit, that, whilst the qualified Veto with which the Chief Magistrate is invested, should be regarded, and was intended by the wise men who made it a part of the Constitution, as a great conservative principle of our system, without the exercise of which, on important occasions, a mere representative majority might urge the government, in its legislation, beyond the limits fixed by its framers, or might exert its just powers too hastily, or oppressively, yet, it is a power which ought to be most cautiously exerted, and perhaps never, except in a case eminently involving the public interest, or one in which the oath of the President, acting under his convictions both mental and moral, imperiously requires its exercise. In such a case he has no alternative. He must either exert the negative power entrusted to him by the Constitution chiefly for its own preservation, protection, and defense, or commit an act of gross moral turpitude. Mere regard to the will of a majority, must not, in a Constitutional Republic like ours, control this sacred and solemn duty of a sworn officer.—The constitution itself I regard and cherish as the embodied and written will of the whole people of the United States.

It is their fixed and fundamental law, which they unanimously prescribe to the public functionaries, their mere trustees and servants. This their will, and the law which they have given us as the rule of our action, has no guard, no guarantee of preservation, protection, and defense, but the oaths which it prescribes to public officers, the sanctity with which they shall religiously observe those oaths, and the patriotism with which the people shall shield it by their own sovereignty, which has made the constitution supreme. It must be exerted against the will of a mere representative majority, or not at all. It is alone in pursuance of that will that any measure can ever reach the President; and to say that because a majority in Congress have passed a bill, the President should therefore sanction it, is to abrogate the power altogether, and to render its insertion in the Constitution, a work of absolute supererogation. The duty is to guard the fundamental will of the people themselves from—in this case I admit unintentional—change or infraction by a majority in Congress; and in that light alone do I regard the constitutional duty which I now most reluctantly discharge.

Is this bill, now presented for my approval or disapproval, such a bill as I have already declared could not receive my sanction? Is it such a bill as calls for the exercise of the negative power under the constitution? Does it violate the Constitution by creating a National Bank to operate per se over the Union? Its title, in the first place, describes its general character. It is "An act to provide for the better collection, safe-keeping, and disbursement of the public revenue by means of a Corporation, to be styled the Fiscal Corporation of the United States." In style, then, it is plainly national in character. Its powers, functions, and duties, are those pertaining to the collecting, keeping, and disbursing the public revenue. The means by which these are to be exerted, is a Corporation, to be styled the Fiscal Corporation of the United States. It is a Corporation created by the Congress of the United States, in its character of a national legislature for the whole Union, to perform the fiscal purposes, meet the fiscal wants and exigencies, supply the fiscal uses, and exert the fiscal agencies of the Treasury of the United States.

Such is its own description of itself.—Do its provisions contradict its title? They do not. It is true, that by its first section it provides that it shall be established in the District of Columbia; but the amount of its capital—the manner in which its stock is to be subscribed for and held—the persons and bodies corporate and politic by whom its stock may be held—the appointment of its directors and their powers and duties—its fundamental articles, especially that to establish agencies in any part of the Union—the corporate powers and business of such agencies—the prohibition of Congress to establish any other corporation, with similar powers, for twenty years, with express reservation, in the same clause, to modify or create any bank for the District of Columbia so that the aggregate capital shall not exceed five millions—without enumerating other features which are equally distinctive and characteristic—clearly show that it cannot be regarded as other than a Bank of the United States, with powers seemingly more limited, than have heretofore been granted to such an institution. It operates per se over the Union, by virtue of the unaided, and, in view, assumed authority of Congress as a national legislature, as distinguished from a Bank created by Congress for the District of Columbia, as the local legislature of the District.

Every United States Bank heretofore created, has had power to deal in Bills of Exchange as well as local discounts. Both were trading privileges conferred, and both exercised by virtue of the aforesaid power of Congress, over the whole Union.—The question of power remains unchanged without reference to the extent of privilege granted. If this proposed corporation is to be regarded as a local Bank of the District of Columbia, invested by Congress with general powers to operate over the Union, it is obnoxious to still stronger objections. It assumes that Congress may invest a local institution with general or national powers. With the same propriety that it may do this in regard to a Bank. Yet, who can indulge the idea that this Government can rightfully, by making a State Bank its fiscal agent, invest it with the absolute and unqualified powers conferred by this bill? When I come to look to the details of the Bill, they do not recommend it strongly to my adoption. A brief notice of some of its provisions will suffice:—

1st. It may justify substantially a system of discounts of the most objectionable character. It is to deal in bills of exchange drawn in one state and payable in another, without any restraint. The bill of exchange may have an ulimited term to run and it renewability its no where guarded against. It may, in fact, assume the most objectionable form of accommodation. It is not required to rest on any actual, real or substantial exchange basis. A drawer in one place becomes the acceptor in another, and so in turn the acceptor may become the drawer upon a mutual understanding. It may at the same time indulge in mere local discounts under the name of bills of exchange. A bill drawn at Philadelphia on Camden, New Jersey—at New York on a border town in New Jersey—at Cincinnati on Newport, Kentucky, not to multiply other examples, might for anything in this bill to restrain it, become a mere matter of local accommodation. Cities relatively situated would possess advantages over cities otherwise situated, of so decided a character as most justly to excite dissatisfaction.

2nd. There is no limit prescribed to the premium in the purchase of the bills of exchange, thereby correcting none of the evils under which the community now labors, and operating most injuriously upon the Agricultural States, in which the unequalities in the rates of exchange are most severely felt. Nor are these the only consequences; a resumption of specie payments by the banks of those states would be liable to indefinite postponement—for, as the operation of the agencies of the interior would chiefly consist in selling bills of exchange, and the purchases could only be made in specie or the notes of banks paying in specie, the state banks would either have to continue with their doors closed, or exist at the mercy of this national monopoly of brokerage. Nor can it be passed over without remark, that whilst the District of Columbia is made the seat of the principal bank, its citizens are excluded from all participation in any benfit it might afford by a positive prohibition on the bank from all discounting within the District.

These are some of the objections which prominently exist against the details of the bill, others might be urged of much force—but it would be unprofitable to dwell upon them. Suffice it to add that this charter is designed to continue for twenty years without a competitor—that the defects to which I have alluded, being founded in the fundamental laws of the corporation, are irrevocable—and that if the objections be well founded it would be over hazardous to pass the bill into a law.

In conclusion I take leave most respectfully to say, that I have felt the most anxious solicitude to meet the wishes of Congress in the adoption of a Fiscal agent which, avoiding all constitutional objections, should harmonize conflicting opinions.—Actuated by this feeling, I have been ready to yield much, in spirit of conciliation, to the opinions of others. And it is with great pain that I now feel compelled to differ from Congress a second time in the same session. At the commencement of this session, inclined from choice to defer the legislative will, I submitted to Congress the propriety of adopting a Fiscal Agent which, without violating the Constitution, would seperate the public money from the Executive control, perform the operations of the Treasury without being burthensome to the people, or inconvenient, or expensive to the Government. It is deeply to be regretted, that this department of the Government cannot, upon constitutional grounds, concur with the legislative Department in this last measure proposed to attain these desirable objects. Owing to the brief space between the period of the death of my lamented predecessor and my own installation into office, I was, in fact, not left time to prepare and submit a definite recommendation of my own, in my regular message; and since, my mind has been wholly occupied in a most anxious attempt to conform my action to the legislative will. In this communication, I am confined by the Constitution to my objections, simply to this bill, but the period of the regular Session will soon arrive, when it will be my duty under another clause of the Constitution "to give to Congress information of the state of the Union, and recommend to their consideration such measures as I shall judge necessary and expedient." And I most respectfully submit, in a spirit of harmony, whether the present differences of opinion should be pressed further at this time, and whether the peculiarity of my situation, does not entitle me to a postponement of this subject, to a more auspicious period for deliberation

The two Houses of Congress have distinguished themselves at this extraordinary session, by the performance of an immense mass of labor, at a season very unfavorable, both to health and action; and have passed many laws, which I trust will prove highly beneficial to the interests of the country, and fully answer its just expectations. It has been my good fortune and pleasure, to concur with them in all measures, except this. And why should our difference on this alone be pushed to extremes? It is my anxious desire that it should not be. I too have been burthened with extraordinary labors of late, and I sincerely desire time for deep and deliberate reflection, on this the greatest difficulty of my administration—May we not now pause, until a more favorable time, when, with the most anxious hope that the Executive and Congress may cordially unite, some measure of finance may be deliberately adopted, promotive of the good of our common country.

I will take this occasion to declare that the conclusions to which I have brought myself, are those of a settled conviction, founded in my opinion on a just view of the Constitution. That in arriving at it, I have been actuated by no other motive or desire, than to uphold the institutions of the country, as they have come down to us from the hands of our God-like ancestors—and that I shall esteem my efforts to sustain them, even tho' I perish, more honorable than to win the applause of men, by a sacrifice of my duty and my conscience.

JOHN TYLER.
Washington, Sept. 9, 1841.

Duel in High Life.—A duel was fought in Maryland, on Thursday morning between two residents of this City, Mr. A. Belmont, agent of the Rothschilds, and Mr. Hayward, growing out of a personal difficulty at Delmonico's in relation to a lady some few days since, in which Belmont was knocked down by Haywood. A challenge was the consequence, and the parties met as before stated. Mr. Belmont received a ball in his thigh at the first fire, and is said to be dangerously wounded.—New-Yorker.

Return of the Mendians.—At a meeting of the Mendian Committee at New-York, August. 24th, 1841, was held to consult for the return of the MENDIANS to their own country: several communications from Sir T. Fowell Buxton, and others in England, and from the committee and teacher at Farmington, were considered. Also the lamented removal by death of Sir John Jeremie, the late excellent Governor of Sierra Leone, by which the committee are deprived of the information they expected to receive from him.

1. Resolved, That the necessary steps be taken to send the Africans, late of the Amistad, to Mendi, their native country, as soon as we can ascertain the situation of their country, and the feasibility of reaching it.

2. That a competent person be employed to go immediately to Sierra Leone, accompanied by two of the Mendians, and James Cove, a native of Mendi, who has acted as interpreter, to make enquiries there, and if necessary, to visit Mendi.

3. That if, on the return of this commission, the way appears to be open for the safe return of the Mendians to their country, they should be sent without delay.

4. That when these Mendians return to their native land, it is desirable that a mission should be formed in that country, and that an appeal be made to the CHRISTIAN public, for funds for that object.

5. That it would be contrary to the feelings and principles of a large majority of the donors to the Amistad fund, of the friends of the liberal Africans, to connect their return with any Missionary Society that solicits or receives donations from slave holders.—Emancipator.

The United States Silver.—The United States Gazette states that the first deposit of Silver from a Mine in the United States, was made at the mint in Philadelphia this week. It was from Davidson county N. C. and is believed that mines there, will prove very productive. The essay made at the Mint showed that 1,000 parts of the bullion contained 972 of silver, and 8 of gold!

Capture of Lett.—We take great pleasure in announcing that this desperado was captured this morning and is safely lodged in jail. The police learned that he was lurking about the city and last night constantable GATES got upon his track, and saw him go aboard the Webster, one of the steam-boats laid up. A plan of operations was immediately concerted, and this morning constables GATES, SMITH, BISS and BURTON carried into execution. They divided into two parties, met on the boat precisely at the minute fixed upon, and made a rush into the Ladies' cabin, where LETT, was in the company with a man named HINTON, the keeper of the boat, was quietly seated eating his breakfast. He ran into an adjoining state room, seized a Bowie knife, and threatened with death the first man who approached him. The constables told him resistance was useless they had come to take him dead or alive, and would. One seized his arm, as he was making a blow, the others sprang upon and disarmed him, the handcuffs were on in spite of all his resistance, he was forthwith lodged in jail, and the sheriffs' certificate of deposite taken.

Outrageous proceedings at Kaskaskia Ill.—The Western papers bring an account of an outrage committed recently at Kaskaskia, Ill., the county seat of Randolph. On the night of the 16th ult. the house of a Mr. Whitehead, a lawyer from St. Louis, was attacked by a disguised party, who assaulted the place with stones, which broke the windows, some struck Mrs. W., and came near killing an infant on the bed. They burst in, & were on the point of seizing Mr. W. when some neighbors came to his assistance, when some of the party fled. Some of the lawless band were recognized, and six bills of indictment found for burglary with the intent to kill. The party, however, were not intimidated, but went to court, and when it adjourned, as Mr. W. was coming out with Judge Breese they seized upon him, and under the eye of the Judge himself, they beat, and knocked down, kicked, and trampled upon their victim, until some citizens interfered and rescued him.

The cause of this outrage and violence from the fact that Mr. W. was attending Court, in his character of attorney, in a suit brought for a colored man, who claims to have a legal right to be free; and some persons of Kaskaskia apprehended that if the suit progressed, some of their colored people held as slaves since the expiration of the time and against legal right, might also sue for and recover their freedom and become free.

The Gunpowder at Syracuse.—The National Intelligencer, in commenting upon the extraordinary circumstance of such a quantity of powder exploding in a carpenter's shop, on the bank of the Erie Canal, takes some suggestions which are worthy of attention. The public were not aware of the powder being there. It seems to have been secretly stored, and that too, in direct violation of a village ordinance. It appears that there were 27 kegs in all. How came such a quantity of gunpowder to be secretly and illegally stored in such a place. We have had reports lately, of secret preparations on the Northern Frontier for another invasion of the British territory, and deposite of ammunition and means for these incendiary and predatory movements being made at different points, stealthily, & some by actual theft, as in the case of the States' cannon stolen at Auburn. Was this quantity of gun-powder concealed in a carpenter's shop, one of those deposites? If not, of course the explanation, will do away all suspicion made at Syracuse. In our opinion it is incumbent on the parties implicated to explain.

The Ancient Elm.—The New Haven Herald, states:

"That the ancient ELM, near the corner of Elm and Temple Streets of that City, was cut down on Tuesday last, in consequence of its having become so decayed near the roots, that the public safety required its removal. It was planted in 1686, before the new parsonage of the First Congregational Church. Under its ample shade, Jonathan Edwards, Whitefield, and others of the great departed, that held forth more than a century ago. Its circumference was upwards of twenty feet.

The Book Trade.—The semi-annual sale of Books to the Trade commenced in the city of New York on Monday the 30th ult. These sales are conducted under the direction of a Committee of Book-Sellers, and are made up of contributions from the principal manufacturers and importers in the United States. It is attended by Publishers and Book-Sellers from most of the Cities in the Union. The sale usually continues about a week, and the amount sold is enormously large. The catalogue of the present sale contains upwards of one hundred and sixty pages.

Cultivation of Wool in Australia.—In 1807 the whole quantity of Wool produced was 245 pounds—in 1839, 20,128,774, equal to one-fifth of the whole consumption of Britain, making a return to British subjects of nearly $100,000,000, which otherwise would have gone to foreigners.

POETRY.

"Abide with us."

Luke xxiv. 29.

BY MRS. E. F. ELLET.

"Abide with us!" The evening hour draws out;
And pleasant at the daylight's weary close
The traveler's repose!
And, as the morn's approach, the shades are gone,
Thy words, oh, blessed stranger! have dispelled
The midnight gloom in which our hearts were held,
Sad were our souls, and quenched Hope's latest ray;
But thou, to us, hast words of comfort given,
Oh Him who came from Heaven!

How burned our hearts within us on the way,
While thou the sacred Scriptures didst unfold,
And bad'st us trust the promise given of old!
"Abide with us!" Let us not lose thee yet!
Lest, unto us, the cloud of fear return,
When we are left to mourn
That Israel's Hope, his better Sun, is set!
Oh, teach us more of what we long to know,
That new-born joy may chide our faithless woe!
Thus in their sorrow, the disciples prayed,
And knew not He was walking by their side.
Who on the Cross had died!

But when he broke the consecrated bread,
Then saw they who had deigned to bless their board,
And, in the Stranger, hailed their risen Lord!
"Abide with us!" Thus the believer prays,
Compassed with doubt, and bitterness, and dread,
When as life from the dead,
The bow of Mercy breaks upon his gaze!
He trusts the Word, yet fears, lest from his heart,
He, whose discourse was Peace, too soon depart.
Open, thou trembling one! the portal wide,
And to the inmost palace of thy breast,
Take home the Heavenly Guest!

He, for the famished, shall a feast provide;
And thou shalt taste the Bread of Life, and see
The Lord of Angels come to sup with thee,
Beloved! who, for us with care hast sought—
Say, shall we hear Thy voice, and let thee wait
All night before the gate,
Wet with the dews, nor greet thee as we ought?
Oh, strike the fetters from the thrall of Pride,
And that we perish not, with us, oh, Lord! abide.

JOSEPHINE AT SAINT CLOUD.

BY JAMES BARBER.

From the French of Madame Saint Hilaire.

The Empress Josephine possessed in her heart all the treasure of maternal tenderness; this gentle affection which she carried to an extreme, naturally bestowed itself on the young. Groups of children were continually about her person, in whose conversation she loved to mingle, and whose innocent happiness she delighted to promote, by little marks of affection and kindness. Scarcely a week elapsed in which she did not make large purchases of splendid toys, for the purpose of distributing them with her own hands; and seldom did she fail to accompany her bounties with some prudent recommendation. How often have I seen the little salon bleu in the Chateau of Saint Cloud decked out like a shop, for the sale of opera trinkets. On new-year's day, especially, did this new bazaar present a splendid appearance. Upon entering the little halls of Josephine's baths, you almost fancied yourself entering one of the beautiful salons of Giroux; on all sides were displayed jewels, laces, porcelain, crystals and sweetmeats. I have seen there, rolls of sucre de pomme, which resembled the marshal's batons; and dolls as large as life—tambours and trumpets, were arrayed in great numbers, by the side of regiments of light cavalry, composed of lead.

On the evening of the first of January, 1805, the Empress, knowing that she could not, on the morrow, leave the Emperor, during any part of the day, on account of having to receive several distinguished guests, and officiate at the deputations which she expected to arrive at the chateau, gave orders to one of her ladies of honor, to inform those friends whom she had invited with their children to spend the new year's day with her, not to present themselves until the fourth of January at Saint Cloud, whither she was immediately going, for the purpose of preparing a fete for their reception.

The much wished-for day at length arrived. At twelve o'clock, noon, a stranger would have supposed that the Empress was a schoolmistress. All the trinkets, arms, and sweetmeats, had been conveyed from Paris on the preceding evening. At one o'clock her Majesty announced that she should herself proceed to the distribution, and the whole assembly entered the hall of prodigies. Both small and great, coveted with eager looks the numerous toys displayed in every direction. Josephine, with that grace of manner for which she was so remarkable, delivered to each of the children the present allotted to his or her share; after which, they all embraced her, addressing to her some little compliment, with the exception of those whose emotions of joy caused a temporary absence of memory.—To those who were destined to enter the military school, the Empress distributed her gifts with reference to their future career. Some received a case of mathematical instruments, others, a sabre; nearly every one of the boys wished for a pair of pistols, but the number was not sufficient to supply all. Immediately on their entrance, the younger portion of the children had taken possession of the wooden horses, and guns. Josephine gave to the girls, a comb, a watch, or a necklace.

The distribution completed, the joyful assembly made such an uproar, that Josephine was obliged to quit the field, and retire to her boudoir, to prevent being absolutely deafened; but scarcely had she departed, when a warm discussion arose.—The little boys having unanimously decided that they would play at war, wished forcibly to enlist the girls; these opposed en masse; and some among them protested loudly against this kind of violence. Then the young Achille N——, the son of an officer whom the Emperor esteemed and loved, who had elected himself chief of the troop, decided that those of the little girls who had shown themselves the most obstinate, should be shut up in the citadel, until they consented to obey him, by ranging themselves under his banner. Now the proposed citadel was an elegant sleeping apartment, situated on the side of the hall of Josephine's baths; it was lighted by a window formed of a single and unblemished plate of glass, and hung with green silk, bordered with silver bees.

A debate arose on the propriety of forming a council of war, in order to judge, and even shoot the little Emma who had placed herself at the head of the opposition, when, fortunately, one of the ladies of honor interposed her authority, threatening Master Achille with dry bread at the approaching feast, if he continued to prevent the little girls from amusing themselves as they pleased, whom, for greater precaution, she conducted into the citadel. Once separated there was no more dispute, but the clamor was redoubled. Josephine, on hearing the noise of their mirth, appeared in an extacy of delight; but Napoleon, who, in the meantime, had arrived at Saint Cloud, and whose cabinet was situated below the little salon bleu, ascended to his wife's room, and inquired of her, in a half gay, half serious tone, the cause of so much noise. "You should distribute your favors in my absence," said he; "I will go myself, and beg your little guests to be quiet; and if they continue to make the same disturbance—"

"Oh! no, Bonaparte; you will frighten them, poor darlings! What would you have? They are amusing themselves playing at war. Don't you make more noise at the same game? Pray do not go; I will send some one to quiet them."

"Ah! if they play at war, I shall not be sorry to see how they conduct the game." Saying these words, Napoleon goes on tiptoe to the door of the salon: he listened a moment and heard these words:

"Forward! Charge! Dead! I've killed him," and similar exclamations, mingled with sighs and tears, and the most immoderate laughter. The Emperor turns gently the handle of the door, and shows himself. "Ah! what have we here?" said he, in a serious tone—"there's crying here."

At these words the little troops raise their heads, and lower their arms; all stand motionless from surprize and fear. Napoleon cast his eyes over this band of petite diables, and could not forbear a smile at the grotesque fashion in which each had adorned himself. Here, one had made, with a sheet of paper, a three-cornered hat, to which, in the absence of a cockade, he had attached a gingerbread figure. There, one had placed a little nest on his shoulder, to imitate the dress of a hussar—another—the little Adolphe, had drawn on his face, with Indian ink, a pair of mustachoes, and had made of the tippet of a little girl, a sash, into which he had thrust a pearl paper-knife, as a substitute for a poniard; his sleeves were rolled up to his elbows. and in each hand he held a pistol. In this disguise Master Adolphe had so singular an appearance, that the Emperor seated himself, in order to take a leisurely survey of him. At length he motioned him towards him, and holding between his knees:

"What is your name, Mr. Braggadocio?" asked he.

"My name is Adolphe."

"I suppose it was you who shouted so loudly just now?"

"I have cause to. Achille will never permit me to be General; he will always be it himself.

"And who is this Master Achille?"

"There he is, below;" and Adolphe turning round, pointed with his finger to a little boy, rather taller than himself, who had made a cuirass of a music book, on which sparkled a star of sugar candy.

"Ah! ah!" continued Napoleon, I will speak to him—this Master Achille—who will not allow others to be General; that's not fair; each should be General in his turn." And tapping Adolphe on the ear, let him go, and called Achille, who gambolled towards him, and at a single bound, placed himself astride the knees of the Emperor.

"What is your father's name, Achille?"

"He is General N——."

At the mention of this name the Emperor's face brightened; he drew the boy still nearer to him, regarding him with benevolence mingled with tenderness.

N——, saidst thou? he is one of my best friends, and a brave man! and what do you intend to be yourself, one day?"

"I will be like papa; I should like to have handsome gold epaulettes, and a large sabre, that will cut well."

"Diable! and what will you do with it?"

"I will kill all the enemies of our country."

"Indeed! but I hope they will be all destroyed before you are old enough for these things."

"And then, I wish to have the cross of the Legion of Honor, attached to my neck by a red riband, as papa has it—how fine it is! but not like this;" and he tore from his breast the star of sugar candy, and commenced eating it.

"This is indeed, quite another thing," said Napoleon, "but you are in a hurry; how old are you at present?"

"I shall be ten years old on the day of mama's fete."

"Well, and in twenty years from—"

"But I can not wait so long; papa has said that I should be an officer at eighteen."

"Your father judges of you by himself; however, that depends upon yourself, and, in the meantime, hold!"—and the Emperor drew from his pocket a fourteen franc piece, which he gave him, adding, "when you shall have broken your sabre, here is something, that will buy another;" then bidding him rejoin his little comrades, enjoining it upon them not to make too much noise. "Adieu, my children," said he, leaving them, "amuse yourselves, but do not hurt one another."

The advice of the Emperor was not followed to the letter, for the little Adolphe. jealous, no doubt, that the Emperor should have given Achille money, while he received but a tap on the cheek, sought a quarrel, under pretence of not being willing that the most distinguished should be at the head. The dispute became rather warm, and would, perhaps, have terminated unpleasantly, had not the announcement been made at that moment, that the feast awaited them. All discordant feelings were immediately forgotten in the prospect of the good things which were prepared for them.

The little troop arranged themselves in two ranks, laying aside all consideration of size or grade, and marching rapidly towards the citadel in question, repeating in chorus, rran, rran, plan, plan, rran, rran. with an accompaniment obligato of drums and trumpets, the noise of which was perfectly deafening.

* * * * * *

It was in the commencement of the year 1814, nine years after the occurrences above mentioned, that Europe, which had so lately marched with us, obedient to the orders of Napoleon, was in league against us. As usual, the grand army performed prodigies of valor; and after as many victories as combats, and more successful each day, the Emperor, on the sixth of March, established himself at Craonne; and so to speak, encamped in the very midst of the bivouacs of the Russian army. There, during the night, he reconnoitered, in person, the different positions of the enemy; and the following morning, at daybreak, the whole army was arranged in order of battle. At eight o'clock the cries of the soldiers announced the presence of the Emperor, and the action commenced. The success of the day depended on the definite possession of a rampart which had been taken and lost, aternately.

It is four o'clock—the day is declining, and nothing is yet decided. Napoleon cast a look of indecision upon his old guard which is stationed behind him. He had but to give the order, and all would be completed in an instant—perhaps he is about to pronounce the word, when an aid-de-camp arrives at full speed, crying, "The Emperor! the Emperor! where is the Emperor?"

Napoleon advanced, covered with mud, having that morning fallen into a fosse.

"What news do you bring," said he.

"Sire," replied the aid-de-camp, dismounting, "we have taken the rampart."

"Enfin!" cried the Emperor, "bring me my horse!" And while his mameluke held the stirrup, he continued to address the officer, who, pale and bleeding, seemed to support himself with difficulty.

"Who sends you, the Marshal, or the General?"

"Sir, the General was killed upon the rampart by a Russian grenadier; and I—"

He could say no more—his eyes closed—he staggered and fell.

"Attend to this officer," said Napoleon; "he is Captain! one moment, gentlemen; wait!"

And detaching the cross of honor from his neck, he put it on that of the wounded officer, who seized the hand of the Emperor, pressed it to his lips, and said in a faint voice, "Ah! sire! I die happy. I said well to your majesty, nine years since, at Saint Cloud, that I should one day merit the cross." Then striving to collect his strength, he attempted to rise; cried "Vive l'Empereur!" and expired. During this time, Napoleon had observed him attentively, as if seeking to recall something to his recollection; the last words of the young aid-de-camp had startled him.

"Yes, yes, I recollect," said he, at length, in a voice quite choked with emotion, "pauvre enfant!" and turning his head to brush off a tear, he put foot into the stirrups, and mounted his horse. Then passing a troop of his own guard, he exclaimed, "Out of the saddle, grenadiers! the battle is won!" and he continued his route, followed by his etat-major, to the prolonged cries of Vive l'Empereur.

The following morning, Achille was buried with the honors of those who die for their country.

Two days afterwards, and while Napoleon was making arrangements to take Rheims from the allies, who occupied that city, he perceived General N——, and sent for him.

"General," said he, your son is dead on the field of honor."

"Sire, I know it."

"He has left a sister, has he not?"

"Yes, sire, she had but him and myself—"

"And me!" replied quickly, Napoleon; "you forget me, General. I have signed her admission to my Imperial Institution at Ecouen. I take upon myself to provide her trousseau and marriage portion. I have already decorated her brother! General, I have, this morning, made you grand cordon de la Legion d'Honneur; come, embrace your Emperor." And Napoleon extended to him his arms, into which the General rushed, giving free course to his tears.

I see from time to time the daughter of General N——, who entered at Ecouen, and passed from thence to the Maison royale de Saint Dennis.

Napoleon had not time to provide her marriage portion, as he had promised, having been sent to languish in exile on the rock of Saint Helena.

The remembrance of her brother is ever present to her heart, and it is but a few days since that she pointed out to me, in a picture frame, placed over the fire-place, a crown of laurel, the leaves of which were yellow and dried, and which was the first that Achille had received from the academy. A child's sabre the same that was given him by Josephine at Saint Cloud, and the cross of the Legion of Honor, which the Emperor had detached from his own breast at Craonne, to lay upon the then palpitating heart of her brother.

From the New York Tribune.

ATMOSPHERIC RAILWAY.

We have often seen allusions in the English papers to a new invention whereby cars were to be propelled on railways by atmospheric pressure; but we have never until now seen any thing like an explanation of the mode in which this power is to be applied. A late London paper contains an account of some experiments made with an engine constructed upon this plan, in the presence of many distinguished and scientific persons, from which we make the following statement of its construction and mode of operation. The plan is very simple: midway between the rails of an ordinary railway, lies secure to the sleepers a continuous pipe of suitable diameter; let a piston attached to a carriage for passengers run in this pipe, and a stationary steam engine exhausts the pipe before it.—It is clear that if the parts of the machinery are sufficiently perfect, the atmospheric pressure on the back of the piston will move the carriage and its load with a velocity resulting from the proportion between that pressure and the resistance to be overcome. So far the theory is an indisputable one of naked science; the only question is whether machinery can be constructed sufficiently perfect to produce with certainty the theoretical effect.

The railway on which the experiment was made was slightly inclined, the rails old and laid extremely uneven, the pipe was a cylinder of nine inches, and the air pump 35 1-2 inches in diameter, worked by a steam of 16 horse power. Throughout the entire length of the pipe there is of necessity a slit in its crown to afford the needful connection between the piston and the carriage: this is opened as each train passes, and closes immediately behind it. Of course some air thus obtains admission, but it was found upon experiment that this leakage of the pipe is more than balanced by the action of the air-pump: the latter exhausted half a mile of 18 inches of mercury in one minute and a quarter, while the pipe refilled from leakage in eight minutes. Four experiments were made, in each of which the carriage went down the plain by its gravity, and was propelled up by the atmospheric pressure. The result, by close and accurate measurement, was that on the first trial, the carriage filled with persons, ran 19,5 miles per hour, on the second 20,6, on the third 25,7, and on the fourth 23.5. These experiments would seem fully to establish the fact that this power may be successfully used for the propulsion of railway carriages. Its advantages as set forth by its inventors, Messrs. Clegg and Samuda, are that the weight of locomotives, often great, is wholly saved, lighter and less costly rails may be used, no collision of trains can occur, and a great saving may be effected by the substitution of stationary for locomotive engines. The new invention has not yet received the attention and scrutiny necessary to decide positively upon its full importance.

THADDEUS OF WARSAW.

The large and magnificent palace of Vallanow, which stands on the northern banks of the Vistula, was the favorite residence of John Sobieski, king of Poland. That monarch, after having delivered his country from innumerable enemies, rescued Vienna, and subdued the Turks, used to retire to his palace at certain seasons, and dispense those effects of his luminous and benevolent mind, which rendered his name great and his people happy.

When Charles XII. of Sweden visited the tomb of Sobieski, at Moscow, he exclaimed, "What a pity so great a man should ever die!" Ninety years after his death, the spirit of this great man appeared to revive in the person of his descendant, Constantine Count Sobieski, who in a comparatively private station as palatine of Masovia, and the friend, rather than the lord of his vassals, evinced by his actions, that he was the inheritor of his forefather's virtue, as well as of his blood.

He was the first Polish nobleman who granted freedom to his peasants. He threw down their mud hovels, and built comfortable villages. He furnished them with seed, cattle, and implements of husbandry; then calling them altogether, he laid before them the deed of their enfranchisement. Before he signed it, he expressed his fears to some of their old men, of the probability that they might abuse this new liberty, and become licentious.

"No," returned a gray-headed peasant, "when we held a firm grasp of no other property than the staffs which we have in our hands, we were destitute of all motives for a consistent conduct, and not having any thing to lose, acted on all occasions in an intemperate manner; but now that our houses and lands, and our cattle, are absolutely our own, the fear of forfeiting them, will be a constant restraint upon our actions."

The good sense and truth of this answer was manifested in the event. On their emancipation, they became so cheerful in their circumstances, and so correct in their behavior, that the example of the Palatine was shortly followed by Zamoisk, the great chancellor, prince Stanislaus, the king's nephew; and several of the principal nobility.

There is no art, however trivial, that does not require some application at first.

"Whoso loveth instruction, loveth knowledge; but he that hateth reproof, is brutish."

MONTHLY SERMONS,

BY

A VILLAGE PASTOR.

(SEPTEMBER, 1841.)

NO IX.—ATTACHMENT TO THE STATED MEANS OF GRACE.

St. Luke ii. 41, 42.—Now his parents went to Jerusalem every year at the feast of the passover. And when he was twelve years old, they went up to Jerusalem, after the custom of the feast.

Three times each year all the males among God's chosen people, were required to appear before him in the holy city.—These seasons of great convocation, were three most solemn and significant feasts; viz:—the Passover, the Pentecost, and the feast of Tabernacles.

Among the three the most prominent was the Passover. It was celebrated in the month Abid, called also Nisan, answering to a part of our March. It was the seventh month of the civil year of the Jews, and the first month in their ecclesiastical year.

The Passover was designed as a memento of that memorable night, when the pride and strength of Egypt breathed death; while the slumbers of those house-holders on whose door-posts the blood of the lamb was sprinkled, were safe, and calm, and sweet. It likewise served to commemorate the whole transaction of Israel's deliverance, including the preparatory events, and the triumphant sequel. It was also typical of a perpetual christian ordinance, the Lord's Supper.

The Passover was instituted twenty-five centuries after the creation of the world. Our text presents us the holy family attending upon that ordinance eighteen centuries since, fifteen centuries after it was instituted.

The parents of Jesus were poor; (Lev. xii. 6—8 compared with Luke ii. 24,) they subsisted by daily labor. Their residence was at Nazareth, about seventy miles north of Jerusalem. But distance, poverty, and pressing business, could not prevent them from annual and punctual attendance at the Passover. To go to Jerusalem and return to Nazareth, was a journey of one hundred and forty miles. To accomplish this, according to eastern modes of traveling, must have ordinarily occupied about five days; seven days were spent at the Passover.—Thus twelve days yearly were devoted to this ordinance, and twelve years' attendance would require one hundred and forty-four days, and demand journeying by land to the amount of one thousand six hundred and eighty miles!

Though we are not to conclude that Mary attended the other two yearly feasts as punctually as she did the Passover, yet we are to suppose that her husband, who was a just man and feared God, was equally scrupulous in his attendance upon them; for it is expressly recorded in Exo. xxiii. 17, and repeated in other places—"Three times each year shall all thy males appear before the Lord God."

By these persevering and self-denying efforts to obey the requirements of the Mosaic law, respecting the observance of religious institutions, that sincere and ardent attachment to them was most beautifully and impressively manifested.

The theme of our present discourse is this, viz:—

WE SHOULD BE ARDENTLY ATTACHED TO THE STATED MEANS OF GRACE.

1. Because God himself hath instituted them.

If we should love the Lord our God with all our heart, with all our soul, and with all our strength, then these direct fruits of his benevolence may claim our strong affection. We should love the animal and vegetable creation, because that in the beasts, and birds, and trees, and plants, we see so strikingly portrayed the creative power, the wisdom, and the benevolence of God.

How then should we love those schemes, which the infinite benevolence of Jehovah hath devised for assimilating fallen man, to the moral excellence of his own supremely holy character! Those who loved Dorcas stood weeping over the coats and garments which her hands had wrought.—In gazing upon the single mark of a needle, tears of affection may copiously flow from the eyes of a bereaved daughter, and why: Because that mark was placed there by the hand of a departed mother; it is her work.

It is right to love the works of God because they are His works, and as such reveal to us his glorious attributes. As amid their endless variety, we search to select one on which to bestow the strongest affection, we pass by oceans, mountains, and planets; we place, as of comparative insignificance, suns, moons, and stars, and systems on systems of worlds, and awed by the divine glory, we fix our trembling gaze on Calvary's scene, and we read that "God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life."

This is that work of God demanding our most ardent love. This is that in which center all the means of grace which God hath ever employed, or ever will employ for our guilty race.

Of them all this is a summary expression; and consequently the love which we bear to this as God's own work, will be proportionably extended to all parts of the system of grace. All the means embraced by the system, are from the hand of our Creator, our King, our Father, and our Redeemer; and from us they should receive the appropriate attachment of creatures, subjects, children, and redeemed souls.

2. God hath required us to love them.

From the consistency of his character we should expect that he would do this; for we should be amazed to find that he had not directed us to devotedly regard objects so worthy of our affections.

Lev. xviii. 4, 5. Ye shall do my judgments and keep mine ordinances to walk in them: I am the Lord your God. Ye shall therefore keep my statutes, and my judgments, which if a man do he shall live in them: I am the Lord.

Ps. cxix. 4. Thou hast commanded us to keep thy precepts diligently.

Heb. x. 25. Not forsaking the assembling of yourselves together.

3. They are so happily adapted to the moral condition of mankind.

The human family are blind: they grope in darkness. The means of grace enlighten, &c.

Mankind are depraved beings: the means of grace are adapted to raise such beings from the depth of sin, to inconceivable attainments in holiness. He that hath this hope in him, purifieth himself even as he is pure. Sanctify them through thy truth, thy word is truth. Who is not strongly impressed by observing the adaptation of air, water, light, and food, to the wants of our physical nature? Equally conspicuous and impressive is the adaptation of the means of grace to the moral necessities of man.

4. They have accomplished great good in the world.

They have already brought back revolted millions. In some parts of this rebellious world, they have caused the wilderness to blossom like the rose, and the desert to shout for joy. Under their benign, subduing, and transforming influence, many a Saul of Tarsus has been brought to penitently inquire—Lord what wilt thou have me to do? The eyes of the morally blind have been opened; the ears of the morally deaf have been unstopped; hearts of stone have been made to relent: and souls supremely selfish have been made benevolent. Such souls have magnified the name of the Lord Jesus, they have "confessed, and showed their deeds;" they have willingly abandoned their "curious arts," and through the price of their pernicious books when counted, hath been found to be ten thousand times "fifty thousand pieces of silver," yet have they been brought together and burned, or reprobated by all men. "So mightily" have the means of grace "prevailed." They have been the support of untold numbers of afflicted souls amid the vicissitudes of this trying world. David says—"Thy statutes have been my songs in the house of my pilgrimage." All the valuable peace which earth ever enjoys, arises directly, or indirectly, from the influence of divine institutions. Their voice to the foaming billows, is—"Peace, be still." They have guided countless millions from earth to heaven. While I am now speaking, the consolations which they have furnished, mingle among death-bed scenes, and strengthen departing saints to triumphantly exclaim, "O Death, where is thy sting, O Grave, where is thy victory!"

5. The stated means of grace have ever been ardently loved by the pious.

When God gave a son, Enos, to pious Seth, 'men begun to call upon the name of the Lord.' Some religious institutions were then known. As soon as Noah could set his feet upon dry ground, he erected an altar to the praise of God. Trace the steps of Abraham "unto the plain," or "unto a mountain," and there we find an altar for JEHOVAH. Jacob's heart was filled with joy, as himself and his household went up to Bethel.

Eli, the priest and judge, amid all his imperfections respecting family government, was strongly attached to God's ordinances. For forty years he solemnly devoted himself to their public administration. When informed that his two sons, Hephni and Phineas, were dead, he sat erect upon his seat: but when it was announced to him, that the Ark of God was in the hands of the Philistines, he fell backward, and died.

A like attachment was manifested by Samuel, a child, who ministered before the Lord, girded with a linen ephod. The acts of his parents bear the same testimony: previous to his birth they went up out of their "city yearly to worship, and to offer sacrifices unto the Lord of hosts in Sheloh." Their attendance at Sheloh was no less punctual after they had received the precious gift in answer to Hannah's prayers. "Moreover, his mother made him a little coat, and brought it to him from year to year, when she came up with her husband to offer the yearly sacrifice."

In the writings of David, love to God's house, and all that appertained to his worship, is so frequently expressed, that passages of this class, form one of the most prominent characteristics of his inspired composition. Listen to some holy, poetic strains of the sweet Psalmist of Israel: My voice shalt thou hear in the morning: O Lord in the morning will I direct my prayer unto thee, and will look up. Evening, morning, and at noon, will I pray, and cry aloud, and he shall hear my voice.—How amiable are thy tabernacles, O Lord of hosts! My soul longeth, yea even fainteth for the courts of the Lord: my heart and my flesh cryeth out for the living God. Blessed are they that dwell in thy house, they will be still praising thee. The assembling of God's people attending upon the means of grace, was David's chosen company in time of affliction, and amid them he would mingle to express his joyful thanksgivings. What shall I render unto the Lord for all his benefits towards me? I will take the cup of salvation, and call upon the name of the Lord. I will pay my vows unto the Lord now in the presence of all his people. Though he wore the kingly crown he did not regard his chief honors as consisting in regal office.

What employment did he deem most honorable? Let his own words answer:—"For a day in thy courts is better than a thousand—I had rather be a door-keeper in the house of my God, than to dwell in the tents of wickedness." To him the lowest service pertaining to God's sanctuary, was far more desirable than the highest honors which this world could bestow.

Influenced by growing affection for the ordinances of God, he most anxiously desired to build a magnificent temple for the Lord. "He sware unto the Lord, and vowed unto the mighty God of Jacob:—Surely I will not come into the tabernacle of my house, nor go up unto my bed: I will not give sleep to mine eyes, or slumber to mine eye-lids, until I find out a place for the Lord, an habitation for the mighty God of Jacob."

He was not permitted to see his desire accomplished, which would have been sweet unto his soul, but so strong and sincere had been his purpose, that at the close of life, he could thus appeal unto the people—Hear me, my brethren, and my people—I had in mine heart to build a house of rest for the ark of the covenant of the Lord: and for the footstool of our God, and had made ready the building. Now, I have prepared with all my might for the house of my God, the gold—the silver, the brass, the iron, and the wood: onyx-stones, and stones to be set, glistening stones, and of divers colors, and all manner of precious stones, and marble stones in abundance.—One of the closing transactions of his public life, was to charge his son Solomon concerning the great work, the building of a palace, not for man, but for the Lord God. He gave him specific instructions concerning the form of the holy edifice: he gave him the pattern of all that he had by the Spirit. Being fully assured that the work would be accomplished in due time, though his resting place would soon be the sepulchre—"David the king rejoiced with joy." Solomon's dedicatory prayer evinces, that the mantle of his sanctuary-loving father had fallen upon him. But time would fail us to tell of Ezra, Nehemiah, Isaiah, Daniel, Malachi, Zacharias, and Elizabeth, Simeon, Anna, youthful Timothy, and innumerable saints in later times, whose attachment has been unspeakably ardent to those means of grace which God in infinite mercy condescends to employ for the salvation of apostate man.

I will present one more reason why we should be ardently attached to the stated means of grace—it is this,—

6. They will continue unto the end of time.

They will be perpetuated amid all the changes in the natural, civil, and moral world. They will abide, until the angel placing one foot on the sea, and the other on the land, shall proclaim, "Time shall be no longer."

REFLECTIONS.

1. Ardent attachment to the stated means of grace, will secure punctual attendance upon them. Mark the parents of Samuel—of Jesus. See also Paul's example, (Acts xx.) For Paul had determined to sail by Ephesus, because he would not spend the time in Asia, for he hasted if it were possible for him to be at Jerusalem the day of Pentecost. At Miletus, forty miles from Ephesus, he sent for the elders of the church. See how his heart was fixed on accomplishing his object. He pursued a different course from many modern professors of religion. Too many conclude to attend religious meetings if they find it perfectly convenient, and seem to think their non-attendance fully excused by some pressure of business, which, it is probable, in nine cases out of ten might have been prevented by some previous arrangement, not costing them half the effort and self-denial which it cost Paul to be at Pentecost. How painful to hear some remark, that they should have been at the church meeting had they thought of it in season, but when it came to mind that it was the day of the meeting, it was too late to attend. Paul's example should cause such persons to blush.

2. According to their ability those who are attached to the stated means of grace, will cheerfully give their substance for the support of religious institutions. "Moreover, because I have set my affection to the house of my God, (says David,) I have of mine own proper good, of gold and silver, which I have given to the house of my God over and above all that I have prepared for the holy house." He then enumerates the amount which he contributed.

3. If we do not grow in grace under the ordinary use of the stated means of grace, we have reason to conclude that we have no piety.

Those who cannot "enjoy religion," except in seasons of great excitement, and in connection with some unusal efforts, have much reason to fear that they are nought but way-side hearers. If they were God's own children, the ordinary use of God's established means of grace, would nourish them, and cause them to bring forth fruit, "some thirty, some sixty, some an hundred fold."

4. Our subject teaches us how we may exert a religious influence upon our posterity. By precept and example teach them. If Elkinah and Hannah had not been punctual in their attendance at Shiloh, there might have been no prophet Samuel. If David had not set his heart to build a house for the Lord, Solomon would never have built it. Our blessed Savior himself, had a human body, and a human soul, and like other children he increased in wisdom and in stature, and like other children he felt the influence of parental example.—Had not that example been precisely such as it was, who can say that at twelve years of ago, he would have astonished the doctors of law by his questions and his answers?

5. Our subject furnishes us with a test of the genuineness of a religious awakening.

A genuine revival will cause a great increase of attachment to the stated means of grace: will gather many around them. This was the effect of a revival in the third year of the reign of Jehoshaphat, king of Judah. He sent out priests and levites to give the people religious instruction. The instructors were earnest in their work, and the people crowded to hear. It was not the disclosure of strange and novel things, nor an eccentric mode of stating truth already known, that so arrested public attention. "And they taught in Judea, and had the book of the law of God with them, and went about throughout all the cities of Judah, and taught the people." (2 Chron. xviii. 9.)

This characteristic was manifest in the days of Nehemiah. "And all the people gathered themselves together as one man into the street that was before the water gate; and they spake unto Ezra the scribe to bring the book of the law of Moses, which the Lord had commanded to Israel. And he brought the law before the congregation both of men and women, and all that could hear with understanding. And he read therein from the morning until noonday, before the men and the women, and those that could understand, (children of proper age to be benefitted) and the ears of all the people were attentive unto the book of the law. So they read in the book of the law of God distinctly, and gave the sense, and caused them to understand the reading." Neh. viii. 1—8.

Those protracted meetings that influence the people to more highly appreciate God's established means of grace, as ordinarily enjoyed, are great blessings to the community. When of this character they strengthen the reciprocal attachment of pastor and people—secure a more general, more punctual, and a serious attendance upon the worship of God in his sanctuary on the Sabbath—their healthful influence is felt by the Sabbath School—the Bible Class—the Conference Meeting, and the benevolent efforts of the day: the family altar and the closet also share in the rich blessing.

Such meetings are, on the whole, far more efficient in promoting the interests of Zion, than those, which, though perhaps numbering many more as supposed converts, are characterized by a sort of religious excitement which throws the people into that state of mind which unfits them to appreciate God's established means of grace as ordinarily enjoyed, and disposes them to ardently crave something new, something wonderful!

When in this state of mind, they are wholly unprepared to listen to a minister of ordinary gifts, while he distinctly reads the word of God, and gives the sense, and attempts to cause his hearers to understand the reading. They desire to be addressed with appeals of the most finished, popular eloquence, or they want to be roused by the surpassingly terrific, or to be powerfully moved by the overpowering pathetic.

That religious awakening, whether connected with a protracted meeting or not, is the most lovely, which causes the greatest increase of attachment to the Bible, the Sabbath, and the ordinary privileges of the sanctuary, an awakening, in which, not only sinners are turned from Satan to the service of God—but saints are instructed, and assisted to be "steadfast, unmoveable, and always abounding in the work of the Lord," and are made more grateful than ever for every crumb which they receive from their Master's table.

6. Those who are favored with the stated means of grace, and remain impenitent, are fast increasing in guilt, condemnation, and hardness of heart.

Impenitent sinner! God is using the means of grace with you. You pervert them while you reject Christ.

Sinners! Beware! or you may meet death as the abusers of God's stated means of grace. If you thus die, it will be more tolerable for Sodom and Gomorroh in the day of Judgment, than for you.

Every sermon which you have heard will rise up in the Judgment against you. Every minister to whose entreaties you you have turned a deaf ear, will witness against you. No longer abuse the stated means of grace by rejecting Christ, but accept of that Savior, who, by the administration of the stated means of grace, has been so often offered to you, and is now once more offered, and you shall have everlasting life. Amen.

REMARKABLE CONVERSION OF A JEW.

A work has lately been published in London, by Alfred Morris Myers, a Jew by birth, education, and until recently, by faith. He gives an extended account of his conversion, which we have read in a Foreign Magazine, with great interest. Mr. Myers, tells us, that, he is a native of Prussia, who, being intended for a rabbi, was in his youth initiated into the study of the Talmud. Suspicions of its divine authority however, intruded themselves into his mind at an early age, and having been induced on one occasion to enter a room where two missionaries from the London Society for promoting the conversion of the Jews were conversing and distributing tracts, the displeasure of his connexions led him to desire to visit England, and he landed in the metropolis in June, 1830. Removing to Liverpool, where he had a brother, his attention was attracted by a building in front of which was an inscription in Hebrew, and which he found on inquiry was a Christian place of worship in which a converted Jew was accustomed to preach. After much mental conflict he determined to enter it and heard a sermon in English which he could not understand, preceded by the text read in Hebrew, "The sceptre shall not depart from Judah, nor a lawgiver from his feet, until Shiloh come, and to him the gathering of the people shall be." He knew from the Talmud that Shiloh signified the Messiah, but the sentiment perplexed him. He could not believe that there was such a passage; but wondered what business these Gawyim (Gentiles) had with the Scriptures at all, having supposed that if a Jew embraced Christianity he renounced the Bible. He trembled when he considered among what people he was sitting, and full of anxiety and agitation, he left the place.

"I felt as one escaped from some imminent danger when I found myself again in the open air; I durst not look up, feeling myself much condemned for having been in that place. As soon as I reached my lodging I looked into my Hebrew Bible, referring to the chapter and verse, which I had not forgotten; and to my astonishment, I found the same words of the prophecy; but so strong was I opposed to it, that I got another Hebrew Bible to see whether it actually was so. "How can that be?" I said; "then why has the Messiah not come if he was to come, when there was a sceptre in Judah, for now there has not been a sceptre more than eighteen centuries?" I then laid my hand upon my forehead, and closed my eyes, to stop, as it were, the stream of my wandering mind, which almost deprived me of all thought.

"What! is it possible?" I said, after a moment's pause, "can I allow such a thought to enter my mind? the Messiah come already? that cannot be; I am a miserable sinner! I have allowed myself to be taken in the snare of the Gawyim, for if it were so, would not the learned Rabbi's abroad, who study day and night the Talmud, have found it out before this? And do they not daily pray for the Messiah to come.'

My eyes then glanced over the text once more; I read it over again slowly, until all before me seemed illegible; the room appeared to go round, and I should have fallen to the ground had I not taken hold of an old armed chair which stood close by me. I dropped into it, and wept bitterly

I indulged in this for sometime, until I felt a little relief; the first thing I beheld when I opened my eyes, was the Bible, which I closed hastily, as once I did the Talmud, and hastened out of the room.

Were I to attempt a description of what passed in my mind during the following few days, I should not only fall far short of it, but it would also swell this volume to a far greater size than I intended it to be; suffice it to say then, that the sufferings of my mind was great,—that I had no rest until I came to the determination to go to the converted Jew to ask him what he meant by quoting that part of Jacob's prophecy.

Having inquired for his residence, I was told that I could see him at a house in Nelson street, Park Lane, where a lady, the patroness of his church, resided; to which house I went one afternoon with a young Jew with whom I became then providentially acquainted, and who was then an enquirer into the Christian Faith, but before this kept it a secret from me. I was shown into the room, in which I found the converted Jew, the lady and a gentleman. I felt at a loss at first how to introduce my subject, but meeting with a very kind reception, I took courage, and asked the converted Jew to tell me what explanation he gave to the above referred text, and why Jacob says that the sceptre shall not depart from Judah until Shilo come—whereas the Messiah had not come yet? "The Messiah hath come," he answered, "and the prohesy is fulfilled, and JESUS OF NAZARETH WAS THAT MESSIAH." At the name of 'JESUS' I rose up from my chair, saying that I did not come here to hear anything of him, and made a motion to go; but he said, that if it was my wish, nothing should be said about Jesus, and he then asked me if he might show me some part of my own Scriptures, which I granted; on which he showed me the 53rd chapter of the prophecy of Isaiah. I told him what the Talmud says on that chapter; but he said that the Talmud was nothing more than the invention of man. I endeavored to conceal the emotion which the last sentence had raised in me; he then asked me whether I had ever read the New Testament? I told him I never heard of such a book, and that I never read any books of the Gawyim. He then gave me some information with respect to the nature of the book which he was alluding to, and asked me whether he might read a part of it to me, to which I assented; he then read to me the first chapter of the gospel of St. Matthew.

I felt much struck with the genealogy there given of Jesus; I tried all I could to conceal from him what was going on in my mind, and as soon as he finished the chapter, I rose from my chair, requesting him to lend me the book, which he did without hesitation, telling me to compare it with our Bible.

As soon as I went into the street I opened the book again, reading it as I went along, and before I had reached my lodging, I had already gone through the first five chapters of the gospel of St. Matthew.—When I arrived at home I ran up stairs into my bedroom, the door of which I locked after me, for fear of being interrupted and surprised again by my brethren

Again I read over the beginning of St. Matthew; my curiosity increased as I proceeded; every page opened to me a new world: "Is that the religion of Christians?" I said. My mind could not dwell on one subject long; it wandered from one thing to another in rapid succession. Presently I began to compare the Bible with this new book, and I found that there was a striking correspondence between them. It may more easily be imagined than described what were my feelings all this time, and the following days, as I proceeded in the New Testament, comparing it with the Old "Then why do not the Rabbi's read this book? or why did they not tell me about it? or are they kept in the dark about it as well as myself? Then came to my memory what I had just heard about the Talmud. "What," I said, "the Talmud not true?" and my former doubts concerning it rushed upon my mind like so many flashes of lightning. "Hear, O Israel!" I exclaimed, and wrung my hands in great agony; "then have I lived all this time and been under a delusion? have I prayed every day for the coming of the Messiah, and not known that he has come already? that he lived, and died, that I might live? and could my forefathers reject HIM who came TO THEM? Could they treat him so cruelly who came with such doctrines as these? and have I blasphemed the Holy name of Him whom I now find to be Jacob's Star, Moses's Prophet, David's Lord, Isaiah's Stem of Jesse, his Immanual, his Prince, his Savior—Zachariah's King, and Malachi's Messenger of the Covenant.—Did Jehovah suffer me to live whilst I have hated him whom he calls his Son?" O! DISTRACTING THOUGHT!—pp. 77—82.

Yet he did not at that time yield his heart to the Savior. He had as he expresses it, "come up close to what Isaiah calls the stone of stumbling and a rock of offence," but there remained many things to be cleared up before he could allow that Christianity was the religion of God.

The apparently disinterested account given by the four Evangelists of Jesus of Nazareth pleased me very much; there is hardly anything in their account by which we could form an opinion as to whether they believed in the new covenant or not. But Satan worked his part in the meantime with me; many snares were laid for me, some of which proved very dangerous to me.

At times, when meeting with a passage in Scripture which I could not understand, my mind would be worked up to such a degree that I would throw the Bible from me, thinking never to look at again; I had not found out the way yet to seek wisdom; I sought for it in my own strength, and thus it proved a stumbling block; add to this, the persecution which then opened itself upon me from the side of my brethren, who as soon as it was known that I had been to that Church, set their faces against me, and treated me very unkindly. "Away with such a fellow," was their cry, "for it is not fit that he should live!"

Add to this, the sorrow I experienced from the accounts of my friends, whose grief knew no bounds when they heard that I had become a Christian, all these things worked powerfully upon my mind; and I can truly say, that if it had not been the Lord who then held me up, and soon after caused JESUS to be precious to my soul, I should have fallen a prey to the enemy; it is verily through him alone that I can say, "I am what I am."

"I was then in a strait between Judaism and Christianity; the one I could not adhere to on account of its absurdities and contradictions to the word of God, and the other I COULD not embrace; and if any one asks why? I answer, "Because the love of God did not dwell in my heart—I loved not Jesus."

Many were the nights I sat up with the Bible and Testament before me, to see whether all was not a delusion, until I was worn out with fatigue, from want of sleep and trouble in my mind. At such a period I would then think of my unhappy situation; in a strange country—cast off from all that were dear to me by the ties of nature; despitefully used by my brethren here, without a friend to comfort me; and then I would think of my father, my poor Father, of his grief—perhaps brought to a bed of sickness—perhaps near to the grave, lamenting over his hard hearted son—and I, I was the cause of all this; and then I wept in the bitterness of my heart until the day broke in upon me, when only fresh trials awaited me, for those that hated me without a cause were many; every day another trial awaited me, so that my health began to decline very rapidly."

After six months had elapsed, which he suffered much in body as well as in mind he was relieved from anxiety and entered into the joy of faith.

One evening after having read some of the Psalms of David, among others the LXIX, I left my room for the purpose of taking a walk, which, from the bitter enmity showed to me by my brethren, I could scarcely do in the day time. Providence guided my footsteps into Pitt Street, where I saw a building lighted up, which had the appearance of a place of worship, into which I went; there was a body of people kneeling down, and one prayed aloud; his prayer affected me greatly. After having listened for some time, I dropped down on my knees as if mechanically; Every word the man spoke I felt as if he was pleading my cause; it was the very thing I stood in need of, and blessed be God I prayed too—I prayed for the first time in my life—the first that was worth calling a prayer, for it was in the name of Jesus. I felt as if the heavens were open, and that this was none other but the house of God, and the very gates of heaven; it appeared to me as if now was the accepted time now the day of salvation.

The words of the psalm that I had read before I came out were forcibly brought to my memory, and I cried out, "Save me, O God, for the waters are come into my soul. I sink in deep mire where there is no standing; I am come into deep waters where the floods overflow me. O God, thou knowest my foolishness, and my sins are not hid from thee. These words just seemed to express what I felt: I appeared to myself as one standing on the brink of a precipice, a deep gulph before me, and some savage animal rushing up behind me, I felt my danger, and my own weakness, to save myself from the certain ruin before me, unless some one came from above and rescued me; and "Save me, O Lord," I cried, "have mercy on me, O God a miserable sinner!" For the first time, I felt that I was indeed a sinner; a poor naked, miserable wretch. "Create in me a clean heart, O God I cried, and renew a right spirit within me." O! Jesus my Savior," I exclaimed for the first time, forgive my rejecting thee; thou hast promised forgiveness even to the vilest of sinners if he turn unto thee! O, be merciful unto me, the chiefest of sinners, and take away the oppressive load of my sins, for they lie HEAVILY upon me."

And oh! my dear reader, how shall I find language to express the marvelous change which I then experienced in my soul? No language can express, no tongue can tell the joys of that moment in which a trembling sinner is reconciled to God by the blood of the Lamb. But blessed be his holy name, scarcely did I cast my care on him than "Be of good cheer, thy sins, which are many, are forgiven thee," was virtually the answer of Jehovah; a thrill of gladness ran through my very soul, and my heart overflowed with thankfulness and praise.—pp. 89—91.

THE REGISTER.

De Ruyter, September 22, 1841.

S. D. B. General Conference.

After two weeks absence, to attend the session of the General Conference, we are again at our post. The Conference convened, pursuant to adjournment, with the first Church in Alfred. The introductory discourse was preached by Br. T. B. Brown, who was also chosen Moderator. There was a good attendance of delegates. Both the business and preaching meetings were numerously attended. On Sabbath day and first day the spacious meeting-house was quite insufficient to contain the vast assemblage, and meetings were held in other places to accommodate them. The business of Conference was transacted, so far as we know, with perfect good feeling, and the views of the delegates harmonized perfectly on nearly or quite every subject discussed. And, on the whole, we felt that it was good to be there.

The Minutes of Conference will be published in about two weeks, if they are received in season from the Clerks. The next session will be held with the Church in Berlin, Rensselaer co., N. Y.

De Ruyter Institute.

We have several times taken occasion to speak of this Institute in the Register. And we now take much pleasure in recommending it to Seventh-day Baptists, in common with others. We are unwilling to persuade ourself that the denomination do not appreciate the subject of Education; and we cannot for a moment entertain the thought, that the friends of Education will allow such advantages as De Ruyter Institute affords to pass unimproved.

All who, like ourself, have spent years in Schools where we were compelled to lose one day in the week from the school more than others, on account of our conscientious views, can but urge upon all who wish to educate themselves or friends, to avail themselves of the advantages of this School. So far as we are able to learn, all who have attended here have been well satisfied, and we know of no reason why they cannot be as well satisfied now as formerly. It is manifestly the duty of every lover of Education in the denomination to use his influence to send scholars to this school.—Let the friends of the school, but come up to its aid in sending scholars, and they need not fear for its prosperity and high standing. Let every one be a Committee to aid in this way, and it will no longer be a problem, "Can De Ruyter Institute be sustained?" There are now youth enough in the denomination who need the advantages of such a school to fill its walls. And there is sufficient ability on the part of their parents to send them here. Then why do they not come? A parent cannot leave a better legacy to his children than a correct education. He cannot so well ensure their respectability and usefulness by any other means. We wish to impress on the minds of all the duty that devolves on them to educate their children, and to use their influence to build up the cause of education in the denomination. It is a duty which affects the prosperity and usefulness of the rising generation—it affects the honor of the denomination, and the truths that characterize them. If these facts are well considered, we are sure that it will lead to a course of conduct that will secure to this people all the advantages that can be derived from science.

Revival Record.

The revival in Scott still continues; 26 had united with the church at our last advices, and more were expected to. There are the best evidences that it is the work of the Lord. Some have been convicted who had not come near the meeting till they were led by the spirit of God. No extreme measures were used. There was no appeal to the feelings, but the "still small voice" of God spoke and brought sinners to repentance, and to his name be all the glory.

☞The report is current this morning that Mr. Fox, the British Minister, has demanded his passports.

The Commencement of the Sabbath.

NUMBER 3.

Having, in Nos. 22 and 27 of the Register, inquired concerning the commencement and division of terrestrial time, and found that it must have commenced at the precise moment when matter was called into existence, and that the diurnal division must also be dated from the same moment, and which, of course, involved the first part of the first day in darkness; and also, that necessarily, all the following days must commence and end in the same manner, which must of course include the seventh; it may be thought unnecessary to add any thing farther, supposing more proof superfluous.

But some suppose, that because the phrase, "evening and morning," was not used after the close of the seventh day, that the seventh was an exception to the other divisions of the six preceding days.—Also, it is maintained that, although the other days and some of the festival Sabbaths of the Jews did commence on the evening preceding the day; yet the weekly Sabbath did not. This being the case, it becomes necessary to inquire whether such be the fact.—We have already seen in the last No., that as the first day commenced and ended, so must the others; no alteration could possibly exist. Otherwise there must have been one day either longer or shorter than it should have been when the alteration took place. For, the same objection will stand against any such arrangement as it would against the change of the Sabbath from the seventh to the first day. For, whenever man changed the Sabbath from the seventh to the first day of the week, there must have been either an addition or subtraction to one-third part of the time; for he who first went from the seventh to the first day, instead of keeping the one-seventh part of time, only observed one-eighth; which is a plain violation of the divine law. Just the same would be the case when an alteration was made in the commencement or ending of the day. Therefore, if the first day began in darkness, all the other days must begin and end at the same time, and in the same way.

But it is argued that the festival Sabbaths might have commenced on the eve preceding the day; and still the weekly Sabbath did not. Against this we would oppose the same argument, viz: That no such change could ever take place without a gain or loss of some part of some day.

Thus we see that the Scriptures are a sure guide in our search after truth; and that this truth after which we have been seeking, is plainly made known, viz: That time is coeval with matter, and that the Creator divided time into a period of day and night, commencing with darkness and ending with light. Also, we see farther that time once having been begun thus, it was impossible it could ever be altered, one jot or tittle, without infringing on the prerogative of God. The day once having thus began, must always thus continue. Well may we say, "The heavens declare the glory of God, and the firmament showeth his handi-work. Day unto day uttereth speech, and night unto night showeth forth knowl- of Him."

In the 23d chapter of Leviticus we have an account of several feasts of the Jews, and among them is the seventh-day Sabbath. In the 32d verse we are told when the atonement Sabbath (at least,) commenced. "From even unto even ye shall celebrate your Sabbath." Much stress is laid upon the word Sabbath, as being in the singular. Whether it is the same in the original Hebrew I am unable to say. But be that as it may, the result must be the same. For if the 10th day of the 7th month began on the evening following the 9th, of necessity, not only every other day of that week, but also every day which had transpired, and every one that ever should transpire, must commence and end in the same manner. But it is said that this 32d verse of the 23rd chapter of Leviticus proves that the evening following the day was reckoned with the day preceding. This, I think, is a mistake, for it will be remembered that the Jews counted two evenings; one commencing at 3 o'clock, P. M., and ending at twilight, when the second evening commenced. Therefore, if the expression mentioned in the phrase, "In the 9th day of the month, at even," means that the evening was a part of the 9th day, it must be the first evening; as the second evening was always reckoned with, or as belonging to the following day. But the last clause of the verse decides the case. It says, "From even unto even shall ye celebrate your Sabbath." Here it is plain that from "even unto even," means from the commencement of one evening to the commencement of the next, the day was to be computed. This I contend is the plain meaning, and I verily believe to be the scriptural meaning of the passage. And if I shall find this construction to be in accordance with the practice of the Jews, (which will be examined in my next number,) the point will be decided, viz: that the weekly Sabbath always did, always has, and always must commence at the close of the 6th day, which ends at the setting of the sun on said day.

WASHINGTON CORRESPONDENCE.

Wednesday, Sept. 1.

In Senate, to-day, the bill to satisfy the outstanding reservation to the Choctaw Indians, was taken up, and after some conversation, a motion to re-commit having failed, the bill was passed.

The Revenue Bill then coming up as the unfinished business, Mr. Berrien moved to lay it on the table to take up the Fiscal Corporation Bill.

Mr. Rives hoped they would go on with the Revenue Bill, and finish it before they took up this bill. He had not examined the Bank bill, as he had not expected it would be taken up.

Mr. Clay hoped the bill would be taken up, as it was the general understanding yesterday. (Mr. Woodbury said it was.) He (Mr. C.) said he had made up his mind to vote for the bill; although it did not all he could wish, yet it would do much good.

Mr. Archer on account of his colleagues being unprepared would let the matter pass over. He was prepared for it himself, and should vote for the bill.

Mr. Rives further spoke against taking up the bill, and said he was decided to his vote, in the present shape of the bill; 'he could not, and would not vote for the bill,' but should be very happy to have it so shaped that he could.

Messrs. Calhoun and Woodbury wished the bill taken up, and disposed of, as they knew full well till that was done, no adjournment, for which members were most anxious, could be had.

The Revenue Bill was then laid on the table, by a vote of 31 Yeas to 11 Nays, and the 'Fiscal Corporation' Bill was taken up and read through.

Mr. Berrien then, as Chairman of the Committee, who reported it, spoke upwards of two hours and a half in defense of the bill. He maintained its constitutionality, and that the scruples on this point which had existed with reference to the other bill were avoided in this. He referred to the President's Message at the commencement of the Session, to the Report of the Secretary of the Treasury, and to the Veto Message, and held that this bill exactly conformed to the views of the Executive Department, expressing at the same time his decided belief that it would meet with favor there.

The bill was then open to amendments, and none being offered, it was reported to the Senate. Cries of 'engrossment' were then heard, and no one rising, the question was about to be taken, when Mr. Clay very briefly stated that he should vote for the bill; although it was not such a one as he wished, the Constitution authorised and the people demanded, yet it would do much good, and he would take it in preference to none.

Mr. Benton offered amendments to prohibit States, from becoming subscribers to the Stock, to prohibit Corporations from the same, to provide that corporators of Corporation subscribers should be citizens of the United States, that the Stock should only be transferrable to citizens of the U. States, and that Corporations should pay $50, instead of $10 per share, at the time of their subscription; all of which were rejected, with but very little debate, the first by a vote of 18 Yeas to 28 Nays, the second by 21 Yeas to 26 Nays, the third by 20 Yeas to 26 Nays, the fourth by 20 to 27, and the fifth by 21 to 28. He styled it the 'physical—physic—Fiscal' Corporation.

Mr. Rives should not vote for the bill unless amended. It conferred on the agencies the unlimited power of discounting bills of exchange in the United States, and independently of their consent. He held that agencies might be admitted into the States without their express assent, on the principle of the comity of nations, but to be subject to be removed at the will of the States, and to be entirely prohibited from discounts of exchanges as well as promissory notes.

A motion to adjourn by Mr. Preston failed: Yeas 20, Nays 28. Cries of 'engrossment' was again heard.

Messrs. Walker and Allen offered amendments, the former to provide that the bills should be at short time, and on goods actually shipped; and the latter, to make the stockholders responsible in their private capacity to the amount of their respective stock, in case the corporation failed to redeem its obligations in specie. These were rejected—the first by 21 to 27, and the second by 2 to 28.

The Senate then adjourned without taking the question, to give Mr. Archer an opportunity to present his views, which it is understood, will be very brief. The question is expected to be taken to-morrow, without much debate, the Opposition having given that up from their anxiety to adjourn, which is now calculated at Wednesday next.

The House agreed to the Senate's amendment to the Post Office Appropriation Bill, and adjourned at 12 o'clock. They are out of business.

Thursday, Sept. 2.

In Senate, to-day, the bills from the House making appropriations for the erection of the Statue of Washington in the Rotunda of the Capitol, and for the Potomac bridge, was passed—the latter with an amendment.

The "Fiscal Corporation" Bill was again taken up, and Mr. Archer spoke about two hours in an able argument in favor of the bill. He contended that there were but two modes to be employed by Government in the collection and disbursement of the revenue—one was, by the employment of individuals, or the Sub-Treasury system; and the other, by means of corporations; which mode included the State deposit system, and a general Fiscal Agent for the Government.

The Sub-Treasury and Deposit Systems had been rejected, and the employment of the third in some form was absolutely necessary to the vitality of Government. The measure now proposed was a medium between that which had been rejected by the President and the Sub-Treasury; it was removed from all constitutional objections; it was in an eminent degree 'proper' as well as 'necessary,' and, being exactly adapted to present circumstances, was the grand desideratum, which should be eagerly grasped by all who had the interests and the perpetuity of the Government in view. No measure of finance but this remaining, he pointed out the utter fallacy of the argument, that it should be dependent for its action on the consent of every one of twenty-six sovereign States, over which Congress had no control, and some one of which might not see fit to act on it at all, thus suspending or entirely destroying the very life of our Government. He could not tell what fate it would meet with the President, but considered it as 'easy to see what could not be seen,' as for any human power to point out constitutional defects in it. If the President saw fit to veto it, under constitutional scruples, let him take the tremendous responsibility. It was said if this were vetoed, the Whig party would be destroyed. This was not the case; the Whig party would be in the best possible condition; their efforts to fulfil the object of their call here—to provide some fiscal agent for Government, would be appreciated and rewarded in the plaudit of 'Well done, good and faithful servants, who have done all within the utmost limits of human power under the circumstances.'

Mr. Buchanan replied to the remarks of Mr. Archer, entirely opposing this measure, as more odious in every aspect than an old-fashioned United States Bank; he considered "Kite-flying Fiscality' the most appropriate name for it—far more so than the Senator's from Missouri (Mr. Benton's) appellation of "Meal-Tubs," "Botts," &c. bank. He referred to the Harrisburg Convention, denied that the question of "bank or no bank," or any other principle was settled there, and said that the assemblage was composed of a mixed multitude from every nation, and tribe, and kindred, and tongue, politically. He also expressed his desire and belief that the President would veto the bill; and held that he could, consistently with his principles, do no otherwise.

Mr. Clay replied eloquently and with great effect to the Senator's remarks. Of all the diverse characters composing the Harrisburg Convention, he would say there were none in favor of low wages. What sort of a party, he asked, must that have been to be so signally defeated by a union that had no principles at all—as the Senator had described the Whig party? He rescued Mr. Tyler from the imputations thrown on him, in case he signed the bill, and believed, from the principles expressly laid down in his Veto Message, as well as from those uniformly maintained by him, that this measure would conform to his views and receive his sanction. Rumor has said that a party of the Opposition visited the President's House the night after the Veto;—he knew nothing as to the fact, but he would suppose a case, which he most graphically and jocosely described. There, he would imagine, among those gathered for the purpose of the great congratulation, the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. Calhoun,] looking as if he was deducting the nicest abstraction that had ever issued from his metaphysical brain; there, he presumed, was the Senator from Alabama, [Mr. King,] ready to settle in the most positive manner, any question of order that might arise.—He supposed that many others were present, whom he went on to characterize, to the no small amusement of the dense crowd in the galleries, as well as the Senators and Representatives on the floor, among whom he supposed the Senator from Penn., [Mr. Buchanan,] as their distinguished leader, addressing the President in something like the following manner:

"May it please your Excellency: My political friends and myself have come this afternoon, to deposit at your Excellency's feet, the evidences of our loyalty and devotion. We have come, more particularly, to express to your Excellency the congratulations to which we think you are entitled, for having relieved the country from the danger of a violation of its Constitution, by the establishment of a Bank of the United States; and we owe to your Excellency our special acknowledgments, for the Veto with which you have favored the country to-day; and for special reasons—we struggled with your Excellency's friends, in both Houses of Congress, for days and weeks together; we exhausted all our powers of argument and logic to defeat it; but in spite of that, the friends of your Excellency in both Houses, proved too strong for us, and carried the measure against our united exertions; and we come now to thank your Excellency that you have done that against your friends, which we could not accomplish with all our exertions."

He imagined that after availing themselves of the President's hospitalities, and by no means overlooking the Champaigne, they retired with the utmost good feeling.

Messrs. Calhoun, King, and Buchanan, severally replied to the remarks of Mr. Clay, and denied that they were at the President's House that evening; Mr. Calhoun called on Mr. Archer, who was there, to state who was present.

Mr. Archer said he having been called on, would state that he was there, and there was a room full of Loco-Focos.

This caused a general burst of laughter. The debate was continued till a very late hour, on various topics entirely disconnected with the bill, and it was hoped that the question would be taken on third reading.

Mr. Berrien wished as Chairman, who reported the bill, to reply to some of the remarks which had been offered, and moved an adjournment. He was appealed to by Messrs. Linn, Sevier and others to let the question be taken, and then speak on the final passage of the bill. He, however, declined withdrawing the motion, and, it being carried by Yeas 28, Nays 18, the Senate adjourned.

In the House of Representatives a resolution reported by Mr. Kennedy of Maryland, to appoint a Select Committee of 12 members to sit during the recess and examine and report on the Tariff, was laid on the table by Yeas 87, Nays 52.

A resolution offered by Mr. G. Davis of Ky., to reduce the price of the printing of the Department to that of Congress, was adopted.

A report was made from the Committee of Elections on the election case of Mr. Levy, now sitting delegate from Florida, that he is not a citizen of the United States. The report was ordered printed.

The House adjourned at an early hour.

Friday, Sept. 3.

In Senate, Mr. Calhoun presented a series of resolutions passed at a meeting in Clarke Co., Va., commending the policy of the party in power, and in favor of sustaining the Veto. Mr. Preston moved that it be laid on the table, but withdrew his motion until Messrs. Calhoun and Benton had made remarks in favor of printing them, when he briefly rejoined and then renewed the motion which prevailed: Yeas 26, Nays 17.

The joint resolution from the House relating to the printing of the Departments was read twice and referred to the Committee on the Library.

The bill from the House to repeal Sect. 6, of the Act passed July, 1838, for the support of the Military Academy and to prohibit any investment of the U. S. funds in the State Stocks was read twice and referred to the Committee on Finance.

On motion of Mr. Buchanan, the bill from the House allowing the franking privilege to be extended to Mrs. Harrison, was read in Committee of the Whole and passed.

The joint resolution from the House, making it the duty of the Attorney General, to examine into the titles of lands for public buildings, &c., was read twice and referred to the Committee on Finance.

The Fiscal Corporation Bill then came up; being briefly debated by Messrs. Simmons and Berrien, Mr. Walker offered an amendment inserting a new section, claiming for Congress the power to "modify or repeal," which was rejected, Yeas 20, Nays 28. The question was then upon its third reading, which was ordered by the following vote: Yeas 27, Nays 22.

The bill was then read a third time and finally passed.

The Fortification Bill was then taken up and Mr. Preston moved that the Senate concur with the amendment of the House, which was to strike out $75,000 for the Western Armory, and insert $5,000. After debate by Mr. Benton against, and Mr. Preston in favor of the amendment, it was adopted, Yeas 27, Nays 19.

The Senate then proceeded to the consideration of executive business and then adjourned.

The House, on motion of Mr. Briggs, took up the joint resolution giving the franking privilege to Mrs. Harrison during life. Mr. Andrews offered an amendment which was adopted, striking out the words "weighing two ounces and under." At the instance of Mr. Cushing, the Resolution was changed to an Act, read in that form a third time and finally passed.

On leave, Mr. Fillmore offered a resolution requiring the Secretary of the State to report to the House, as soon after the commencement of the next session as practicable, a statement of the privileges and restrictions of the commercial intercourse of the United States with all foreign nations, with columns showing the average amount and value of the articles exported to each country for the years 1838, 1839, and 1840, and of the duties on the same; together with a summary of the average aggregate value of exports to each country for those years, of articles, the growth, produce, or manufacture of the United States, with the average amount of duties thereon accruing to each country. The resolution was adopted.

The resolution offered by Mr. J. G. Floyd, requesting the President to inform the House whether any officer of the Army, or the Attorney-General has, since March 4th, been directed to visit New York for any purpose connected with the trial of McLeod, &c., then came up. After some debate by Messrs. Floyd, Everett, and Boardman, the House adjourned.

Saturday, Sept. 4.

The Distribution and Pre-emption Bill has received the signature of the President, as was to-day announced to the House of Representatives, and thus, has become a law.

In the House the resolution relative to McLeod was discussed in a manner that excited much interest by Mr. Adams during his hour.

The motion of Mr. Boardman to lay the bill on the table was then renewed, and carried 109 Yeas to 70 Nays.

Thus the resolution which has served as a cause of debate in the absence of other business was laid on the table.

On motion of Mr. J. C. Clark, it was resolved, that no purchase of paper for the use of the House, be made until the Committee of Reform appointed on that subject submit a report to the House at the next session of Congress.

The House adjourned at an early hour; they have now no business before them.

In the Senate, the Ordnance Bill from the House, was taken up, discussed at some length, and laid over to Monday.

The Revenue Bill was again taken up, the question being on the amendment offered some few days since by Mr. Woodbury, to exempt from duty "tea and coffee."

Mr. Clay, as Chairman of the Committee who reported the bill, gave a general exposition of the wants of the Treasury, and the consequent imperative necessity for the passage of the bill as a means for providing revenue. He entered into the subject in detail, and showed from statistical tables that the total deficit for the present year in the actual income of the Government amounted to the enormous sum of sixteen millions of dollars. This excluded the issue of Treasury Notes, and receipts under the loan authorised this session; the Treasury Notes to the amount of six millions being taken from the sixteen, still left ten millions deficit. This would absorb all the loan except two millions which would be more than consumed by the appropriations of the present session, so that the year 1842 would be commenced without a single dollar in the Treasury, and millions in debt. Four millions of Treasury Notes were to be redeemed in the first half of 1842, as well as a third of the loan authorised this Session, being four millions, made eight millions falling on the year 1842, beside the current expenses. The revenue, taking the same as from customs of the year 1841, was twelve and a quarter millions—deducting the eight millions, it left four and a quarter millions, as the total amount of actual revenue, applicable to the expenditures of Government in 1842.

He then estimated what this estimate would be, under this bill, taking as a standard the average annual imports for the last four years. The probable revenue would be twenty-three millions. The question was what would be the expenditures; they had averaged during the four years of Van Buren's Administration, twenty-eight millions per annum; he hoped this would be able to be reduced to twenty-two millions, which was the lowest year, or even twenty millions, and every possible economy would be exercised. Were this taken from the probable amount of revenue, it would leave an excess of only one million in the most favorable circumstances, to pay the contingent expenses of Government. Thus it appeared that there was an absolute need of the passage of the bill.

He opposed the amendment pending, and preferred a duty on tea and coffee to a violation of the Compromise act, which must otherwise unavoidably take place.

Messrs. Woodbury, Calhoun, and Benton advocated the amendment, which was finally adopted—Yeas 29, Nays 10.

Mr. Allen moved to exempt salt from duty.

After some remarks on this, and without taking the question, the Senate adjourned.

Monday, Sept. 6.

In the Senate, to-day, Mr. Benton moved to lay before the President, the late report of the Secretary of the Treasury, showing the amount of Public Lands prepared for sale, and not brought into market.

Mr. Smith, of Ia., warmly opposed the motion, as disrespectful to the President; and after some conversation, on his motion, it was laid on the table.

The Revenue Bill was then taken up, and with reference to amendments, occupied the Senate during the day. The final question is expected to-morrow.

The amendment of Mr. Benton to exempt salt from duty was, after considerable debate, rejected—Yeas 21, Nays 23. The amendment of Mr. Walker to exempt gunny bags was rejected. The amendment of Mr. Buchanan to repeal the law exempting rail road iron from duty and subjecting it to a duty of 20 per cent. being modified at the suggestion of Mr. Berrien, so that it shall not take effect till the 3d of March, 1843, with regard to iron, which is necessary in the construction of rail roads already commenced, was adopted. 'Cloves' were subjected to a duty, on motion of Mr. Evans. On motion of Mr. Clay, a proviso was appended to the 2d section, that no duty shall be levied under its provisions exceeding 20 per cent. ad valorem.

Resolutions of meetings in Amelia and Surry Counties, Virginia, were presented—the former by Mr. Jones in the House, the latter by Mr. Benton in the Senate—condemning the Measures of this Session, approving the Veto of the President, and opposing a Protective Tariff. They were laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

In the House, Mr. Summers from the Committee of Retrenchment in the Expenditures of the House, reported a resolution authorizing that Committee to report next session. Mr. Watterson moved an amendment, that the Postmaster of the House keep an account of the Stationery used by each member.

Mr. Summers made a statement showing that fifteen barrels of ink had been used this Session, and giving an account of the consumption of other articles, among which are quills, on the making of which, a little less than $500 has been paid. The resolution was adopted.

The report of the Committee of Elections that David Levy, Esq., sitting delegate from Florida, is not a citizen of the United States, was taken up.

Mr. Levy argued his case with ability, and urged a postponement of it till next session to enable him to collect further proof of his citizenship.

The House adjourned without a decision of the case.

Tuesday Sept. 7.

The Extra Session of Congress is rapidly drawing to a close, the House having some days since completed its business, and having waited the action of the Senate, which has to-day disposed of all the important Legislative business before it, viz: the Revenue bill and the Diplomatic Appropriation bill, both of which were passed and sent to the House for their concurrence in some few amendments. But one or two unimportant bills now remain before the Senate, which will consume very little time. There is supposed to be Executive business of some days before it; and it is generally estimated that Monday will close the Session, much impatience being manifested by the Members to be released from their protracted and arduous labors.

Nothing is yet officially heard from the President with regard to the fate of the new Bank bill. Various rumors are abroad, one of which, a pretty general one, is that a Veto will be received to-morrow.

In the SENATE, various amendments were offered to the Revenue bill to-day, many of which were rejected. Those were adopted, to free from duty marrow, soap stocks, palm oil, mohair, smalts, prunella, and ground flint. Among those rejected was one offered by Mr. CALHOUN, that no change should take place on the duty of any article prior to 1st of July, 1842 inconsistently with the Compromise Act—lost, Yeas 11, Nays 24; one offered by Mr. BENTON, to exempt from duty blankets not costing over seventy-five cents each, by a vote of 20 to 25; also, one to free raw hides; one to tax Bank notes, by 8 Yeas to 23 Nays; and one to tax 'furs undressed of all kinds,' by 18 to 25.

The bill was then reported to the Senate when all amendments of the committee, were agreed to, in one vote, except those relating to jewelry and bleaching powders; the former of which articles was subjected to a duty, by 30 yeas to 12 nays, and the latter without a division.

On motion of Mr. Clay, the time fixed for the bill to take effect was placed the 30th Sept. 1841, a motion by Mr. Wright to make the time in 20 days after its passage, being rejected by a vote of 17 to 32, and by Mr. Calhoun to make it the 30th November, by 9 to 28. The motion was carried, and thus on the 30th September, 1841, the act goes into operation, except by an amendment of Mr. Bates, that it shall not apply to articles shipped from beyond the Cape of Good Hope, and left their last place of lading prior to the 1st August ult.

The Bill was ordered to be engrossed, and afterwards passed by Yeas 34, Nays 11, the Whigs, together with Messrs. Buchanan Clay of Ala., Fulton, King, Sevier, Sturgeon and Young voting for it.

The Diplomatic Appropriation Bill from the House was taken up, and amended by striking out $9,000 which was for outfit and salary of Charge d'Affairs at Naples. A provision was also appended to this Bill appropriating three months extra salary to clerks, messengers, and watchmen, &c. about the Capitol, for their services this session. The Bill was then engrossed, and passed.

In the House, a resolution to allow per diem pay and mileage to William Smith, Esq. claimant of the seat of Linn Banks as representative from Virginia was discussed at some length and laid on table.

The resolution postponing the case of David Levy sitting delegate from Florida till next session was adopted: Yeas 123, Nays 44.

A bill reported by Mr Dawson of Ga., appropriating $33,000 to repair fortifications on Staten Island, was passed in committee of the Whole, and in the House. It was then sent to the Senate, and referred to their Military Committee.

Mr. Ferris, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, reported a resolution requesting the President of the United States to take measures for the rescue of the American citizens now British prisoners of state, in exile at Van Dieman's Land.

Messrs. Ferris and Holmes advocated, and Mr. Adams opposed the motion.

The House then adjourned.

The bill making appropriations for the Potomac bridge has passed both Houses.

ARGUS.

News of the Day.

More Beauties of Mormonism—A Gloucestershire Farmer rather too cunning for Joe.—We cut the following paragraph from one of our English papers, and commend its perusal to all who are preparing to follow that prince of blasphemers and swindlers, JOE SMITH.

MORMONISM.—This new fangled swindle will we hope now receive its death blow, in this neighborhood. We have just seen the wife of a small farmer who sailed with her husband and six children last February from Liverpool. They, and about 100 others, landed at New Orleans, went several hundred miles up the country, past St. Louis, and arrived safe at the "promised land"—now Jerusalem—on the first of May last; a three week's residence was sufficient to let them into the secret, and they arrived safe back in the old country about a fortnight ago. They had frequent communications while on the banks of the Missisippi with the renowned prophet, Joe Smith, and his brother imposters, who took every means in their power to get hold of our informant's money, by offering to sell them large plots of land, take them into partnership, &c. &c., but the Gloucestershire yeoman was proof against their wiles, and used his little capital in bringing his family back again. What most staggered the faith of the party was, that this great prophet, Mr. Joseph Smith, could not show them the "Plates of Gold" on which it was pretended the book of Mormon was written; Joe evaded the question by saying the angel merely showed them to him, and after he had taken a fair copy took them back again!—Cheltenham Journal.

John F. Mills, a notorious horse thief, who was taken a short time since in Albany, by constable Joseph S. Johnson of this village, and lodged in the Schoharie County Jail, has made several attempts to break jail. He succeeded in sawing or filing off the bars which form the gratings of the window and had removed a thick plank over the door of his room. He was discovered however and removed to another room where he was chained to the floor. On Sunday morning last, he complained much of pain which he suffered on account of the irons on his ankle, and the sheriff at length consented to take them off. In the course of the afternoon, one of the Deputy Sheriffs had occasion to visit the room in which he was confined and while he was conversing with another prisoner, Mills made his escape. He was discovered when he came out of the front door of the Court House and was immediately pursued and taken. Mr. S. B. Brewster who was one of the first who came up, was struck by Mills with a stone, but received no serious injury. He seemed to be much exhausted when taken.—Schoharie Republican.

Temperance Diminishes Crime.—Judge Cushman informs us, that for four weeks, not a single person has been arraigned at the bar of the Police Court in this city for any offence occasioned by excessive drinking. Before the Washingtonian Temperance Reform commenced, there were from three to five cases every week.—Bangor Democrat.

Missourium Exploded.—Our readers remember the collection of great bones recently exhibited in this city, under the name of the "Missourium."

In the "Western Journal of Medicine and Surgery," for Aug. the true character of the bone was exposed. They are in fact those of the MASTADON, or Mammoth and are only of the common size.

The tusk of the Mastadon found by Dr. Goforth, at Big Bone Lick, in 1802, was eighteen inches longer than the tusks exhibited by Mr. Koch.

The size of the animal was made enormous, by stretching the vertebræ by wooden blocks between, and by putting more than the natural number together, with some other slight mistakes of that kind.

This much the public should know in order not to mistake the bones of the Mastadon for a new animal.—Cin. Chron.

Helderburg Expedition—The Sheriff and Posse returned last evening from their Expedition to the Helderburg, showing that when backed by sufficient physical force, he could sell property if anybody could be found to purchase it. We learn that the house of the resisting tenant was closed and that all his personal property, except Hay and Rye, was removed. The Sheriff then went to the barn and put up the Hay and Rye, and nobody would bid. He then determined to remove the Rye, but in this he found resistance from the Tenants who crowded into the barn. The Military, however, soon drove them out and quieted all matters. In this brush, two of the Tenants were injured, though not seriously.

Persons disguised in Indian costume, with rifles, were seen skirting the woods, but did not approach.

Some of the Tenants, large numbers of whom assembled, strongly excited, taunted the Military, who now, as on former occasion, preserved the strictest discipline, neither giving offence or replying to offensive epithets.—Alb. Eve. Jour.

Benjamin Lett.—This man, whom oppression had driven to desperation, is now, consigned to seven years imprisonment.—He is a man of indomitable enterprise and noble daring. Having embarked with MacKenzie in the contemplated rebellion, his farm confiscated, and then his brother shot, and his sister outraged by soldiery. This was enough to make a man desperate. He determined on revenge. After his escape from the Rail Road Car on his way to prison, he returned to Canada, where he blew up the Welland Canal and Brock's Monument. On the Saturday night before he was arrested at Buffalo, he was in Canada maturing a plan to blow up a War Steamer.—Alb. Eve. Jour.

Abolition Nominations—The Abolitionists of the 7th Senate District have nominated JOHN THOMAS, of Cortland County, and HENRY BRADLEY, of Yates, as their candidates for the Senate.

The Abolitionists of the 6th Senate District have nominated SAMUEL H. HAMMOND, Esq. of Steuben County, for the Senate.

Canal Boat building at Rochester.—ONE HUNDRED AND FIFTEEN CANAL BOATS have been launched at Rochester within the last year. There are eight Boat Yards there which give employment to more than 600 workmen. This, for one branch of business, in a city which in 1812 was a wilderness, is a strong illustration of the progress of improvement.—Alb. Eve. Jour.

Death of Gen. Bogardus.—Gen. ROBERT BOGARDUS, a highly respectable member of the New York Bar, and formerly a member of our State Senate, died at his residence in New York city on Saturday night.—Alb. Eve. Jour.

The passage from America to Glasgow, was never we believe, performed in so short a time as by Dr. McTear, surgeon on board the Britannia, which arrived at Liverpool on Thursday evening. The Britannia performed the passage from Boston to Liverpool in 8 days and 18 hours. Just as she was entering the harbor, the Achilles was leaving for Glasgow, when Dr. McTear stept from the paddle-box of the other, and was brought direct to Glasgow, where he arrived on Friday night, thus making the entire voyage in ten days and sixteen hours.—Scottish Guardian.

RIOT AT CINCINNATTI

A slip from the Cincinnati Republican, dated Saturday morning, Sept. 4th, brings us the following particulars of an alarming riot which took place there on that day. The intelligence is confirmed by other accounts; among which is a letter, which will be found below; received at the office of the New Era:

To the Editor of the New Era:

CINCINNATTI, Sept. 5th, 1841.

Our city at this moment is the theatre of the most terrible excitement I have ever witnessed. The military are patrolling the streets, and heralds are out, by order of the Mayor, calling upon the citizens to meet at 10 o'clock, this morning, at the Market House, to devise measures for the preservation of the peace, and protection of our citizens. The whites and negroes have had a terrible battle, in which several men are reported to have been killed and a number badly wounded. As I have but a few moments to write before the close of the eastern mail, I can give but a brief narration of this dreadful affair. On the evening before the last, it appears, that a quarrel occurred between several negroes and two white men, in which the latter were badly wounded, with dirks and dirk knives. This occasioned considerable excitement, and added fresh fuel to the Anti Negro flame, which has been increasing in intensity and volume, with threatning rapidity of late.

About nine o'clock last evening, a large concourse of people without concert or arms assembled at the junction of 6th street, and Broadway, in the immediate vicinity of the "Five Points," of this city, or as it is called here "Nigger-Town." A few persons in this mob, (which consisted, of 5 or 600) apparently without any deliberate design, threw stones against the buildings of the negroes. The negroes immediately poured into the mob a volley of bullets, from muskets and rifles, with which they had previously provided themselves in anticipation of an attack.

The mob being unarmed, fled precipitantly, and were hotly pursued for nearly a square by the blacks, who yelled out a wild shout of triumph and defiance, and then returned to their houses. During the firing a number of negroes were stationed on the tops of their own and the adjoining houses, from which they levelled their pieces among the crowd.

The mob continued at bay till after midnight, by which time, perhaps 30 or 40 of the assailants provided themselves with arms and a six pounder cannon. Thus equipped they advanced to the position they occupied in the early part of the evening, loaded their cannon with fragments of iron, and levelled its muzzle against a building about 100 yards distant, in which a large number of armed negroes were said to be stationed.

After a few ineffectual shots from the the small arms of the assailants, the cannon was discharged, but without effect. The negroes quickly rallied, and returned a heavy fire upon their houses, but the whites stood their ground, reloading and discharging their six pound cannon several times, and kept up also a brisk fire with their small arms. The conflict was terrible, but fortunately for the lives of many, the prompt arrival of the military silenced the firing, restored peace and dispersed the mob.

Since three o'clock this morning our city has enjoyed its usual repose, but there are apprehensions of a dreadful and concerted attack upon the blacks to-night, which of course the law abiding portion of our citizens will exert themselves to prevent. There are various reports of the number killed on both sides, but it is impossible to ascertain of the truth of these reports at present.

The negroes were victors! What will be the result of this? The negroes victorious! Think of that! It is said they were counselled by the abolitionists to arm themselves, and fire upon the whites if attacked. A crowd of people have just passed my window in pursuit of some blacks. I was informed by a friend at my elbow that the city is all in confusion and uproar again, and that the terror-struck negroes are flying in all directions.

There is no fighting or lynching, but the people, the mob, are taking the negroes into custody as fast as they can be caught, with the design of enforcing a law of this State, which requires all the colored residents of Ohio to give bond for their good behavior, or leave the state. I will keep you advised of the progress of this negro war. In haste, yours, &c.

AWFUL RIOT! SEVERAL LIVES LOST.

Our city was thrown into great excitement last night. It originated from a quarrel that took place on Thursday night, on Columbia Street, between a few negroes and whites, in which one of the latter was stabbed and cut awfully, so that it is thought he cannot live.

In consequence of this, 2 or 3,000 persons collected around the houses of the negroes on 6th street, east of Broadway.—The negroes apprehensive of an affray, had armed themselves with muskets, and fired upon the crowd. The mayor informs us he thinks two whites and two negroes are killed, and about 15 or 20 wounded mostly whites.

During the affray, a cannon was brought up, loaded with slugs, and fired down 6th street two or three times, raking the streets but with what effect is not yet known. The Mayor who was on the ground all night, called out two military companies, the Grays and Guards, and both squares from from 5th to 7th, are guarded by, and under control of the military and a large body of armed volunteers, the negroes being all confined to their houses.

No destruction of property of consequence has taken place.

The city is still in great excitement, and a special meeting of the Council is to be held at 10 o'clock this morning, when strong measures will undoubtedly be taken to preserve the peace of the city.

A Town Meeting of the citizens generally is to take place immediately, held for the same purpose.

Printers.—Compositors in a Printing Office are CURIOUS CHAPS. They love bread and cheese, turkey, ham, veal, oysters, eggs, and are very fond of wedding cake, in fact every thing good, except pi—that they hate as they do lack of copy.

Here's an out said we, while reading proof; why don't you take more pains? I have pains enough already said one of them, by judging from the way my back feels.

But speaking of the out said we.

Well, speaking of the out, what then? I wish I was out, for I am nearly tired to death.

Well, sit down and work, replied we.

I like that; can a man be setting up when he is setting down? 'spect not.

And so it runs on! you can't get a rational word from any of them: they bother us nearly to death.

Great Fire at Philadelphia.—The Philadelphia Gazette of yesterday brings us the particulars of a destructive conflagration, which occurred in that city on Friday morning:

It commenced at two o'clock in a frame tenement East of Second street, above Poplar lane, lately occupied as a carpenter shop, and owned by Mr. Hubbard, which soon communicated to a Starch Factory owned by the same lady; both were burned to the ground. A hay press belonging to Mr. Bodine was also totally consumed, worth about $5,000, covered with an insurance to the amount of $4,000. A tannery, belonged to the estate of Mrs. [illegible], and occupied by Mr. Newman, was entirely consumed; no insurance effected on the property, whatever, loss about $10,500. About 14 dwellings were burnt with the contents save the inmates, some of whom barely escaped in their night clothes, so rapidly did the flames spread. Several stables belonging to Mr. Harrison were consumed, and also his dwelling, his loss is about $30,000, [so reported.] Some of the property belonged to Mr Andrew Wray, Mr Jones, and to a blind man. The whole amount of property destroyed by the fire is estimated at $200,000.

Robbery.—Mr. W. P. Simpson, of Ohio, who left Baltimore a few days since with a large amount of money, which he drew there and had with him on his return, was robbed eight or nine miles this side of Uniontown, Pa., on Saturday last. He was attacked by two armed disguised ruffians, and the sum of $2,140 taken from his person.—Pennsylvanian.

Sickness at West Point.—We regret to learn that there is a good deal of sickness among the Cadets of the West Point Military Academy. Some 30 or 40 are suffering severely from the dysentary, and it is feared that one or two will not recover. A young Cadet named Mason, from the District of Columbia, was so ill on Thursday that little hope was entertained of his living through the day. Indeed, we heard that he died about noon on Thursday, but we trust the rumor may be unfounded.—N. Y. Daily Advertiser.

Hollis Street Church.—The War Renewed.—On Monday evening there was a numerous meeting of the Proprietors [including but few of the worshipers] in the vestry of Hollis Street Church, for the purpose of electing officers for the ensuing year, and to give, we suppose, at the same time to the party to Mr. Pierpont an opportunity of proving by action what they have already expressed by words—"a determination to tear down the church, sooner than allow its present pastor continue as its minister."

The proprietors, [not the worshipers,] carried their entire ticket, Mr. Pierpont's friends giving no opposition further than that sufficient to prove the elections not unanimous, nor did they do more on a resolution moved by one of their own party "to provide by tax for the support of the Pastor," &c., which was necessarily lost!!! The spirit of left handed impartiality which marked the proceedings will be best understood by a vote passed "to dispense with the usual committee on music," thus depriving the congregation of one of their dearest accompaniments in the performance of Divine Worship.—Bost. Times.

Caution to Builders.—A mechanic and builder showed us this morning a sample of nails his men had been using in erecting a staging, some part of which had fallen before it was used. On examination, found that there was no strength in the nails, being readily broken with the fingers, like a pipe stem. It was fortunate the discovery was made thus early. Two casks were purchased together, one of which was good, the other bad; they are supposed to be made from rail-road iron, and are entirely worthless. It is even said that this iron is imported free of duty, for this iniquitous purpose. Let it be looked after, or frightful accidents will result from their use.—The accident in the south part of the city a few weeks since, by which several very worthy men were made cripples for life, was caused by the use of these nails.—Boston Transcript.

The total population of the United States, as appears by the late census, is 17,068,112.

The Remains of Boyd and Parker.—We noticed a short time since the ceremonies recently held at Rochester, on the removal of the remains of these officers, from their obscure graves to Mount Hope Cemetery. The occasion was graced by the presence of Gov. Seward and other distinguished persons. Some doubt begins to be indulged respecting the identity of these remains. The Rochester Democrat says:

"We have taken some pains to investigate the matter to the bottom; and we now stand ready to prove, by one or more reputable physicians of this city, who are well skilled in the science of anatomy, and who were invited to examine the remains, that the bones that were brought to this city and palmed off as those of Boyd and Parker, are not the bones of a human being, but those of a brute beast!"

The Shipwreck.

BY MRS. L. H. SIGOURNEY.

The good ship on the iceberg struck,
Where northern seas were high,
And midnight wrapped in ebon veil
The chill and starless sky,—
It struck!—what moment was there then
To waste in sorrow's strife!
When but one bold adventurous rush
Remained between death and life.

The boat! the boat! it lanches forth
Upon the mountain wave,
And leaping throngs, with frantic haste,
Essay its power to save—
A fragile thing, it tossing strove
Amid the wrathful tide,
And deep unuttered pangs were theirs
Who left the vessel's side.

A moonbeam pierced the heavy cloud,—
O, God! what sight was there!
Who stood upon that fated deck,
In calm and mute despair!
A gentle maiden, just aroused
From slumber soft and dear,
Stretch'd her white arms in wild amaze,
But found no helper near.

In fond adieu, her hand she waved,
As if some friend she blessed,
Then closer drew her snowy robe,
Around her youthful breast,
And upward to the darkened heavens
Imploring glances cast,
While her rich curls profusely fell,
And floated on the blast.

All sudden, from his wildering trance,
A manly form did start,
While a loud agonizing cry
Burst from his laboring heart;
His bloodless lip was deadly cold—
Strange lustre fired his eye—
"How can I bear a brother's name,
Yet leave thee thus to die!"

He plunged—the crested wave he ruled,
He climbed the cloven deck,
And clasped her, as the thundering surge
Swept o'er the heaving wreck;
"Sweet sister, 'tis thy brother's voice,
His cheek is pressed to thine—
Together childhood's path we trod—
Thy last dread couch be mine!"

Still looked the moon with pitying eye,
All lone and silent down,
Encircling them with holy light,
As with a martyr's crown,
Then shrank behind her fleecy veil:—
Hoarse shrieked the impetuous main;
The deep sea closed—and where were they?
Ask the angel train!

Ah! noble hearts that night were whelm'd
Beneath the billows high,
And temples white with honored years,
And woman's love-lit eye,
And clinging to its mother's breast
In vision soft and deep,
Unwakened innocence went down
Amid the pearls to sleep.

The slumbers—they who sank that hour,
Without a struggling breath,
With whom the unbroke dream of life
So melted into death—
Say, turned they not, in deep amaze,
To seek the scene of time,
When first eternity's dread shore
Spread out in pomp sublime!

Wo, wo was with the living heart!
In many a smitten home.
Where, in the garniture of grief,
The weeping inmates come;
Round many a lonely hearth-stone,
Shall memory's touch restore
The image of the loved and lost,
Who must return no more.

The eye that saw that monster-mass
Come drifting darkly down;
Destruction in its wintry breast,
And on its vitreous crown,—
The ear that heard the deadly crash,
The thunder of the wave,
Can never lose the bitter trace,
But in the oblivious grave.

The rescued man, to listening groups,
Shall tell the fearful tale,
And mute affection clasp his hand,
And childhood's cheek be pale;
And while with quickened heart they bless
The great Deliverer's care,
The iceberg and the buried ship
Shall prompt their tearful prayer.

THE SOLDIER'S RETURN.

Seven or eight years ago, I was traveling between Berwick and Selkirk, and having started at the crowing of the cock, I had left Melrose before four in the afternoon.—On arriving at Abbotsford, I perceived a Highland soldier, apparently fatigued as myself, leaning upon a walking-stick, and gazing intensely on the fairy palace of the magician whose wand is since broken, but whose magic still remains. I am no particular disciple of Lavater's, yet the man carried his soul upon his face, and we were friends at the first glance. He wore a plain Highland bonnet, and a coarse grey great-coat buttoned to the throat. His dress bespoke him to belong only to the ranks; but there was a dignity in his manner, and a fire, a glowing language in his eyes worthy of a chieftain. His hight might exceed five feet nine, and his age be about thirty. The traces of manly beauty were still upon his cheeks; but the sun of a western hemisphere had tinged them with a sallow hue and imprinted untimely furrows.

Our conversation related chiefly to the classic scenery around us; and we had pleasantly journeyed together for two or three miles, when we arrived at a little sequestered burial ground by the way side, near which there was neither church nor dwelling. Its low wall was thinly covered with turf, and we sat down upon it to rest. My companion became silent and melancholy, and his eyes wandered anxiously among the graves.

"Here," said he, "sleeps one of my father's children, who died in infancy."

He picked up a small stone from the ground and throwing it gently about ten yards, "That," added he, "is the very spot. But thank God! no grave stone has been raised during my absence! It is a token I shall find my parents living—and," continued he, with a sigh, "may I also find their love! It is hard, sir, when the heart of a parent is turned against his own child."

He dropped his head upon his breast for a moment and was silent, and hastily raising his fore-finger to his eyes, seemed to dash away a solitary tear. Then turning to me, he continued:

"You may think, sir, this is weakness in a soldier; but a human heart beats beneath a red coat. My father, whose name was Campbell, and who was brought from Argleshire while young, is a wealthy farmer in this neighborhood. Twelve years ago, I loved a being as gentle as the light of the summer moon. We were children together, and she grew in beauty on my sight as the star of evening steals into the glory through the twilight. But she was poor and portionless, the daughter of a mean shepherd. Our attachment offended my father. He commanded me to leave her forever. I could not, and he turned me from his house. I wandered, I knew not, and I cared not, whither. But I will not detain you with my history. In my utmost need I met a serjeant of the forty-second, who was then upon the recruiting service, and in a few weeks I joined that regiment of proud hearts. I was at Brussels when the invitation to the wolf and the raven rang at midnight through the streets. It was the herald of a day of glory and of death. There were three Highland regiments of us—three joined in one—joined in rivalry, in love, and in purpose; and, thank fate! I was present when the, till then invincible, legions of the cuirassed Gauls rushed, with their war-horses neighing destruction, upon a kneeling phalanx of Scottish hearts, shielded only by the plaid and the bare bayonet from the unsheathed sabres of the united glory of France, as they poured like torrents of death on the waving plumes of our devoted band, to extirpate our names from the annals of Scottish heroism. Then, then in the hour of peril and of death, the genius of our country burst forth through the darkness of despair, like the flash of the young sun upon the earth when God said 'Let there be light!'—as the Scots Greys flying to our aid raised the electric shout "Scotland for ever;"—"Scotland for ever!" returned our tartaned clansmen; "Scotland for ever!" echod "Victory!" It was a moment of inspiration and of triumph. Forward dashed our highland heroes, fearless as their fathers, resistless as our mountain cataracts!—The proud steed and its mailed rider quailed at the shout. Home and its world of unutterable joy—yes, home and the fair bosom that would welcome its hero—glory and the spirit of our fathers—all rushed upon our imagination at the sound. It was a moment of poetry, of patriotism, and of inspiration—of poetry felt by all, except the wretch,

> Who never to himself hath said,
> This is my own, my native land!

Heavens!" added he, starting to his feet, and grasping his staff, as the enthusiasm of the past gushed back upon his soul, "to have joined in that shout was to live an eternity in the vibration of a pendulum."

In a few moments the animated soul that gave eloquence to his tongue, drew itself back into the chambers of humanity, and, resuming his seat upon the low wall he continued:

"I have left my old regiment with the prospect of promotion, and have since served in the West Indies; but I have heard nothing of my father—nothing of my mother—nothing of her I love!"

While he was yet speaking, the grave-digger, with a pickaxe and spade over his shoulder, entered the ground. He approached within a few yards of where we sat.—He measured off a narrow piece of earth—it incircled the little stone which the soldier had thrown to mark out the burial place of his family. Convulsion rushed over the features of my companion; he shivered—he grasped my arm—his lips quivered—his breathing became short and loud—the cold sweat trickled from his temples. He sprung over the wall—he rushed towards the spot.

"Man!" he exclaimed, in agony, "whose grave is that?"

"Hoot awa' wi' ye," said the grave-digger, starting back at his manner; "whatna way is that to gliff a body!—are ye daft?"

"Answer me," cried the soldier, seizing his hand; "whose grave—whose grave is that?"

"Mercy me!" replied the man of death, "ye are surely out o' your head—it's an auld body they ca'd Adam Campbell's grave—now are ye ony thing the wiser for spierin?"

"My father!" cried my comrade as I approached him; and, clasping his hands together, he bent his head upon my shoulder and wept aloud.

I will not dwell upon the painful scene. During his absence, adversity had given the fortunes of his father to the wind, and he had died in an humble cottage, unlamented and unnoticed by the friends of his prosperity.

At the request of my fellow-traveler, I accompanied him to the house of mourning. Two or three poor cottagers sat around the fire. The coffin, with the lid open, lay across the table near the window. A few white hairs fell over the withered face of the deceased, which seemed to indicate that he died from sorrow rather than from age. The son pressed his lips to his father's cheek. He groaned in spirit and was troubled. He raised his head in agony, and, with a voice almost inarticulate with grief, exclaimed inquiringly, "My mother?"

The wondering peasants started to their feet, and in silence pointed to a lowly bed. He hastened forward—he fell upon his knees by the bed-side.

"My mother!—O my mother!" he exclaimed, do not you, too, leave me!—Look at me—speak to me—I am your own son—your own Willie—have you too, forgotten me, mother?"

She, too, lay upon her death-bed, and the tide of life was fast ebbing; but the remembered voice of her beloved son drove it back for a moment. She opened her eyes—she attempted to raise her feeble hand, and it fell upon his head. She spake, but he alone knew the words she uttered; they seemed accents of mingled anguish, joy, and blessing. For several minutes he bent over the bed, and wept bitterly. He held her withered hand in his; he started; and, as we approached him, the hand he held was stiff and lifeless. He wept no longer—he gazed from the dead body of his father to that of his mother—his eyes wandered wildly from one to the other—he smote his hand upon his brow, and threw himself upon a chair, while misery transfixed him, as if a thunderbolt had entered his soul.

I will not give a description of the melancholy funeral and the solitary mourner. The father's obsequies were delayed, and the son laid both his parents in the same grave.

Several months passed away before I gained information respecting the sequel of my little story. After his parents were laid in the dust, William Campbell, with a sad and anxious heart, made inquiries after Jeanie Leslie, the object of his early affections, to whom we have already alluded. For several weeks his search was fruitless; but at length he learned that considerable property had been left to her father by a distant relative, and that he now resided somewhere in Dumfreisshire.

In the same garb which I have already described, the soldier set out on his journey. With little difficulty he discovered the house. It resembles such as are occupied by the higher class of farmers. The front door stood open. He knocked, but no answer. He proceeded along the passage—he heard voices in an apartment on his right—again he knocked, but was unheeded. He entered uninvited. A group were standing in the middle of the floor, and among them a minister, commencing the marriage service of the Church of Scotland. The bride hung her head sorrowfully, and tears were stealing down her cheeks—she was his own Jeanie Leslie.—The clergyman paused. The bride's father stepped forward angrily, and inquired—"What do ye want, sir?" but instantly recognising his features, he seized him by the breast, and, in a voice half-choked with passion, continued—"Sorrow ta' ye for a scoundrel! what's brought ye here—an' the mair especially at a time like this?—Get out o' my house, sir! I say, Willie Campbell, get out o' my house, an' never darken my door again wi' your ne'er-do-weel countenance."

A sudden shriek followed the mention of his name, and Jeanie Leslie fell into the arms of her bride-maid.

"Peace, Mr. Leslie!" said the soldier, pushing the old man aside; "since matters are thus, I will only stop to say farewell, for auld langsyne; you cannot deny me that?"

He passed towards the object of his young love. She spoke not—moved not—he took her hand, but she seemed unconcious of what he did; and as he again gazed upon her beautiful countenance, abscence became as a dream upon her face. The very language he had acquired during their seperation was laid aside. Nature had triumphed over art, and he addressed her in the accents in which he had first breathed his love and won her heart.

"Jeanie!" said he, pressing her hand between his, "its a sad thing to say FAREWEEL, but at present I maun say it. This is a scene I never expected to see; for oh, Jeanie, I could have trusted to your truth and to your love as the farmer trusts to seed time and harvest, and is not disappointed. I thought it was enough, when, hoping to find my father's forgiveness, I found them digging his grave, or, when I reached my mother's bedside, and found her only able to stretch out her hand and say—'Its my ain bairn. But I maun bid ye fareweel, Willie; fareweel already! it is sair, sair? But oh, may the blessing of the God o' Abraham—As she said this the death rattle grew louder and louder in her throat; for a moment her eyes became as bright as diamonds, I thought it was the immortal spark leaving the body; and before I could speak, the cold film of death passed them, and the tears I saw gathering in them, while she was speaking, rolled down the cheeks of a corpse. But oh, Jeanie, woman!—it was na trial like this; this is like separating the flesh from the bones, and burning the marrow; but ye maun be another's now; fareweel, fareweel!"

"No, no, my ain Willie!" she exclaimed, recovering from the agony of stupefaction—"my hand is still, and my heart has aye been yours—save me, Willie, save me" and she threw herself into his arms.

The bridegroom looked from one, to another, imploring them to commence an attack upon the intruder, but he looked in vain. The father again seized the old gray coat of the soldier, and almost rending it in twain, discovered underneath to the astonished company the richly laced uniform of a British officer. He dropped the fragment of the outer garment in wonder, and, at the same time dropping his wrath, exclaimed—"Mr. Campbell! or what are ye?—Will ye explain yousel'?"

A few words explained all. The bridegroom, a wealthy, middle aged man without a heart, left the house knashing his teeth. Badly as our military honors are confered, merit is not overlooked even in this country, where money is every thing, and the Scottish soldier had obtained the promotion he deserved.

Jeanie's joy was like a dream of heaven. In a few weeks she gave her hand to Capt. Campbell, of His Majesty's ——— regiment of infantry, to whom long years before she had given her young heart.

ANECDOTE OF A SLEEP WALKER.

During the revolutionary war, there was a gentleman of large property residing in Brooklyn, who was addicted to walking in his sleep; panic struck at the invasion of the enemy, he daily expected that his dwelling would be ransacked and pillaged. Under the influence of those fears, he arose one night, and taking a strong box, which, he never attempted to lift without assistance, he proceeded down stairs, furnished himself with a lanthorn & spade, and in a deep wooden glen about a quarter of a mile from his house he buried his treasure, carefully replacing the sods so as to create no suspicion of their having been removed. This done, he returned, undressed and went to bed. Next morning he was the first to discover the absence of his "strong box," without having the slightest remembrance of what had passed. Enraged at its loss, he immediately accused his domestics of the robbery, as no traces of violence were perceptible either on the locks or doors of his house, that could induce him to suspect strangers. Month after month elapsed, and still the mystery was not solved, and his family began to want the necessaries of life without the means of procuring them.

At that period of public calamity no money could be raised on real estate, and it was that season of the year when agriculture had ceased, which left him no means of earning a support for his family. To augment his misery, his only son lay confined by a violent fever, without any of those comforts of life which his situation demanded. The mind of the despairing father was strongly affected by this melancholy view of the future; his rest became more frequently broken, and he would often wander from room to room all night with hurried and unequal steps as if pursued by an enemy. His wife and daughter, who were accustomed to these nightly wanderings, never attempted to disturb him unless they were fearful some accident might befall him. In this case it was necessary to employ violent means to awaken him; upon which he would exhibit so much fear and distress, that they usually suffered him to gradually recover from the trance which was succeeded by drowsiness, after which he would sink into a light and natural sleep, which generally continued for several hours.

One night as his daughter was watching at the couch of her sick brother, she heard her father descend the stairs with a quick step, and immediately followed him. She perceived he had dressed himself, and was lighting a lantern at the hearth, after which he unbolted the door and looked out; he then returned to the kitchen, and taking the Lantern and Spade, he left the house. Alarmed at the circumstance which was not usual—though it sometimes occurred as above related without the knowledge of the family—she hastily threw on a cloak, and followed him to the woods, trembling with apprehensions of—she knew not what, both for herself and father.

Having gained the place where he had three months since buried the box, he set down the lantern, so as to reflect strongly upon the spot; he then removed the sods, and striking the spade against its iron cover he laughed wildly and exclaimed,—"My treasure is safe, and we shall be happy."—And shouldering his heavy burthen with the strength of Hercules, he stopped not as before to replace the sods of the earth, but snatching up his lantern, pursued his way directly home, to the joy of his daughter, who could hardly support herself from the fears she experienced, which were that he was about to dig his own grave, and either commit suicide, or murder some one of his defenceless family. Inexpressible, therefore, was her joy, on seeing him ascend the stairs and place the box in its former recess; after which, as usual, he retired to rest. His Wife and Daughter, however, too anxious to sleep themselves; the one sat impatiently watching the dawn of day, the other retired to the apartment of her suffering brother, to relieve his mind by the joyful event, and her hope of his immediate recovery.

When the gentleman arose in the morning, his wife observed the same gloom upon his countenance as he anxiously inquired about the health of his son, and expressed his sorrow at not being able to procure the comforts of life for his family which were so much needed. Finding him totally unconscious of all that had passed the preceding night, she watched the effect which the discovery of the box would have upon his mind: and as she expected, with an astonishment almost amounting to phrenzy, he exclaimed; "Who has done this? From whence came the BOX." Not until after he had listened to the evidence of his daughter, could he be convinced of the possibility of his performing such an act while asleep.

Suffice it to say, that now health, peace, and competence, were once more restored to his dwelling, and the result of this blessing had a salutary effect upon his mind; and although he still continued his midnight excursion, yet his friends, were gratified to find them less frequent than formerly and his future dreams also, to judge from his appearence, seemed to partake of the mild and serene character of his ever waking thoughts.

THE SORROW OF ESAU.

Faint and weary, the son of the patriarch came from his hunting tour. He had mused by the way on his sorry fortune. The spirit of enterprise had died in his bosom, and hope had left him to the peevishness of indolence and unsatisfied sensuality; when he met his brother preparing pottage of lentiles for his own refreshment. It was an evil hour for Esau; the slave of appetite, he counted not, at that moment, the worth of character, friends or prospect. Feigning himself ready to die with hunger, he quickly made a covenant with his brother, to part with all that was truly valuable on earth, for the means of gratifying his propensity to gluttony, but for this once. He was determined to have this one dinner, if he might starve in perdition as its penalty. The birthright so unceremoniously disposed of, was the covenant of heaven's favor. It was understood and seen by him, but despised by his infidel heart—God's covenant with Abraham, and his father, of the possession of the land of Canaan to them and their posterity, and the heavenly inheritance of which this was the earnest and representation. He could look on the fat valleys of Achor, the beauty of Zion, and Lebanon's towering cedars, and feel that the possession of Canaan's land was a worthless toy in comparison with a mess of pottage. But what was more, he could renounce his claims to the smiles of a heavenly paradise hereafter, for the gratification of an hour, that would work the bitterness of death.

But there was another day—the two youths had grown up to manhood. The venerable Isaac had come to the period of life when the infirmities of age admonished him that duties of this world should be arranged, that in his appointed hour, he might sleep with his fathers in peace. As high-priest of his household he was on a certain day to consecrate the heir of the sacred covenant. His eye rested on Esau, his first-born; he sent him away to gather preparations for the solemn ceremonial. But God suffered Jacob to come in for the old man's priestly blessing; the claim to which, he had long since purchased. He approved and sanctified the consecration; though he despised and abhorred the intervention of Rebecca's intrigues & falsehood as a means of bringing it about; as a fair representation of Jacob's proper claims was all that was needed.

Esau came back from the field, not faint and weary now, bearing a dish of savory meats, with which he fondly hoped to gain his father's blessing. But the birthright which had been sold for a mess of pottage, could not now be re-purchased by a dish of savory venison. He had chosen to indulge his sensual appetite once, and he might retain his savory meats now, in the blessing he had bartered away. As he learned the unwelcome truth, that the sacred ceremony was passed, and he himself was a servant among his kindred, "He stood before his father and cried with an exceeding great and bitter cry, Bless me, even me also, O my father." But he found no place of change in this transaction, though he sought it carefully with tears. The sale of his birth-right had as it were, turned the current of the stream to the pent-up vale, whose fair and beauteous landscape was lost in consequence beneath the accumulating waters. A small transaction, in itself, but mighty in its consequences.

In the case of Esau there is solemn instruction and warning to every youthful heart. For whoever, like Esau, chooses present gratification, regardless of future good, will in the end find that the consequences are pain and remorse, and inevitable.

There were no special judgments of God that visited Esau, no destroying flood as came on the ante-deluvian world, no storm of meteoric fire as descended on the plains of Sodom, no formal pouring out of the vials of divine wrath, but his cries and bitter tears were only the legitimate and natural result of his own conduct. It is as settled as the course of the sun in the firmament or any law of natnre, that the votaries of sensuality and lust shall find wretchedness in life, bitter in death, with accumulating horrors hovering beyond the dreadful valley. Vain regrets, nor cries, nor bitter tears, can never bring back to the sensualized soul, the heavenly peace of innocence and virtue. Another and a strange fire is enkindled on the heart's polluted altar—a fire that sends up the tainted cloud of heaven daring blasphemies to mock a Savior's love for a ruined world. But "the way of the transgressor is hard," and neither paint nor patches, princely robes, nor bold and reckless airs, can allay the wretched anguish of the guilty soul. Close on the path of transgression, comes the devouring scourge, which drinks up every pleasure of the heart, and leaves it to desolation and sorrow. And if there is a God in heaven or truth upon the earth, the votary of sensual pleasure will "mourn at the last, when his flesh and body are consumed," and cry, "How have I hated instruction and my heart hated reproof, and have not obeyed the voice of my teachers, nor inclined mine ear to them that instructed me." He will seek, but SEEK in vain like Esau, that the penalty of his transgression may be abated while he gives himself up to pursue the lust of his own heart. We say he will forever seek, for it is folly to presume that he who now stalks through the world, the living epitome of a walking and breathing hell, until he faulters under the ruinous blight of his iniquities, and hobbles down to a grave of wretched infamy, will in the resurrection find in himself a heart to be delighted with the songs of the redeemed in paradise. No, for even here, his habits of sin grow with his growth & strengthen with his strength, until he is bound, as it were, by the chains of sinful lust, and these shall drag him downwards through the dark ways of iniquity, to the chambers of eternal death. Neither in the eternal world will he find any place of repentance or change in God, though he may seek it carefully with tears. He may seek this repentance as did the rich man in hell, when he lifted up his eyes being in torments, and cried for a drop of water to cool his parched tongue. He may seek it with piteous groans or blasphemous howlings, but devils will mock his wretchedness and heaven would be to him the severest part of hell.

From the New York Observer.

THE SCOTCH SAILOR.

He came to New York as the mate of a vessel, in the fall of 1837, and took lodging in the newly opened "SAILOR'S HOME."—One evening, as he was on the point of going to the theatre, he was induced to change his purpose and go to the Mariner's Church. Here he was led to serious thoughts, and was soon hopefully converted to God. It was now said of the mate as of Saul of Tarsus, "Behold he prayeth."

Shortly after, he found it necessary to return to his native land, where he heard a voice, saying, Follow me. And like James the son of Zebedee, and John, his brother, he left his father—he forsook all, to follow Christ.

The winter following he spent at the "Home," in New York—now warning the wicked sailor to put the helm hard up and avoid ruin on a lee shore; now encouraging the despairing, and now exhorting all to trust and obey the Captain of Salvation. In the meantime, he was cultivating his own mind, preparatory to future usefulness.

In the spring, on hearing of a good manual labor school near Pittsburg, in Western Pennsylvania, thither he went, and prosecuted his studies six months, living solely on potatoes and meal; made into a kind of gruel, at an expense of half a dollar per week.

At the end of this time, he fell in with two missionaries bound to the Indian tribes on the head waters of the Missouri, and the mate now became in earnest the devoted missionary. If the white man was deaf to the invitations of mercy, he hoped to find the red man disposed to listen. About eight months he spent in this work; when sitting in a wigwam of the wilderness, his thoughts were turned towards his brethren of the sea. He resembled Nehemiah, sitting in Shushan palace, pitying and praying for his poor brethren in Jerusalem. His purpose was formed. "I go," said he "to labor for the spiritual and eternal good of the sailor."

Aided by a converted Indian, he felled a tree, dug him a canoe, and having bade his brethren an affectionate farewell, he put himself with his bag in it, and was soon paddling down the turbulent Missouri. In due time he arrived in St. Louis, thence by steamboat in New Orleans, and thence by ship to New York. Here he was welcomed again a brother beloved.

Not long after, he sailed for his native country; and before leaving ship he was instrumental in persuading all but the Captain to abandon the use of intoxicating liquors as a drink; and what is still better he was instrumental in the hopeful conversion of five or six of the crew. He is now in Dundee. What he is doing, will be seen in the following extract of a letter from him, dated London, and addressed to a gentleman in this city.

"Dear Brother in Christ—I take this favorable opportunity of writing you a few lines, and sending two small tracts which I have written and published for the benefit of the sailors.

"I am at present on a visit from Dundee to this place, to get encouragement in the work in which I am engaged; and to extend my labors for the sailor, whose salvation I long for.

"Much good has been done in Dundee. Since I arrived here, many souls have been brought to the enjoyment of the salvation of the Gospel. But the Lord has done it all."

More of the SCOTTISH SAILOR hereafter. In the meantime, has not he, and have not others reason to bless God forever, that his feet were directed to the "Sailor's Home" in New York; and that he was induced to go to the Sanctuary of the Lord instead of the theatre. J. S.

PRAYER.—Prayer is a first principle in devotion; and devotion is to the soul, what food is to the body—it nourishes and sustains every pious sentiment and every practical virtue. The body requires food at regular intervals—as morning, noon, and evening. The soul, too, needs a regular habit of devotion, as much as physical health depends upon the regularity in diet, exercise, &c. It is judicious, therfore, to appropriate, every day, certain portions of time to the exercise of prayer; this time may be easily given to such a purpose, if a person is so disposed. Who cannot find ten minutes of the morning of the evening, or in the course of a day, to be appropriated to purposes of devotion, if he will? Doubtless any one can find such time to be given to purposes of pleasure or of business—and is not the souls improvement entitled to as much attention as the gratification of the more animal passions.

As a preparation for a profitable prayer, the mind should engage itself for a time in serious meditation on the majesty and glory of the Creator, and on human dependance and sinfulness. This will make the person humble and inspire him with the right feelings to engage in the exercise with advantage to his own heart.

Formal prayer is apt to be heartless and mechanical. They who cannot pray without, may do well to pray by book, in the ideas and language of an other;—perhaps this is better than nothing; but one sincere tho't arising to God from the altar of the human heart in retirement, is worth more than the studied prayers ever composed and recited in christendom. Hence secret prayer has been commended by our Lord, of the most value and importance. Formal praying may be hypocritical; but secret prayer is always sincere. Then no motive can exist in the mind but what God approves. When thou prayest, enter into thy closet, and He who seeth in secret shall reward thee openly.—Gos. Ban.

PREACHING FOR ETERNITY.—A christian Pastor observed, a few days ago, that he had made up his mind to preach more for eternity. His purpose is commendable; if he executes it well, he will be a solemn preacher, an affectionate preacher, a faithful preacher, and effective preacher. O, ye servants of Jesus, do ye preach sufficiently for eternity? Do you prepare your sermons and deliver them with eternity in view? Have you the solemnity, the tenderness and pathos of one who, like Brainard, "dwells on the sides of eternity?" Do ye realize the eternity of GOD, of heaven, of hell, and press your hearers with considerations drawn from eternity? There are some very precious thoughts on this subject in a little work by Robert Phillips, entitled "Eternity Realized;" and there are still more and better in the New Testament.—Christ. Watch.

CHARITABLE PASTOR.—A Parisian, paying a visit to a curate in the middle of winter, remarked that he was living in a house with naked walls, and enquired why he had not got hangings to protect him from the rigor of the cold. The good Pastor showed him two little children that he had taken care of, and replied, "I had rather clothe these two children than my walls.

SAFE INVESTMENT.—A wealthy merchant having lost by one shipwreck to the value of £2,500, ordered his clerk to distribute £100 among his poor ministers and people; adding, that if his fortune was going by £2,500 at a lump, it was high time to make sure of some part of it before it was all gone.

TO-MORROW.—Who can tell how much is embraced in this expression? Though a few hours intervene between it and us—though it will soon commence its course—who is there that can read its single page, and pronounce the just character of its events?

TO-MORROW! Those who are gay may be sad. Those who are now walking the avenues of pleasure, led by the hand of hope, may be the subject of intense sorrow.—Prosperity may be also changed into adversity.

Those who are now on the mountain top, may be in the valley. That rosy cheek may be over-spread with paleness—the strong step may faulter. Death may soon over take us.

TO-MORROW! It may have entirely changed the course of our lives. It may form a new era in our existence. What we fear may not happen.

TO-MORROW! Away with anxiety.—Let us lean on Providence. This is a Being to whom all the distinctions of time are the same, and who is able to dispose every thing for our wise improvement.

From the Youth's Friend.

THE SINNER'S REFUGE.

A good clergyman called one day at a cottage which stood by the road-side, and asked the woman of the house if she could read; "for," said he, "I have a very nice little book, called 'Christ is my only refuge.' It has done me good, and I hope you will like it too." The woman said, "Sir, I cannot read; but I have a little boy nine years old, he can read; but he is ill in bed." "Well," said the clergyman, "give him this little book, and bid him read it; and I will call for it another day."

When he called again, the woman burst into tears. The clergyman said, "What is the matter? She answered, "Sir, my boy is dead, and has left you this half-penny."—"And did he read the little book?" "Sir, he was always reading it, till he could repeat it all. He did not talk of any thing else till he died; and to the last, he begged that I would not give you the book when you called; but thank you, and give you a half-penny for it. And he begged that I would learn to read that little book. Just before he died, he cried out, 'Mother, Christ is my only refuge—Christ is my only refuge. Do not part with the book; it will do for my father.'"

But what did he mean when he said, "Christ is my only refuge?" Perhaps another story will explain to you. There was a poor Irish girl who was taught to read in a school where the Bible was learned by heart. A lady who used to take care of her, and had been very kind to her, found her one Sunday reading her Bible; the lady said, "Where are you reading?" The girl told her she was reading the fifth chapter of Romans. "Why did you choose that chapter?" said the lady. "Oh, I delight in it much," said the little girl.—"Why do you like it so much?" "It suits me," she said; "see, is not this delightful?" and she pointed to the sixth verse; "For when we were yet without strength, in due time Christ died for the ungodly." And she said, I am indeed a sinner, and without strength; but here is a blessed remedy, "Christ died for the ungodly."

THE YOUNG BELIEVER.

At different periods within a few weeks, I called on a fellow traveler to eternity, and found the following variety of circumstances:

1. A total indifference to religion. No serious thoughts. No prayer. No hope. The admission of the importance of divine things, but worldliness reigning in unbroken power.

2. The sinner alarmed—burdened with a sense of sin—inquiring the way of salvation. The kind warning of a friend, had been the Spirit's instrument to break up the fatal slumber of sin. The tears fell fast—the recollections of a guilty life—then—then the deep sighs declared the anguish of remorse.

3. The joyful believer in Christ. "Light had risen in obscurity, and darkness had become as the noon-day." Faith had made the Savior welcome, and his forgiving love had removed the curses of a broken law, and silenced the accusing conscience. The before unknown consolations of religion now filled the soul, and gave their true aspect to the fading and empty pleasures of time. The fruits of the Spirit began to appear, and the graces of the renewed soul declared the work divine.

4. The next visit to this youthful believer, was on the bed of death! The destroying angel had made haste. But he could not bring consternation. He strode swiftly on, and brandished fearfully his devouring sword. But a mightier than he had gone before him. The Redeemer had spread the wings of his infinite power over the immortal spirit, and through his love reigning in the heart, it could utter the defiance—"Oh death, where is thy sting, Oh grave, where is thy victory?" With ebbing life, faith and hope faltered not. Our farewell was given with tears, and yet with the animating belief, that sweeter notes than those of earthly friendship, were about to make the new comer welcome to the everlasting kingdom of God.

In the same room where I had seen the first tears of grief over sin, and heard the first expressions of joyful hope in Christ, I took my station beside the pale and cold remains of the young disciple, to perform the simple funeral service. I had seen the stupor of unalarmed guilt—the anguish of the awakened sinner—the joy of hope—the triumphs of a dying saint. These various facts all existing in the compass of a few weeks, in the history of the deceased, made that a funeral solemnity of no common interest. How timely that visitation of the Spirit! Well that the saints struggled earnestly in prayer at the time they did. How timely too, that kind friend's affectionate admonition! What a destiny would have awaited that now departed spirit, had all these timely things been left undone!

It is sad for a pastor to bury a young disciple. Such are his peculiar joy. He glories in the blooming flower. He hopes so to train the plastic mind, that fruit abundant and mature shall repay his care, and comfort him amid the trials of his arduous work. Tender and strong are the ties that bind youthful saints to him, and pangs like those of a fond parent's smitten heart, are felt when he sees the untimely grave receive them. But they shall be his joy and his crown in the day of the Lord. The chief Shepherd wants them now, or he would not call them away. Submissively let them be resigned to the everlasting Arms. The now mourning pastor will renew his acquaintance with them in due time, where no ties are broken, and none ever say—farewell! PASCAL.

KINDRED BETWEEN GEOLOGY AND RELIGION.—"It has been as beautifully as truly said, that 'the undevout astronomer is mad.' The same remark might with equal force and justice be applied to the undevout geologist. Of all the absurdities ever started, none more extravagant can be named, than that the grand and far-reaching researches and discoveries of geology are hostile to the spirit of religion. They seem to us, on the very contrary, to lead the inquirer, step by step, into the more immediate presence of that tremendous Power, which could produce, and can alone account for the primitive convulsion of the globe, of which the proofs are graven in eternal characters, on the side of its bare and cloud-piercing mountains, or are wrought into the very substance of the strata that compose its surface, and which are also day by day, and hour by hour, at work, to feed the fires of the volcano, to pour forth its molten tides, or to compound the salubrious elements of the mineral fountains, which spring in a thousand valleys. In gazing at the starry heavens, all glorious as they are, we sink under the awe of their magnitude, the mystery of their secret and reciprocal influences, the bewildering conceptions of their distances. Sense and science are at war. The sparkling gem that glitters on the brow of night, is converted by science into a mighty orb—the source of light and heat, the centre of attraction, the sun of a system like our own. The beautiful planet which lingers in the western sky, when the sun has gone down, or heralds the approach of morning—whose mild and lovely beams seem to shed a spirit of tranquility, not unmixed with sadness, nor far removed from devotion, into the very heart of him who wanders forth in solitude to behold it—is in the contemplation of science a cloud-wrapt sphere; a world of rugged mountains and stormy deeps. We study, we reason, we calculate. We climb the giddy scaffold of induction, up to the very stars. We borrow the wings of the boldest analysis, and flee to the uppermost parts of creation, and then shutting our eyes on the radiant points that twinkle in the vaults of night, the well constructed mind sees opening before, in mental vision, the stupendous mechanism of the heavens. Its planets swell into worlds. Its crowded stars recede, expand, become central suns, and we hear the rush of the mighty orbs that circle round them. The bands of Orion are loosed, and the sparkling rays which cross each other on his belt, are resolved into floods of light, streaming from system to system, across the illimitable pathway of the outer heavens. The conclusions which we reach, are oppressively grand & sublime: the imagination sinks under them; the truth is too vast, too remote from the premises, from which it is deducted; and man, poor, frail man, sinks back to the earth, and sighs to worship again, with the innocence of a child, or Chaldean shepherd, the quiet and beautiful stars as he sees them in the simplicity of sense."—Edward Everett.

PRAY WITHOUT CEASING.—A number of ministers were assembled for the discussion of difficult questions, and among others it was asked, "How the command to pray without ceasing could be complied with?"—Various suppositions were started, and at length one of the number was appointed to write upon it, and read it at the next meeting, which being overheard by a plain, sensible girl, she exclaimed, "What! a whole month wanted to tell the meaning of that text? It is one of the easiest and best texts in the Bible." "Well," said an old minister, "Mary, what can you understand about it? Let us know how you understand it. Can you pray all the time?" "O yes sir." What, when you have so many things to do? "Why sir, the more I have to do the more I can pray." Indeed! well Mary do let us know how it is, for most people think otherwise. "Well sir," said the girl, "when I first open my eyes in the morning, I pray, Lord open the eyes of my understanding; and while I am dressing, I pray that I may be clothed with the robe of righteousness; and when I have washed me, I ask for the washing of regeneration; and as I begin to work I pray that I may have strength equal to my day. When I begin to kindle up the fire I pray that God's work may revive in my soul, and as I sweep out the house, I pray that my heart may be cleansed from all its impurities; and while preparing and partaking of breakfast, I desire to be fed with the hidden manna and the sincere milk of the word; and as I am busy with the little children I look up to God as my Father, and pray for the spirit of adoption that I may be his child, and so on all day. Every thing I do furnishes me with a thought for prayer." "Enough, enough," cried the old divine, "these things are revealed to babes, and hidden from the wise and prudent Go on Mary, pray without ceasing. And as for us, my brethren, let us bless the Lord for this exposition, and remember that he has said the meek will he guide in judgment."

The essay, as a matter of course, was not considered necessary after this little event occurred.

GOD IS LOVE.—God is Love: All his perfections and proceedures are but so many modifications of his love. What is his omnipotence but the arm of his love? What is his omniscience but the medium through which he contemplates the object of his love? What is his wisdom but the scheme of his love? What are the offers of the gospel, but the invitations of his love?—What is the threatenings of the law, but the warnings of his love? They are the hoarse voice of his love, saying: "Man! do thyself no harm!" They are a fence thrown around the pit of perdition, to prevent rash men from running into ruin. What was the incarnation of our Savior but the richest illustrations of his love? What were the miracles of Christ but the condescensions of his love? What were the sighs, of Christ but the breath of his love? What were the prayers of Christ but the pleadings of his love? What were the tears of Christ but dew-dops of his love? What is this earth but the theatre for the display of his love? What is heaven but the Alps of his mercy, from whose summits, his blessings flow down, in a thousand streams, descend to the water and refresh his Church Triumpant, situated at its base?—Dr. Waugh.

Let secret prayer by yourself alone be constantly performed, before the work of the day be undertaken. It is much better to go from prayer, to business, than from business to prayer, in regard to the mind's freedom from distracting thoughts. Because, also, if the world gets the start of religion in the morning, 'tis hard for religion to overtake the world all the day after.—Burkitt.

JESUS CHRIST is the treasure hid in the GOSPEL, the pearl of great price. He is the Sun in the firmament of the Scriptures, the scource of everlasting life, a spring full of the Water of Life, a Hive of Sweetness, a Magazine of Riches, a River of eternal pleasure.—Dyer.

THE MIGHTY PRINCE.

More than a 1800 years since, a GREAT PRINCE appeared in the world. His coming had been expected for many years, and so universal was the expectation that he was named "THE DESIRE OF ALL NATIONS." At his birth, there was not the noise which frequently happens when a prince is born. It was peaceful; but still there were some strange things seen and heard, when he was announced. There were shepherds watching their flocks in the plains by night, and "lo! the angel of the Lord came upon them, and they were sore afraid." And who can wonder that they were overtaken with such fear? They were not looking for an event of this kind. The night was wrapped in stillness; the moon and stars were throwing from on high their gentle and beautiful lustre, and as these watchmen gazed around, above and beneath them; all, all was a Sabbath—a rest to wearied nature. Little did they anticipate that on that night, a visiter from heaven should present himself to them.—A marvelous light first dazzled their eyes, and when they looked above they saw no other than the "angel of the Lord."—There was no need, however, for their fear. He had good news from the palace in heaven, and he exclaimed, "Behold I bring you good tidings of great joy, which shall be to all people, for unto you is born this day a Savior, and so soon as he had uttered his message, a multitude of angels appeared, and joined him in praising God. I know not that sweeter music was ever heard upon earth—it was a song of joy and it was sung by beings who are holy and blessed.

After they had gone away into heaven, the shepherds hastened to Bethlehem, and were astonished to find that all was truth. A Prince had been born, and worshipped him. Sometime after this, his mother went to the temple, and took the babe in her arms; many saw the child; but there was one good old man there who blessed God that he had lived to see that day, and that he was then willing to die. I cannot mention all the striking things in his history—they would fill many volumes. But you will ask perhaps, did this Prince do any remarkable deeds? Oh yes!—He spent no day without doing good to man! He cured the blind by touching their eyes—he made the lame to walk by lifting them up—and the dead to rise, by uttering a word. But something more wonderful still,—He went about telling all men that he had come into the world to save them from misery and punishment, for they had all sinned against the LIVING GOD. He was to save them by dying for them, and after death he was to rise again, and to ascend to heaven with all power in his hand, and with salvation for all men.

The name of this Prince is CHRIST JESUS.—He is "mighty to save;" and every child who reads this, may come to him and receive his blessing. I have said that he is called a Prince—a prince has power; but he is the "Prince of Peace;" therefore his power will be employed for the diffusion of peace.

The last command he gave to his followers was "Go ye and teach all nations." No Nation is to be forgotten; but to every nation Jew or Gentile, wise or unwise, white or black, the missionaries are to be sent. P. S.

THE USE OF THE BIBLE.

A little boy had often amused himself by looking over the pictures of a large Bible; and his mother one day said to him, "John do you know the use of the Bible?" He said, "no mother!" "Then, John, be sure you ask your father;" was the advice which his mother gave him. Soon afterwards, when his father came home, John ran up to him, and said, "I should like to know, father, what is the use of the Bible?" His father said, "I'll tell you another time, John." The boy appeared disappointed, and walked away, wondering why his father did not answer him the question directly.

A few days after, the father took his son to a house where was a woman very ill in bed, and began to talk to the poor afflicted woman, who said that she had suffered a great deal of pain, but hoped that she was resigned to the will of God. "Do you think," said the father, "that God does right to permit you to feel so much pain?" "Oh, yes," answered the woman, "for God is my Heavenly Father, who loves me; and I am sure that one who loves me so much, would not permit me to suffer as I do, if it were not for my good." He then said "how is it that you find your sufferings do you good?" she replied, "my sufferings are good for my soul; they make me more humble, more patient; they make me feel the value of the Savior more, and they make me pray more, and I am sure all this is good for me." John had been very attentive at this conversation, and the tears stood in his eyes while the afflicted woman was talking. His father looked at him, and then said to the woman, "My good woman, can you tell me the use of the Bible? In an instant, John cast his eyes towards the woman, while his face showed that he was extremely eager to hear her answer. The woman, with a stronger voice than before, said, "Oh, sir, the Bible has seen my comfort in my affliction." "There John," said his father, "now you know "the use of the Bible:" it can give us comfort when we most need it."

De Ruyter, September 29, 1841.

"This is my commandment, that ye love one another, as I have loved you." John xv. 12.

The establishment of the Gospel Church introduced a new relation among men, and by consequence required new laws to govern men in that relation. The relation that men were in to God, as the author and giver of all good, gave rise to the law that God should be loved with all the heart, soul, might, mind and strength. The relation of men to each other, being mutually dependent on each other, gave rise to the commandment to "love thy neighbor as thyself." And the new relation formed by the Gospel, viz:—a spiritual relation, all being members of the mystical body of Christ, gave rise to the command at the head of this article.

These commands being founded on the nature of existing relations, must necessarily be in full force so long as those relatives exist. God, so long as he is the author of all that men enjoy, and as long as he sustains the character of "Creator, preserver, and benefactor" of men, does, from the nature of this, rightly demand that all men should love him with all their powers. And, so long as men are mutually dependent upon each other, the law must be in full force to love thy neighbor as thyself.—So it must be with those also who sustain the character of Christians, and are members of Christ's kingdom. They are born by a new birth. They have new hopes and new objects of pursuit. They are bound together for new purposes; consequently, this new command must remain with all its force so long as this new relation continues. If it is a sin not to love God according to his commandments,—if it is a sin not to love ones neighbor as himself, then it is a sin not to love one another as Christ has first loved us. And men are as guilty in the sight of God for not loving the members of Christ's Church, as he first loved them, as they are for not loving God with all the heart, or for invading their neighbor's rights. Either of these would be a violation of a moral precept, and the offender must necessarily incur the displeasure of the divine being who instituted those relations, and gave laws to govern men in them.

This command may properly be considered a test of discipleship. For every one that is born of God loveth his brother.—"By this we know that we have passed from death unto life, because we love the brethren." "If a man say, I love God, and hateth his brother, he is a liar." Love is the governing principle of the Gospel, and he who does not love his brother as Christ first loved him, has but poor, if any claims to discipleship.

The manner of love that the Savior requires is such as he first exercised to his disciples. If it is not possible to love the children of God with such amazing love as the Savior exercised, yet it is possible to love them with the same kind of love, and to the extent of human ability. For an exhibition of the Saviour's love we have but to refer to his benevolent acts, such as healing the diseased, and restoring comfort and peace to all. Witness his emotions at the grave of Lazarus, and at the well of Sychar. And mark his untiring efforts to teach right principles.

All who partake of his spirit will be more ready to forgive than to inflict an injury. And if a brother err, they will "restore him in a spirit of meekness, considering themselves lest they also be tempted." The command will by no means justify any revengeful or retaliatory action. It forbids every thing that savors of a worldly or selfish spirit, and strictly requires all to labor for the spiritual benefit of all men.

The exercise of this holy feeling would perfectly unite all together with an indissoluble band—would prevent all discord in the church of God, and show forth the Gospel in such an attractive form, as to induce men to leave their sins and love each other as Christ first loved them.

Seventh-day Baptist History.

The following resolution was passed at the session of the General Conference:—

"Resolved, That it is a matter of interest to the denomination to have a faithful history of the same, from its earliest records to the present time."

Many in the denomination have felt the need of such a work, and have anxiously desired that it might be published. It is a well known fact that our churches have not all sprung from the same origin, some of them having sprung up in regions remote from the others, without the slightest knowledge of each other for years. The history of some churches can be traced back to individuals who embraced the sentiments we now hold under the most discouraging circumstances. For instance, the church on "Lost Creek, Va." was founded by the descendants of one individual who stood alone, with one exception, in the observance of the Sabbath, in Maryland, in its earliest settlement. A faithful history of the denomination would exhibit the origin of Seventh-day Baptists in different places, and the circumstances attending them. In this development, the operation of truth on the mind will be most clearly seen, and the sacrifices that were made for the love of it. We do not believe there is a denomination extant that has necessarily suffered and sacrificed so much, on account of their conscientious views, as ours. And instead of wondering that they are so few after so great a lapse of time, since their settlement in this country, we wonder that they have not, ere this, become extinct. And we can account for their existence now only from the fact, that God will not suffer those to be destroyed that love and obey his truth. Worldly disadvantage has always been their inheritance. Different parts of the denomination are as yet comparatively ignorant of each other.—The history would serve to bind the different portions to each other, and we doubt not but the single exhibition of the singular interposition of the divine favor, would tend greatly to strengthen our hands in the work of promulgating the truths of the Bible that characterize us.

The history would be important in many ways, and we believe that the interests of the denomination require it. By these remarks we are not to be understood as depreciating the work of this kind already extant. That was written under discouraging circumstances, and is very limited in its circulation.

The 'Madison County Abolitionist,'

Published by L. MYRICK, and edited by JAMES C. JACKSON, hails us from Cazenovia. As its name indicates it will advocate the Abolition of Slavery. We of course wish the publisher the best success in the righteous cause of impartial heaven-imparted liberty. And we most devoutly wish the time hastened when "sweet Liberty" shall be extended to all the race of man. So far as the paper assumes a political character, we have nothing to say of it. We must be indulged in leaving "Political Action," and "Politics" to others, and content ourself with doing all we can by moral suasion to extend the blessings of morality and religion.

The Methodist Reformer.

The "Fayetteville Luminary" comes to us with a new name this week. It is now called the "Methodist Reformer," published under the patronage of the seceding Methodist Association, and edited by WESLEY BAILEY. The "Reformer" is a spirited sheet, and advocates the sentiments of the Reformed Methodists, taking high ground in Temperance, Anti-Slavery, and other Benevolent Institutions.

"If I drink Liquor you must not."

The drunkard sometimes, when his reason returns to him, has sufficient interest in the sobriety of his friends to warn them of the fatal draught; but as for himself he feels so wedded to his drams that all the ties of nature must be sundered; all the responsibilities of the citizen, the husband, the parent must be dissolved, because he will not cast away the liquid monster that is destroying his body and soul. But suppose, that in his sober moments, he feels a deep solicitude that his children may not become drunkards like himself, and exhort "If I drink, you must not," of what avail will be his exhortation, till by abstaining entirely from his cups he gives evidence that the language of his lips is the sentiments of his heart?—Now we suggest to our friend, who could exhort his children not to drink if he did, that if he will do them any good, he must do it by abstaining himself from all that can intoxicate, and walk before his children erect, with all the feelings of a man and a parent, and show by his example, that it is more honorable for a man, made in the image of God, to exercise all the ennobling qualities of his nature for the benefit of his children and society than to debase himself below the brutes, and wallow in the mire and dirt.

Congressional.

We have occupied a large portion of our columns during the Extra session of Congress, with the proceedings of that body.—We have done this because we supposed our readers felt a deep interest in them. We this week give the conclusion of the whole, and the title of the several Acts passed. In the future we shall be able to give our news department a greater variety.

The rumor that Mr. Fox had demanded his passports proves to be without foundation.

☞ The Conference Minutes are ready for distribution this week.

Last year there were over 700 groggeries licensed in Baltimore, this year, so far only 46.

The Temperance Cause.

MR. EDITOR:—Amid the many great lights which have burst forth in the Temperance world, at the present day, has arisen a star in Auburn, which is not hid even at this noon-day of tee-totalism.

But a few months since, in our village, the cause of Temperance took a new and happy turn. The drunkards themselves took the matter in hand. At first but two or three, they grew to a dozen reformed drunkards, who formed themselves into a Washington Temperance Reform Society. Some of them were grog-sellers. Their numbers increased; they became able to send out some of their number as missionaries, to lecture in adjoining towns and counties, and thereby accomplished much good. Their number has now increased to 50 or upwards, and but very few are left as way-marks to a drunkard's grave.—Even these are made use of as examples and arguments against themselves, and Intemperance himself begins to hide his diminished head—destined ere long to be entirely concealed from our unburdened vision.

On Thursday evening last our village was visited by Messrs. Pollard and Wright, reformed drunkards from Baltimore. They commenced operations at that time in the Methodist church, making speeches, giving experiences, circulating pledges, &c. Since that time they have preached cold water in the streets, on our public corners, in churches, and in the grog-shops themselves. They have been sots; their wives have wept and their children cried for bread; but they have been saved, others have been rescued, some of them from the gate of the drunkard's sepulchre, and the wives cease to weep and the children to cry in vain for food. I say a new star has arisen in our horizon—a star of promise to the more than widowed wife, and a polar-star of safety to the twice-dead inebriate. Too long had the blinded friends of Temperance contended only for the rising generation. Too long had they passed by the immediate sufferer. "The drunkard cannot be saved," was their motto. "He will soon die and be out of the way," said they: and he did die!—died without a friendly arm to save,—without a friendly voice to whisper the possibility of reform! But it has in a measure changed; the aggrieved have themselves entered the field; the injured friends themselves have become the worst enemies of Alcohol. And they must conquer. But it must be done by exertion and untiring effort. The co-operation of temperate men must be had; societies must be organized; drunkards must be encouraged to reform. Moderate drinkers must cease to become drunkards. It is a known fact that all drunkards were first but moderate drinkers, and none calculated to be more. Look at them even now; they are as drunk as the worst—in proportion to the Alcohol they have in them, and the sin is not in drunkenness, the effect, but in drinking, the cause. Let a man drink one-fourth brandy enough to make him drunk, and he is one-fourth drunk.

Too often do we pass the forsaken sot with a feeling of disgust and salute the manufacturer of drunkards. Is this right? Is it consistent? Should not the victims of the grog-sellers be pitied and respected more than the evil seducers of sober men? Why do grog-sellers in groceries and "Inns," throughout our country, feel ashamed of their unholy traffic? It is true that they do. No grog-seller in the land is found to come out and preach in favor of drunkenness; the argument is all on one side. The influence of the community is in favor of Temperance. Rum-sellers must be put to the blush. In our village the tavern-keepers begin to hide their bottles; they make folding doors to shut up in front of their bottles of liquor. But drunkards are made yet. And the rum-seller does it.

In a financial point of view, the Temperance reformation will do much for the laboring class of community. Mr. Pollard says, "When I was a drunkard, my family wanted bread; it was "hard times" with them: now they have plenty." It may be so with all. Says this gentleman, "It is perfectly ridiculous for you to send your Mechanics to Albany, to petition the Legislature to stop a few hundred State Prison convicts from making shoes and chairs, &c., while more men, unheeded, are every twenty-four hours pouring a pair of shoes down their throats, and every now and then a chair!"

We have here five Temperance Societies. Active efforts had been made to get signers to the tee-total pledge for some time past, but still these reformers from Baltimore have got between 3 and 400 signatures. And they have exerted a most happy influence in favor of cold water principles. May the blessing of God be with them, and may many drunkards follow the good example which they have set.

Auburn, Sept. 22, 1841. S.

For the Register.

"Oh! Oh! I Dread to be alone."

Such was the exclamation of a poor distressed man, who was suffering the agony of the delirium tremens.

It was but a few days since that I visited him, and as I was about leaving him, there being no one else in the room, he exclaimed, "Oh! Oh! I dread to be alone!"

The words I can write, but the frightfully piteous tone of voice with which they were uttered, can never be written.

I attempted to say something for his benefit; but I felt that I needed one of the "Reformed Drunkards" to help me.

The physician entered the room, and the affrighted and tormented man turned from me to him, pleading, "O Doctor!—can't you help me? I shall die!"

He recovered from that distress; but instead of reform, it is to be feared that his resolve is, "I will seek it yet again."

And yet, for the public good, we, the people, continue to license the sale of ardent spirits as a beverage! When shall we arise and wipe off the disgrace?

WASHINGTON CORRESPONDENCE.

Thursday, Sept. 9.

The President's Veto Message accompanying the return of the 'Fiscal Corporation' Bill was received in the House of Representatives to-day at 12 o'clock, and immediately read by the Clerk, in the presence of a dense crowd, who had anticipated it, and were awaiting its arrival with anxious interest. Most of the Senators were present, they having taken a recess for that purpose, and proceeded en masse to the Representative Hall. After its reading,

Mr. Morrow moved that it be laid on the table, printed, and made the subject of consideration to-morrow, at twelve o'clock; which was carried. An interesting and exciting debate is then expected, as it is known that several wish to speak, and it being the time appointed by Mr. Botts to prove the President's 'treachery to his party and principles.'

But a scene of more interest than this was witnessed, which, taken in connection with the reception of the Veto, will render this a memorable day, and attach a disgrace to the character of the Representatives of the American people. That Hall devoted to the high purpose of legislation for a proud and independent people, was converted into a theatre for the display of malignant feelings, which terminated in blows, and might have proceeded farther, had it not been immediately checked, between two Representatives—Messrs. Wise and Stanly. The difficulty originated in a discussion on the subject of appropriation for the salary of a Charge at Naples. Both these gentlemen were in favor of it, and Mr. S., in reference to Mr. W.'s views, referred to his opinion last winter in favor of reducing or entirely rejecting the appropriation for this service at Mexico, seeming to charge him with inconsistency.

Mr. Wise replied to this, and considered the allusion little and contemptible. Mr. Stanly said the gentleman had on various occasions shown himself little and contemptible. The debate was here continued by others, and Mr. Wise left his seat and went to that of Mr. Stanly, whither, after a moment's conversation between, a rush of members ensued, and a scuffle took place, creating a general scramble and excitement, which had entirely checked all legislative business, and which the cries of "order," "order," and all the efforts of the Speaker, were of no avail in stopping, and amid which the first that I could distinguish was the appearance of a personal contest between Messrs. Wm. O. Butler of Ky., and Arnold of Tennessee, which those near were endeavoring to restrain.

After some moments of this tremendous and angry confusion, the House having been called to order, Mr. Wise rose and asked the pardon of the House. He had been guilty, he said, of a violation of its rules. He had left his seat and gone to the gentleman from North Carolina, for the purpose of expostulating with him, and whilst there, as a word had been applied to him, under which neither here nor elsewhere he could restrain his passions, whatever might be the consequences, he had in a moment of excitement struck the gentleman; and he now asked forgiveness of the House, and would submit to any punishment it might see fit to inflict, under its rules.

Mr. Stanly said he did not ask pardon of the House, for if he had violated its rules he would resign or submit to its punishment. He then repeated the circumstances—the honorable Member from Virginia had not come to expostulate with him, but to dictate and warn. He (Mr. S.) had told him that he would hear none of it—the word 'contemptible' had been applied to him by Mr. W., and he had in return called Mr. W. 'a liar.' Mr. W. then undertook to strike him, but he did not accomplish it, and if the House had not interfered he (Mr. S.) would have given the gentleman a severer flogging even than he deserved.

[This is the substance, though not the exact words.]

After this explanation between the two members, Mr. Ingersoll moved a resolution to appoint a Select Committee to inquire into the circumstances of the difficulty between Messrs. Stanly and Wise, and report what punishment is proper.

Mr. Mason moved to modify it, so as to inquire into the circumstances of the assault of Mr. Wise on Mr. Stanly. The previous question having been moved, this amendment was cut off. Mr. L. W. Andrews moved to lay this on the table, and gave notice that, were this motion carried, he should introduce a resolution for the immediate expulsion of Mr. Wise from the House, for this breach of order. A motion was here made to adjourn, which was taken by Yeas and Nays, and lost by a large vote. The motion to lay on the table failed. Mr. Irwin of Pa., moved that the Committee also inquire how many other assaults had been made on the floor within the last thirty minutes. He had seen several.—The amendment was not in order, and the resolution appointing a Committee of seven, was adopted by a large vote.

This is but a faint sketch of the scene that took place to-day, on as exalted a platform as the floor of the Hall of Representatives; let a moral community make its own comments.

The Revenue Bill was taken up to-day, the vote on "salt," "tea," "coffee," and "iron," of yesterday, was reconsidered, and the amendments of the Senate agreed to, except that providing that no duty shall exceed 20 per cent. ad valorem; which was stricken out and a provision made that nothing in the act shall interfere with the distribution act. "Tea and coffee" were excepted from duty by a vote of 178 to 7.

The Diplomatic Appropriation Bill as amended by the Senate was agreed to, except the proposition to strike out the salary of Charge at Naples; this was rejected by a vote of 51 to 89.

The Senate have been in Executive Session to-day.

Friday, Sept. 10.

The Senate receded from its amendment to the Diplomatic Appropriation Bill (striking out the item for a Charge at Naples,) and the other differences were harmonized, and the bill passed.

On motion of Mr. Bayard, the Senate resolved hereafter to employ a corps of Reporters, not exceeding five in number, to report fully and faithfully the Proceedings and Debates of that body, for general publication.

A Joint Resolution to adjourn on Monday having been received from the House, Mr. Tallmadge objected to its second reading now, and Mr. Preston objected to its passage, urging that Congress ought before adjourning to make some provision for the safe-keeping of the Public Money in the State Banks, since a National Bank seemed now out of the question. After some farther remarks by Messrs. Wright, King, Buchanan, Walker and Bayard, the resolution was laid on the table till to-morrow, by 29 to 16.

Mr. Clay, from the Committee of Conference on the Revenue bill, reported the following substitute for the differing twenty per cent. provisions of the two Houses, which was adopted:

Provided, That if, in virtue of this section, any duties exceeding the rate of 20 per centum, ad valorem, shall be levied prior to the 30th of June, 1842, the same shall not in any wise affect the disposition of the proceeds of the public lands, as provided for by an act passed at the present Session of Congress: And provided, further, That no duty higher than 20 per cent., ad valorem, in virtue of said section, shall be levied and paid on any manufactured article.

The Senate now went into Executive Session, and so remained until its adjournment.

In the House, the Speaker announced the Committee on the fracas between Messrs. Wise and Stanly, as follows:

Messrs. Ingersoll, of Pa., Morrow of O., Everett of Vt., Caruthers of Tenn., Saltonstall of Mass., Holmes of S. C., and Ferris of N. Y.

Mr. Everett asked to be excused, but was not.

The Revenue bill having been returned from the Senate with a disagreement, the House insisted, (89 to 76), and asked a conference. Agreed to: [Messrs. Clay, Woodbury and Miller, on the part of the Senate, Fillmore, and others on the part of the House, were the Conferees.] The compromise above given was afterwards reported and adopted.

So the Revenue Bill was passed.

Mr. Yorke of N. J., moved that Congress do adjourn at 11 o'clock on Monday. Mr. Atherton of N. H. suggested "to-morrow." Overruled, and the original resolution passed.

The resolution from the Senate directing the use of American Water-Rotted Hemp in the Navy was passed.

Mr. Dawson of Ga., rose to state that the difference between Messrs. Wise and Stanly, through the interposition of friends, had been entirely adjusted.

Mr. McKay of N. C. moved that the Postmaster General be required to ascertain and report, as nearly as may be, the number of letters and printed sheets passing through the Post Office in one month, designating those paid, free, franked by Members of Congress, dead letters, &c. &c. Adopted.

Mr. Owsley of Ky., offered a joint resolution proposing to so amend the Constitution that no President shall be re-eligible to that office; and that in case of a Presidential Veto, a clear majority of all the Members elected to the House in which the bill originated shall be sufficient to pass it into a law, in spite of the President's objections.

The House refused to suspend the rule in favor of this Resolution: Yeas 87, (not two-thirds,) Nays 81.

Mr. A. V. Brown proposed a similar resolution, affecting the re-election of the President only. Yeas 99, Nays 58; two thirds being required, the Rule was not suspended.

The Bank Veto.—The hour of 12 having now arrived, the Special Order of the Day was announced, being the bill to incorporate the Fiscal Corporation, which had been returned with objections by the President.

[Mr. Botts, of Va., opened the debate in a lengthy and spirited speech, in opposition to the views of the President, and was followed by Mr. Gilmer, of Va., who spoke in vindication of the President.]

Mr. Proffit of Ind., followed in an animated and unqualified defense of the course of the President.

Mr. Lane of Ind., followed in sweeping condemnation of the Veto.

Mr. S. Mason of Ohio, spoke an hour on the same side.

Mr. I. D. Jones of Md., followed in a speech in favor of forbearance and conciliation, for which we have no room this morning.

Mr. Thompson of Ia. having spoken in opposition to the Veto, Mr. Gamble of Ga. moved the Previous Question, which prevailed, and the question was stated—"Shall this bill pass, notwithstanding the President's objections?" and decided by Yeas and Nays as follows: Yeas 103, Nays 80.

Two-thirds of the Members voting not having voted in the affirmative, the bill was defeated.

Some farther action was had on various bills of lesser interest, and then the House adjourned.

Saturday, Sept. 11.

The change of the Cabinet, which has been so fruitful a theme of discourse and conjecture for some time past, has at length taken place. The Secretaries of the Treasury, of War, of the Navy, the Attorney General, and the Postmaster General, have tendered their resignations to the President. It was believed that Mr. Granger would continue at the arduous post of duty, the discharge of which he has so faithfully and untiringly prosecuted; and it was not till this afternoon, and at the advice and solicitation of the New-York Whig Delegation, that he resigned. To fill these vacancies,

The following nominations have been made to the Senate:

Walter Forward (Whig,) of Pa., Secretary of the Treasury; John McLean (State Rights,) of Ohio, Secretary of War; A. P. Upshur (State Rights,) of Va., Secretary of the Navy; Hugh S. Legare (Conservative,) of South Carolina, Attorney General.

For Post-Master General, several are rumored, viz: C. A. Wickliffe, of Ky., Elisha Whittlesey and Thomas Corwin of Ohio.

It is not known that the Senate have acted on any of them.

The lines of party—Administration and anti-Administration, seem rapidly to be forming. A new paper, the Whig Journal, it is advertised, is to be established here, the need of which the Albany Evening Journal of your State predicates on the assumption that the Madisonian has left the Whig ranks, in which it has been so conspicuous and able an agent, and to which the Journal bids farewell, charging it with a desertion of its former friends, Messrs. Tallmadge and J. C. Clark, and union with Messrs. Gilmer, Mallory, &c. It is here said that the Administration will make the Madisonian its sole organ at the seat of Government, and that it is to become a daily paper.

Both Houses of Congress have completed their legislative business, and adopted a resolution to adjourn on Monday.

The House of Representatives have to-day been occupied on the case of the affray between Messrs. Wise and Stanly, which occurred day before yesterday. Mr. Ingersoll, Chairman of the Select Committee, made a report, setting forth, first, the facts of the case, which very nearly coincided, and resolving that they be entered on the Journal "as a reprimand;" and providing that hereafter when insulting words are applied by one member to another, a fine of $100 shall be inflicted, and when an assault is made, the Speaker shall introduce a resolution for the expulsion of the offending member, and the House shall immediately act on it.

Much debate ensued on this Report, and on the circumstances of this case, in which the greater part, if not the entire blame, was, with scarcely a single exception, thrown on Mr. Wise, who commenced the assault. The Report was objected to as indefinite, and as inculpating both parties; and motions were made to amend it, by referring exclusively to the assailant, Mr. Wise.

Mr. Wise acknowledged his offense, and his willingness to submit to any judgment the House might inflict. He was willing to be tried by them, except the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. Adams.)

Mr. Adams disclaimed all enmity towards Mr. Wise, and further declared that he would vote no censure on him.

Mr. Stanly said the report was equivocal in its character. He had inquired of the Chairman whether it intended to throw any censure on him, (Mr. S.) The Chairman had replied that he did not know. He (Mr. S.,) hoped that it would not be adopted to go forth to the country in this form. If it was thought by one member of this body that his course had been blameworthy, he would resign his seat, and never appear as a Whig on that floor, except his stains had been purged away by re-election.

Mr. Warren of Ga., moved to amend the report so as to apply exclusively to Mr. Wise, and that he be expelled from the House.

After several amendments proposed and a protracted debate, the report was recommitted, with instructions to report that Hon. H. A. Wise, having assailed Hon. Edward Stanly, and having made full confession thereof, all further proceedings be dispensed with. This was carried, by a vote of 104 to 36.

Mr. Stanly, by his high-minded and honorable course in this matter, has increased, if possible, even the reputation of his hitherto untarnished name, which will be proud-

In Senate, a report from the Secretary of the Treasury was received, showing the state of the accounts of the Pennsylvania Bank with the Government, and the indebtedness of the former, to the amount of $89,606. It was laid on the table and ordered printed.

The resolution reducing the price of printing of the Departments of Government to that of Congress, was indefinitely postponed, after some conversation, showing that the present law provided for its being done by bids at the lowest prices.

The resolution for adjournment on Monday at 11 o'clock was called up by Mr. Wright. Mr. Preston pressed his amendment declaring it inexpedient to adjourn until some provision was made by law for the protection of the Treasury. This was debated at some length by Messrs. Clay, King, Preston and Woodbury. There appearing no probability of the success of the amendment, Mr. Preston withdrew it.

The amendment was then, on motion of Mr. Clay, modified by striking out 11 o'clock, thus leaving the whole of the day Monday to act on Executive business—the confirmation of the new Cabinet, &c.—and it was then adopted. The amendment was then agreed to by the House.—The Senate consumed the remainder of the day in Executive business.

Monday, Sept. 13.

But very little legislative business has been transacted by either branch of Congress to-day. In the Senate, Mr. Benton offered a substitute for Mr. Bayard's resolution to rescind the Expunging Resolution, declaring that said Expunging Resolution was an act in conformity with the will of the People, that it would be unbecoming the Senate to rescind it, and that Gen. Jackson merited the thanks of the People for his removal of the Deposits. He moved that it be printed, so as to go on record, and be laid on the table till next Session; which was carried. Several Committees were discharged from the further consideration of business. The Senate refused to take up on its passage the resolution for the employment of Reporters, and went into Executive Session, in which they remained during the day, and till a late hour at night.

It is rumored that the nomination of Messrs. Everett, to England, Forward, Secretary of the Treasury, Barker, First Comptroller, and Boulware, Charge to Naples, were confirmed; while those of Messrs. Bela Badger, and Ritner, were rejected. It was presumed that the Cabinet nominations would be acted on.

In the House, several resolutions were offered on various subjects, but none received, objections being made. No business being before them, Messrs. Everett, Ward, and Lewis Williams, were appointed on their part as members of a Joint Committee to wait on the President and inform him that the two Houses had finished their business and were ready to adjourn, if he had no farther communication to make. This resolution was sent to the Senate; which body not acting on it immediately, the House took a recess till 12 o'clock, when they met and again took a recess to five. At about half-past 5 o'clock, the Speaker again took the Chair, and

The House remained nominally in session for about two hours, in waiting for the Senate, the Members occupying themselves in lively conversation, apparently much rejoiced at the close of this protracted Session, and some few manifesting an unusual flow of mirth from an external cause.

At the close of this, Mr. Marshall rose and inquired of the Speaker if it was in order to submit a proposition now. He would move the printing of 5,000 extra copies of the President's "second" Veto Message, and on this motion he spoke for about an hour and a half, after which he withdrew it. He reviewed the circumstances connected with Mr. Tyler's elevation to the Presidential Chair, of his vetoes, of the debate consequent on them, &c. He exhibited in a lucid manner the inconsistency of the President in this second veto of a bill which, as appeared from the letter of resignation of the Secretary of the Treasury, published this morning, was framed in all particulars to meet his views, even to its title.

The Whig party, however, was not to be destroyed, as was supposed from the course of the President. The excitement throughout the country at these his two arbitrary acts would be so great, that he feared the people would rise en masse and overthrow the constitution, and strike out the veto power contained in it. He hoped they would endure patiently for three years, and they would then come forth in their might, and the power would depart from the Old Dominion, never more to return thither. He would as soon launch into the broad and billowy ocean, "in a nut-shell, or in a water-melon rind," as to attempt to breast the waves of popular indignation which would rise at this transaction;—no, the Whig party were not to be dissolved, but would come forth with new energy to the next Presidential contest.

After the conclusion of his remarks, which were listened to with interest, and his withdrawing the motion, Mr. Everett, from the Joint Committee, reported that the President had no farther Communications to make to Congress, and the House, at half past eight o'clock, adjourned sine die.

P. S. The Cabinet nominations, as stated in my last letter, have all been confirmed, and the Extra Session is at a close.

ARGUS.

Mrs. Collins, the mother-in-law of Braddee, the mail robber, has been arrested at Pittsburg, Pa., on suspicion of having been concerned in the robberies of which he was convicted. More discoveries have been made in relation to the affair.

News of the Day.

Mr. C. H. Ruggles left this city on the evening of the 13th ult., and reached St. Louis, Mo., on the 20th, making the journey in seven days.

Mr. Stevenson, our Minister to London is expected to leave England on the 4th of next month. His successor, the Hon. Edward Everett, is now in Europe.—Alb. Eve. Jour.

Great Bank Robbery at Chicago.—By a handbill signed E. S. Prescott, Receiver, dated Land Office, Chicago, Sept. 13, 1841, we learn that the office of the Receiver of Public Moneys in Chicago was entered on Saturday or Sunday night last, the Sub-Treasury safe opened by false keys, and the following amounts stolen, viz:

$10,838 in gold, $300 in silver, $400 in Treasury notes, $100 in Military Land Scrip, and one $50 note Bank of North Adams, Mass. The Receiver offers a reward of $1000 for the recovery of the money, and $500 for the arrest of the robber.

Storing of Powder in the City.—Last week a case was tried upon a suit brought by the Fire Wardens against John Foot for violating the statute forbidding any one below 14th street to keep more than 28lbs. of powder in any one store or house. One hundred and twenty-five dollars, the full penalty, was recovered for every 100lbs. thus kept.

Provoking to the Heirs.—It is stated that the draft of a will in the hand-writing of Mr. Charles Lee, of Barre, Mass., who was lost on board the ill-fated Lexington, was lately found beneath the false bottom of a traveling trunk that had been thrown aside. In the disposition of his property, the sum of $2000 was bequeathed to the town for the establishment of a public library, $6000 to the Unitarian society, and $1000 to its pastor.

The stage between Bath and Hammondsport upset on the morning of the 20th ult., and a child about six months old, the son of Professor Raymond of the Hamilton Theological Seminary, was killed. Mrs. R. was considerably injured.

Disgraceful.—Two men were brought down by the steamboat Troy on Thursday the 9th inst., from Caldwell's Island whither they had gone for the purpose of having a fight for a wager. They were attended by thirty or forty brutal persons, who went with them for the purpose of witnessing the performance. One of the men, a hack-driver, named McConnell, was thoroughly pummeled. It is said that the ruffians had a physician with them; we should be glad to know his name, that respectable patients might hereafter know whom to shun.—Tribune.

An Old McLeod Case.—We are informed that somewhere about the year 1794, 95, or 96, a gentleman, a citizen of Vermont, by the name of McLean, was arrested in Canada for alleged hostile intentions against the British Provinces. He was tried, condemned, and hung in Montreal, without any attempt on the part of the American Government for his release. We do not remember to have seen any account of this case; if the particulars could be ascertained and republished, they would be interesting at the present time. Our informant says he has a distinct recollection of hearing the fact mentioned, many years ago, by a gentleman who was in Canada at the time of the execution.—Salem Register.

An act to provide for repairing the Potomac bridge.

An act relating to duties, and on drawbacks.

An act to repeal a part of the 6th section of the act entitled "An act to provide for the support of the Military Academy of the United States for the year 1838, and other purposes," Passed July 7th, 1838.

JOINT RESOLUTIONS.

A resolution relating to the life-boats now stationed at Sandy Hook and Bartlett's Reefs.

A resolution for the distribution of 700 copies of the Digest of Patents.

A resolution to provide for the distribution of the printed returns of the Marshals of the 6th census.

A resolution in relation to the purchase of domestic water-rotted hemp for the use of the United States Navy.

A joint resolution making it the duty of the Attorney General to examine into the titles of the lands or sites for the purpose of erecting thereon armories and other public works and buildings, and other purposes.

Dissolution of the Harrison Cabinet.—On Friday, Messrs. EWING, BELL, BADGER and CRITTENDEN tendered to the President the resignation of their offices as Secretaries of the Treasury, War, Navy, and Attorney General respectively. These resignations were accepted, and on Saturday, President Tyler nominated to the Senate, the following as their successors, viz:

WALTER FORWARD of Pennsylvania, for Secretary of the Treasrury.
JOHN McLEAN of Ohio, for Secretary of War;
ABEL P. UPSHUR of Va. for Sec'y of the Navy;
HUGH S. LEGARE of S. C. for Attorney Gen'ral.

So much for a beginning. Mr. GRANGER on Saturday tendered his resignation as Post Master General, which was also accepted, and CHARLES A. WICKLIFFE was nominated to succeed him.

There is much matter for comment in this revolution, but we are so crowded with the various manifestoes pertaining to it that we refrain this week. Our readers have the facts before them.—N. Y. Tribune.

The New Cabinet.—The President on Monday nominated Hon. Charles A. Wickliffe, late Lieutenant Governor of Kentucky, as Post Master General, which, with all those previously transmitted, were immediately confirmed by the Senate. So the Cabinet (if all the New Members accept) will hereafter stand as follows:

DANIEL WEBSTER, Sec'y. of State.
WALTER FORWARD, Sec'y of the Treasury.
JOHN McLEAN, Sec'y. of War.
A. P. UPSHUR, Sec'y of the Navy.
CHARLES A. WICKLIFFE, Post Master General.
HUGH S. LEGARE, Attorney General.

Mr. WEBSTER, as will be seen by two letters published in this paper, has deliberately decided that his duty requires him to remain at the post to which he was called by Gen. Harrison, with the warm approbation of the American people. Whatever the merits of the controversy between the President and his retiring Secretaries, (of which we will not speak decisively till the facts are all before us,) the country has reason to rejoice at this decision.—N. Y. Tribune.

☞ Most heartily do we rejoice in being enabled to state that the nomination of EDWARD EVERETT as Minister Plenipotentiary to England was on Monday confirmed by the Senate. Thus one fountain of bitterness is staunched—may another such never be opened!—Ibid.

Four Persons Burnt to Ashes!!!—We have been furnished with the following details of a late horrible catastrophe. The house of Sylvester H. Brown, on South Creek about eight miles from this place, was consumed by fire on the 11th inst. at about 11 o'clock at night; and four persons viz. two sons of Mr. Brown—one aged 7, and the other 5 years—Thomas Smith, aged 50 years—and a daughter of Ezekiel Cambell, aged 11 years.

The persons burnt we are informed, slept up stairs, while Mr. Brown and his wife, and a babe who slept below barely escaped without saving anything but their night clothes. The fragments of bones were placed in a coffin and buried in the public burying ground near the house of J. R. Tobias. Mr. Smith was a stone mason, formerly from Smithville Chenango county. The fire caught from a "Stove Shantee" joining the house, very probably near the stair case, which prevented a descent of the persons up stairs—we must suppose there was no upper window large eneough to admit of jumping through.—Elm. Rep.

Desperate Affair.—On Thursday last while Mr. Seymour Patterson was passing along the street in Wallingsford, Conn. he was hailed by two young men named Delos Allen and Henry Rice, each of whom presented muskets and ordered him to stop, or be shot down in the street. Mr. P. failing to obey this unceremonious summons, was immediately fired at by each of the young men in quick succession, part of the charge from one of the guns taking effect, & wounding him in the face, though not dangerously. Allen and Rice were immediately apprehended by Sheriff Parmelee, and on Saturday morning, after a hearing before Justice Pomeroy, were ordered to find bonds in the sum of $1,000 each for their appearance at the next County Court to answer to the offence, for want of which they were committed to jail in this city. RUM was the exciting cause of this desperate offence, as it appeared that the young men had been drinking freely at the time of attack.—New Haven Conn. Herald.

Great Temperance Convention.—Such a mighty gathering of the citizens of this county to promote the cause of TEMPERANCE, was never before witnessed. It is estimated that from 3 to 4000 persons were present. The procession was long, numbering 3 or 400 hundred wagons and the display of banners, gave variety and interest to the scene. The meeting was held in a grove west of the village, admirably chosen and fitted up for the occasion. The proceedings of the meeting as made out by the officers of the day, have not yet been handed in, but will appear next week. That so many of the Farmers of this county were willing to leave the labors of the farm this most busy season of the year, and devote a day to the cause of TEMPERANCE REFORM, attests that they fully realize the magnitude of the evils produced by the use of Intoxicating Drinks, and have faith in the efficacy of the COLD WATER PLEDGE, to remove them. Every well wisher to the happy prosperity of our country's good, must have rejoiced at the mighty demonstrations against Intemperance.—Lockport Courier.

AWFUL MURDER OF A YOUNG WOMAN.

Yesterday afternoon a most fiend-like murder was committed in the Cambridge alms-house, (Cambridgeport,) on the person of a young woman named SARAH STEVENSON, by a man named William H. Britton. He plunged a huge carving knife in between her right fore-shoulder and her breast, through her heart and lungs, and out under her left shoulder.

Britton as a pauper, became an inmate of the Alms House in September, 1840, being aged and somewhat infirm. He possessed some literary acquirements, and was employed as a teacher to the children in the establishment. In June last, Miss Stevenson, then laboring under a painful disease, became an inmate of the house, and after she had improved in health in some degree, she undertook to learn to write under the instruction of Britton. In consequence of the familiar intercourse naturally arising thus, Britton conceived a violent passion for her, and proposed marrying her.

She declined on account of his age and inability to support a family. He pressed his suit, and she laid the subject before Mr. Valentine, the excellent Superintendent, who at once advised her to avoid Britton as much as she could, and told her, whenever he entered her room, to leave it, and come into his private apartment. She acted upon this principle for some weeks. On Sunday morning he entered her room, and she then left it, and went into one occupied by two other women.

He did not immediately follow her, and she began to read to her companions from a New Testament which Mr. Valentine had presented to her. While thus engaged Britton entered, and said to the other two women, "is this your room?" Before they returned any definite answer, he drew the carving knife from under his shirt bosom, advanced to the deceased, seized her round the body and flung her on a bed, one of the women caught hold of him, but he turned upon her with the uplifted knife, like a tiger, and she quailed before him.—The other woman then grasped him around the body, and was driven off in the same manner as the first one. The deceased in the mean time was exclaiming—"Don't kill me, Don't kill me!" He first made a violent pass at her throat, but she partly stopped the knife with her right hand, in which it cut a horrible gash, four inches long, but barely scratched her throat. He then struck at her as above stated, and drove the knife clear through the body.

In the spasmodic agony of the moment, she sprang from the bed, advanced toward the door, and fell dead on the threshold. Mrs. Valentine had rushed up to her assistance, and as she fell, bent over to raise her up, but Britton also struck at her to keep back. "MURDER, MURDER," was cried in every quarter of the building, and reached the ear of James Forrister, teamster, in the yard who ran up stairs, seized Britton while in the act of bending over his murdered victim. When seized, he dropped the hand like a child.

A coroner's inquest was immediately held, and a verdict of wilful murder returned. After a short examination before Justice Chamberlain, at which he confessed the deed, he was conveyed to the jail at East Cambridge.

The deceased was a native of Ireland, about twenty years of age—quite handsome and very intelligent, exceedingly desirous of mental improvement. She was much respected on account of her excellent conduct, notwithstanding her poverty.

Britton is 57 years of age, a native of Halifax, N. S. out of which port he sailed many years as master of a vessel. During the last war, he was taken by an American privateer, commanded by Capt. Crowningshield and carried in, a prisoner at Salem. He was a widower, having been dead nine years, during this period he has also buried two woman grown daughters.

Murder near Scotts Ville.—We learn says the Albany Eve. Journal, that on Friday night last, about 12 o'clock, cries of murder were heard by the Captain of a canal boat, in the woods between the Genesee Valley Canal, and the river, a little this side of Scottsville. Information was given to the first person in the neighborhood who made search, and found a pedlar's waggon and a horse or horses tied to a tree and the goods all missing. Further search was continued, on Sunday, the body of a man by the name of CARR, well known in this city, was found murdered and concealed between three logs. Our informant, a person in that neighborhood, said the Coroner was holding an inquest when he left home.

Desertions.—Eighteen British deserters recently arrived at Plattsburg, with arms, accoutrements, and all complete. They are from La Prarie, L. C. The Cape Breton states that one-fifth of the rank and file of the garrison, which marched into the barracks at that place, a few weeks since, have deserted—some of them, like those who recently reached Plattsburg, with all their equipments.

Sinking of the Western Railroad.—We learn from the Lenox (Mass.) Eagle, that a remarkable disaster occurred to the Western Railroad track, in the town of Hinsdale, a few miles east of the Summit. The track at that place is laid over a swamp, which had been filled up with dirt and supposed to be as firm and as safe as any portion of the road.

About 15 minutes after the evening train had passed, on Thursday of last week, the track suddenly sunk down in the [illegible] water, to the depth of from [illegible] feet, for the length of about 100 feet. Had the train passed over the road 15 or 20 minutes later no one could predict what would have been the result, but it does not seem probable that many of the passengers could have escaped.

The embankment thus suddenly sunk was made two years since. The breach was immediatly repaired by putting a large number of men upon it, who worked through the night, so that the embankment was replaced before the arrival of the train next morning.

The launch of a vessel over the Falls of Niagara, appointed to come off on the 15th inst. was "NO GO." The ship RAN AGROUND in the shallowest part of current between Goat Island and the Canadian shore, and there, at the last [illegible], remained broadside to the stream.

The Eastern Boundary.—The Bangor Whig says:

The United States Troops ordered to occupy the post at the Arostook and Fish Rivers in the disputed territory, started from Houlton on Thursday last. The first detachment started with a heavy team of oxen, and all the necessary implements for clearing the roads, and for erecting suitable quarters and barracks. A military road supported at the expense of the General Government, from Houlton to Fish River, may soon be expected, and a regular mail route, with a post-office at Fish River and Arostook, will be established immediately. The General Government is now fairly upon the territory, and there will be no backing out, until a final settlement of the question, which, under the present efficient administration, cannot be long delayed.

DEATH OF HIS EXCELLENCY THE GOVERNOR GENERAL OF CANADA.

KINGSTON, Sunday Sept. 19, 1841.

After a short period of painful anxiety, our worst fears were realized. Lord Sydenham is no more! His Excellency expired this morning shortly after 7 o'clock, and the following is the official announcement of this mournful event:

GOVERNMENT HOUSE, }
Sunday Morning, Sept. 19. }

SIR—It is my painful duty to communicate to you the melancholy intelligence of the decease of His Excellency the Governor General. His Excellency breathed his last at 5 minutes past 7 o'clock, this morning.

I have the honor to be, sir,
Your most obedient servant,
THOS. C. MURDOCH.
The MAYOR, of Kingston.

Death of Dr. Ripley.—We regret to learn that Rev. EZRA RIPLEY, D. D. died at his residence in Concord, this morning, after an illness of three or four days. This good and venerable minister of the gospel completed his 90th year in May last, on which occasion he preached an excellent sermon from his pulpit. During the past summer he has enjoyed good health, altho' feeble in body, but his mind seemed to retain to the last, a large portion of its native vigor.—Bost. Mer. Jour.

Yellow Fever at New Orleans.—The yellow Fever, we regret to state, continues to increase at New Orleans. The papers of the 10th announce thirty-five deaths by yellow fever on the preceding day, and those of the 11th, 25 deaths by the fever making 60 deaths in two days.

H. W. Jones, late teller of the Merchants and Mechanics' Bank of Troy, has absconded with a large amount of money belonging to the bank. He passed through Buffalo recently on his way to Detroit.

Mr. Wickliffe, the new Postmaster General, was in Congress from Kentucky, from 1823 to 1833.

If the houses in the 1st, 2nd, 3rd, 4th, and 5th wards of New-York city were all placed in a direct line, they would extend fifty seven miles.

At the meeting of the Common Council held on Monday evening last, an ordinance was unanimously enacted, imposing a fine of $3, or imprisonment for three days, on on the venders of Sunday papers in our streets.—N. Y. Evangelist.

The U. S. Bank has totally failed, and made a full assignment of all its assets for the benefit of its creditors.

POETRY.

From the New York Evangelist.

A Brighter World than this.

BY MRS. ABDY.

Oh! when I trod Life's early ways,
Hope winged my fleeting hours,
I saw no shadow in her rays,
No serpent in her flowers;
I thought on days of present joy,
And years of future bliss,
Nor deemed that sorrow could alloy
So bright a world as this.

Alas! the fairy dreams I wove,
Soon from my fancy fled,
The friends who owned my tender love,
Were numbered with the dead;
Upon their pallid lips I pressed
Affection's parting kiss,
They left me for a world of rest,
A brighter world than this.

Nor did the spacious world supply
Those ties of opening life,
False was his mocking flattery,
Keen was its bitter strife;
And then I first began to look
For purer, truer bliss,
And loved to trace, in God's own book,
A brighter world than this.

My wounded heart desired relief,
I found the good I sought;
And now, in trial and in grief,
I feel the soothing thought,
That though the worldling may despair,
When robbed of earthly bliss,
The Christian humbly hopes to share
A brighter world than this.

Progress of Gospel Truth.

Upon the gospel's sacred page
The gathered beams of ages shine;
And as it hastens, every age
But makes its brightness more divine.

On mightier wing, in loftier flight,
From year to year does knowledge soar;
And as it soars, the gospel light
Adds to its influence more and more.

Truth, strengthened by the strength of thought,
Pours inexhaustible supplies,
Whence sagest teachers may be taught,
And wisdom's self become more wise.

More glorious still as centuries roll,
New regions blessed, new powers unfurled,
Expanding with the expanding soul,
Its waters shall o'erflow the world.

Flow to restore—but not to destroy;
As when the cloudless lamp of day
Pours out its floods of life and joy,
And sweeps each lingering mist away.

A VISIT TO MOUNT VERNON.

BY HORACE GREELEY.

A Steamboat passage of six miles to Alexandria, and drive of nine miles farther in the southern direction, over a wretched road, through a thin-soiled, wood-covered country, brought us in less than three hours from this city to Mount Vernon.—The estate is completely isolated from all other cultivation, on the east by the broad Potomac, which sweeps partly around it in a south-east and then southerly direction; on the west and south-west, by a broken tract of half grown forest, through which a brooklet has a deep and wide gorge on its way to the river. The cultivated portion of the estate stretches mainly north and north-west from the mansion, a plain and modest white house of goodly size, which stands near the bank of the Potomac, fronting westerly upon the garden and grounds of the estate, around which half a dozen humbler dwellings, tenanted by families of black laborers and servants, are scattered with little regard to order or symmetry. The estate is now the possession and residence of Mrs. John A. Washington, widow of a nephew of Judge Bushrod Washington, himself the nephew of Gen. Geo. Washington; so swiftly do the generations of men follow each other in their solemn march to the tomb!

The original resting place of the Father of his Country, and the old family sepulchre, is south of the mansion, immediately on the bank of the Potomac, though a steep and woody descent of several hundred feet intervenes between it and the water. This sepulchre is a mere excavation in the earth, walled over in the rudest manner, and looking far more at its entrance like a hop-kiln or out-door cellar than a place of rest for the illustrious departed. But this cemetery is now deserted and of course dilapidated. A new and more fitting mausoleem of brick was constructed in 1837, south of the garden, and some two or three hundred yards south-west of the former, in which the remains of the Washington family are now deposited. It is built on ground sloping to the south, and the family cemetery is excavated in the hill side, and is entered by an iron door; but in front of this, under the neat and appropriate brick structure itself, separated from the outer world only by a strong iron railing, rest side by side in two marble sarcophagi, the ashes of George and Martha Washington. These marble enclosures are well executed, though simple, and I believe were presented by Mr. T. Struthers, a Philadelphia artist, as a token of affectionate reverence and admiration for the memory of the departed. The inscription upon the top of each, merely states the name, age and time of the decease of each respectively; the death of Mrs. Wasington having occurred in 1801, two years after that of her revered consort; and as her age is stated at 71 years, while he did not reach 68, she must have been nearly two years his senior. There is another inscription on the foot of Washington's sarcophagus, but I was not near enough to read it.

After musing an hour by the sepulcher, we were conducted through the garden by a communicative black man, who rejoices in the appellation of Bill Smith, and who has been forty years on the estate, having come there with Bushrod Washington soon after the decease of the Ex-President. The garden is rich in rare and valuable plants, among them are many planted by the hand of Washington. Peaches, pears, lemons, oranges, are thickly surrounded by the aloe, myrtle, rose, geranium, &c., as well as plants whose unfamiliar names escape me. The burning of an adjoining building a few years since destroyed some of them; but the garden is probably little changed since its world-renowned master stood in its midst, save in the greater profusion of its contents. Long may it continue to people the mind of the visitor with images of the past, and fitly blend its fragrance with the memory of Washington!

Slowly, pensively we turned our faces from the rest of the mighty dead to the turmoil of the restles living—from the solemn, sublime repose of Mount Vernon to the ceaseles intrigues, the petty strifes, the ant-hill bustle of the Federal City. Each has its own atmosphere; London and Mecca are not so unlike as they. The silent, enshrouding woods, the gleaming, majestic river, the bright, benignant sky—it is fitly here amid the scenes he loved and hallowed that the man whose life and character have redeemed Patriotism and Liberty from the reproach which centuries of designing knavery and hollow profession had cast upon them, now calmly awaits the trump of the Archangel. Who does not rejoice that the original design of removing his ashes to this city has never been consummated—that they lie where the pilgrim may reverently approach them unvexed by the light laugh of the time-killing worldling, unannoyed by the vain or vile scribblings of the thoughtless or the base? Thus may they repose for ever! that the heart of the Patriot may be invigorated, the hopes of the Philanthropist strengthened and his alms exalted, the pulse of the American quickened and his aspirations purified by a visit to Mount Vernon!

THE SIX VERSIONS.

Having been much interested in examining a specimen of a work proposed by Mr. Bagster, of London, in which the six principal English versions of the Bible will be presented in parallel columns, I thought that some of our younger readers, at least, would be pleased to have an opportunity of noticing the gradual change that has taken place in our language in the last five centuries; and I therefore copy four verses of the Epistle to the Hebrews from each version.

WICLIF'S TRANSLATION. 1380.

bi feith noe dredde thoruy answere takun of these thingis that yit weren not seen, and schapid a schip in to the helthe of his hous bi wiche he dampned the world and is ordeyned eire of rightwisnesse wiche is bi feith.

bi feith, he that is clepid Abraham: obeied to go out into a place wiche he schuld take into eritage, and he wente out: not witynge whider he schulde go. by feith he dwelte in the lond of bineest: as in an alien lond: dwellynge in litil heusis withe Isaac and Jacob even eiris of the same biheest, for he abode the citee havynge foundementis, whos craftiman and maker is god.

TYNDALE. 1534.

By faythe Noe honored God, after that he was warned of thinges which were not sene, and prepared the arcke to the savinge of his householde, thorowe the which arcke he condempned the worlde, and became heyre of the rightewesnes which commeth by fayth.

By fayth Abraham, when he was called obeyed, to goo out into a place, which he shold afterwarde receive to inheritaunce, and he went out not knowynge whether he shuld goo. By fayth he removed into the londe that was promysed him, as into a straunge countre, and dwelt in tabernacles; and so did Isaac, and Jacob, heyres with him of the same promes. For he loked for a citie havinge a foundacion whose bylder and maker is God.

CRANMER. 1539.

By fayth Noe beynge warned of God, eschued the thynges whych were as yet not sene, and prepared the arcke to the savynge of hys housholde, throw the whych arcke, he condempned the worlde, and became heyre of the rightewesnes whych is according to fayth. By fayth Abraham, when he was called obeyed, to go out into a place whych he shuld afterwarde receaue to inheritaunce: and he went out, not knowing whether he shuld go. By fayth he removed into the londe of promes, as into a straunge countre, when he has dwelt in tabernacles: and dyd Isaac and Jacob heyres with him of the same promes. For he looked for a cytie hauing a foundacion whose buylder and maker is God.

GENEVAN. 1557.

By faith Noe being warned of God, of the things which were as yet not sene, moved with reverence prepared the arcke to the saving of his housholde, through the which arcke he condemned the worlde, and was made heyre of the rightuousnes which commeth by faith.

By faith Abraham when he was called obeyed God, to go out into a place, which he should afterward receave for inherytance: and he went out, not knowing whether he should go. By faith he abode in the lande, that was promised him, as in a strange countre, as one that dwelt in tabernacles, and with Isaac and Jacob heyres with him of the some promis:—For he loked for a citie havynge a foundation, whose bulyder and maker is God.

RHEIMS. 1582.

By faith Noe having received an answer concerning those things which as yet were not seen, fearing, framed the arke for the saving of his house, by the which he condemned the world: and was instituted heire of the justice which is by faith.

By faith he that is called Abraham obeid to go forth into the place which he was to receive for inheritance: and he went forth, not knowing whither he went. By faith he abode in the land of promise, as in a strange land, dwelling in cottages with Isaac and Jacob the co-heirss of the same promise. For he expected the citie that hath foundations: whose artificer and maker is God.

KING JAMES. 1611.

By faith Noah being warned of God of things not seene as yet, moved with feare, prepared an arke to the saving of his house, by the which he condemned the world: and became heire of the righteousness which is by faith.

By faith Abraham when he was called to goe out into a place which hee should after receive for an inheritance, obeyed, and he went out not knowing whether he went.

By faith hee sojourned in the land of promise, as in a strange countrey, dwelling in tabernacles with Isaac and Jacob, the heires with him of the same promise.

For he looked for a city which hath foundations, whose builder and maker is God.

This last is our present version, but there has been some change in orthography since it was first printed.

Encounter with a Boa Constrictor.—In the Surrey Zoological Gardens are several serpents, amongst which is an enormous boa, measuring upwards of twenty feet in length, and weighing more than two hundred weight. It is usual for the keepers to bathe them occasionally, and by every means to endeavor to tame them, and from time to time it is no uncommon thing for one of the men in the habit of so doing, to go into their room or cage, and clean it, whilst two large constrictors lie coiled up in a corner. Their food—live rabbits—is put into their rooms by a sliding panel, which one of the keepers named Blackburn was in the act of doing, when the enormous boa sprung at him, and seized him by the arm. The man leaped backwards, and drew the serpent partly out of the cage, which immediately spun round him like a windlass, and made one coil. Had he effected another, Blackburn would have been inevitably killed, and perhaps partly swallowed before it was discovered, he being at the time alone, and without any one immediately near him: but by pressing the throat of the powerful creature, and by more than usual strength, he was preserved. Having shut the slide, on reaching the other keepers, from the conflict on which he had been engaged, the poor fellow fainted; and on being taken home, was found to be very much discolored from the powerful pressure of his terrific antagonist. The same constrictor, in full action, would squeeze a buffalo into a shapeless mass, and swallow it most easily. The keeper, however, is now doing well.

Audubon.—We availed ourselves of an opportunity, presented a few days since by a visit to New York, to call upon our friend Audubon, the justly celebrated American Ornithologist. We found him hard at work upon a new undertaking, which, judging from the portion we were so fortunate as to see, cannot fail to raise, even higher than ever, his reputation as an accomplished naturalist. In conjunction with the Rev. John Buckman, D. D., of Charleston, S. C., who, by the way, is also one of the best Zoologists in the country, Mr. Audubon intends shortly to commence the publication of a new work on the natural history of the quadrupeds of North America. It is to be published on the same magnificent scale as the work on Ornithology, and from the drawings we were shown by the accomplished artist, will be, without exception, the most magnificent work of the kind ever published in the United States; while from the known proficiency of the gentlemen who have undertaken the task, no one will doubt the text can furnish, what at present is very much needed, a complete and accurate scientific work upon the subject. Such an undertaking will not, of course, be unattended by an enormous expense; but we trust that the liberality of his countrymen, as well as the growing taste for natural history in this country, will not permit it to be attended with any loss to the public spirited Naturalists who are about to commence the undertaking.—Boston Atlas.

Don't Quarrel.—One of the most easy, the most common, and most perfectly foolish things in the world, is to quarrel, no matter with whom, man, woman, or child! or upon what pretence, provocation, or occasion whatever. There is no kind of necessity in it, no manner of use in it, and no species of degree of benefit to be gained by it, and yet strange as the fact may be, theologians quarrel, and politicians, lawyers, doctors, and princes, quarrel, the church quarrels, and the state quarrels; nations and tribes, and corporations, men, women, and children, dogs and cats, birds and beasts, quarrel about all manner of things, and on all occasions.

If there is any thing in the world that will make a man feel bad, except pinching his fingers in the crack of the door, it is unquestionably a quarrel. No man ever failed to think less of himself after, than he did before one—it degrades him in his own eyes and in the eyes of others—and what is worse, blunts his sensibility to disgrace on the one hand, and increases the power of passionate irritability on the other.

The truth is, the more quietly and peaceably we all get on, the better—the better for our neighbors. In nine cases out of ten, the wisest policy is, if a man cheats you, to quit dealing with him; if he is abusive, quit his company; if he slanders you, take care so to live that no body will believe him; no matter who he is, or how he misuses you, the wisest way is generally just to let him alone, for there is nothing better than this cool, calm, quiet way of dealing with the wrongs we meet with.

Thoughts for the afflicted.—My afflictions are fewer than my sins, and lighter than my deserts.

My afflictions are as much the fruit of God's love as any of the bounties of his providence.

It gives no pleasure to God to see me suffer. "He doth not afflict willingly." If I am in heaviness there is a need for it.

Better people than I have had as sore trials, yet uttered no complaint.

Some things in the work of sanctification cannot ordinarily be attained without sorrow.

If I know nothing of the pains of earth, I shall hardly be well prepared for the joy's of heaven.

There are few darker signs in the history of any professor of religion than freedom from affliction.

No one now in heaven regrets having gone there through great tribulation.

To murmur or complain even in heart only is sin; and the least sin is a greater evil than any conceivable amount of suffering.

If you feel a violent impulse hurrying you into an eager pursuit of any matter, be jealous, be afraid, lest you enter into temptation. Examine it over and over again, and be well assured that it is what will not be repented of.

Gossipping.

These are spiders of society;
They weave their petty webs of lies and sneer's,
And lie themselves in ambush for the spoil.
The web seems fair, and glitters in the sun,
And the poor victim winds him in the toil
Before he dreams of danger or of death.
Alas, the misery that such inflict!
A word, a look, have power to wring the heart,
And leave it struggling in the net
Spread by the false and cruel, who delight
In the ingenuous torment they contrive.
L. E. L.

Sheep and Dandies.—The following is from a report made by the committee on sheep at the Worcester cattle show:—'A sheep should be judged of like a dandy, by the fineness of his coat. We beg pardon of the sheep for the comparison—but it is so apt! In both cases the coat is the most valuable part of the animal. What is a sheep good for without the fleece? and what is a dandy good for without a coat?'

Pliny, has very beautifully said:—The highest of all characters, in my estimation, is his, who is as ready to pardon the errors of mankind, as if he were every day guilty of some himself.

It is better to be preserved in the brine of adversity, than to rot in the honey of prosperity.

Temperance Department.

I DON'T DRINK WINE.

Why,—1. Because "port, madeira, and sherry, contain from one-fourth to one-fifth of their bulk in alcohol, so that he who drinks a bottle, drinks nearly half a pint of alcohol, or almost a pint of pure brandy.

2. Because it is the most fascinating, and therefore the most dangerous of intoxicating liquors.

3. Because I am convinced from the best medical authority, that it is injurious and not beneficial to persons in health.

4. Because it is expensive, and I think it wrong to waste money upon a bad article, which might be given to the poor, who can scarcely get bread.

5. Because the depressing and debilitating effects upon the system after drinking it over night prove it to be bad.

6. Because if I drink wine, I cannot blame my children if they also become wine drinkers.

7. Because a wine drinker cannot consistently reprove others who get fresh with drinking ale, porter, or spirits.

8. Because a great quantity of fruit is spoiled to make his wine, and a vast amount of the labor of our countrymen is exchanged for this dangerous article.

9. Because being recommended by physicians as a medicine, it is not fit for the dinner table.

10. Because, at parties and public dinners, it is the constant source of disorder, tumult, and serious accidents.

11. Because, drinking wine is a state of slavery from which I am determined to be free.

12. Because the brightest geniuses—the greatest men, and the most powerful nations, have been destroyed by wine.

13. Because it is the testimony of all lecturers and ministers who have made the experiment, that they can sustain more exertion without wine.

14. Because many a clever man has passed through the gazette, who might have been independent; and many are in their graves, who would have been living, had it not been for their wine.

15. Because in abstaining, I am sure I am right, but all wine drinkers have their misgivings.

16. Because all nations have been so alive to the evils of wine drinking, as either to prohibit it or to restrain its use.

17. I like the fruit of the vine, or the pure juice of the grape, such as I believe Jesus gave to his disciples, and which was common in Judea; but port, sherry, and champaign, and every kind of fermented and brandied wine, I am determined not to taste.

DR. WATERMAN'S

RHEUMATIC AND STRENGTHENING PLASTER.

The peculiarities of this compound are owing to the immediate effects produced on the animal fibre, it being carried by the absorbants to the seat of disease or pain, without producing disagreeable sensations. As an external application it is a powerful auxiliary, and will cure, in all curable cases; such as acute and chronic Rheumatisms, Scrofulous Affections, weakness of back, pain in the side, head and limbs, affections of the Spine, &c &c &c.

This Plaster is warranted to be by far the best ever offered to the public—much superior to "Jew David, or Hebrew Plaster," and at less than half the price.

An unparalleled remedy for common Colds, Coughs, Asthma, Influenza, Whooping Cough, Bronchitis, and all diseases of the Breast and Lungs, leading to Consumption; composed of the concentrated virtues of Horehound, Boneset, Blood Root, Liverwort, aad several other vegetable substances Prepared only by J. M. WINSLOW, Rochester, N. Y.

The innocence and universally admitted pectoral virtues of the Herbs from which the BALSAM OF HOREHOUND is made, are too generally known to require recommendation; it is therefore only necessary to observe that the Medicine contains the whole of their Medicinal properties, highly concentrated, and so happily combined with several other vegetable substances, as to render it the most speedy, mild, and certain remedy, now in use, for the complaints above mentioned.

Thousands of testimonials will be shown, if wanted, at any time, placing the above medicines beyond reproach.

In conclusion he would only say, that he will not be under-sold on any article which he offers for sale.

For the Register.

BROTHER BAILEY,—The substance of the following letter was written, not long since, to a particular friend. In a former communication to him, I had remarked that my observance of the seventh day had contributed greatly to the prosperity of my soul, far beyond any thing I had experienced in keeping the first day of the week. In his reply he seemed to intimate that this was in consequence of my not having endeavored to keep the first day as strictly as I have once endeavored to keep the seventh. The answer to this is contained in the last paragraph. Thinking there are ideas which may be beneficial to others, I request a little room in the Register. T. B. B.

My Dear Brother—Having no news of importance to communicate, I shall occupy this sheet with the subject alluded to heretofore.

Permit me to say, you are very greatly mistaken, if you think I am not sincere in my declaration, that infant sprinkling is just as well supported by scripture, as keeping the first day of the week for the Sabbath.—I repeat the declaration with all sincerity, and with the strongest conviction of its truth. You say, "that for sprinkling unconscious babes there is not a shadow of proof." Just so I say with regard to sabbatizing on Sunday. For though it might be admitted that the apostles and primitive christians were, on some occasions, assembled on the first day for religious worship; and though it even be admitted that this was their regular and constant practice; yet I would still ask, Did they sabbatize on that day? Did they abstain from secular business, and make it a day of rest according to the scope and spirit of the sabbatic law?—For this is the real point in dispute. If they did, where is the passage of scripture that proves it, or even intimates it? It is vain to fly to Jno. xx. 19, 26, and Acts xx. 7, for these passages contain no such doctrine. The very most that they imply, is that religious meetings were held on that day; but when you look for the evidence that they sabbatized at the same time, you find it is not there, any more than baptism is in Matt. xix. 13—15. For though the children are there, the baptism of them is not. So in the passages above, though the religious meetings are there, and the breaking of bread, if you please, yet the sabbath is not. The sabbath must be found somewhere else: and if the word of God be our only guide, it will be found only in those passages which attach it to the seventh day of the week. Not another sabbath is mentioned in the Bible, except the Jewish monthly and annual sabbaths, which were a shadow of things to come, and are therefore abolished in Christ.

Some contend that they do not regard the first day of the week as a sabbath, and that they do not go to the fourth command at all to regulate them in the observance of it; that, on the contrary, they consider it entirely a New Testament institution under the name Lord's day. Rev. i. 10. But what do they gain by this? Just nothing at all.—For, in the first place, admitting that by "Lord's Day," is meant the first day, the New Testament is wholly silent respecting the manner in which it must be observed, unless, indeed, the above examples of holding religious meetings are to be considered as regulating the manner. In which case, as I have already shown, they afford no countenance to sabbatizing, that is, resting from labor.

In the second place, it must be observed, that this rejection of the name, Sabbath, this denial that they sabbatize on the first day, and in distinction from it keep Lord's Day, amount to just nothing. It is a distinction without a difference, so long as their practice is to abstain from worldly business on the day in question. For what is sabbatizing? It is nothing more nor less than resting from labor. It does not necessarily imply any typical reference to Christ. The word Sabbath means rest, and sabbath day means rest-day. This is all it means. Now why deny that they sabbatize on the first day, when they do actually rest from labor? The difference is in name, but not in the act. And as to the types, what could a mere name typify? The types consisted of persons, seasons, places, and things. But mere names typified nothing.

I well know, that our brethren who deny the obligation of the sabbatic law, and in distinction from it assert the obligation of Lord's Day, dare not, after all, say that we are not bound to abstain from worldly labor, and that we may work any day, and every day, just as we please. No, they dare not. For the whole christian world feels the moral necessity of a day of rest, and that an entire day through the whole twenty-four hours. They feel that the interests of religion and morality can never be promoted without it. Now if they feel that a day of rest is so important for these purposes, why not take the very day that is indicated in the law of the sabbath? But no, they must substitute for this, one of man's invention, and then call upon God's law to enforce it for them; which law, however, enforces nothing but the seventh day of the week.—An unpleasant dilemma, truly. May the truth make them free.

The idea that the first day of the week is a New Testament institution under the name Lord's Day, is also defective in another particular. For if it is a New Testament institution, it is purely a church ordinance, and consequently is obligatory on the church only. Others are not bound by it at all.—For Testament or Covenant institutions are all church ordinances. Old Covenant institutions were the ordinances of the old Jewish church, and New Covenant institutions are the ordinances of the christian church. But the Sabbath is not a church ordinance. It is not an ordinance either of the Old, or the New Covenant. In its original institution, it had no reference to either of the Covenants, being instituted when man was innocent and had no need of a Redeemer. The Sabbath is not a church ordinance, but is binding on men in their individual capacity, whether they are members of the church, or not.

This brings me to notice the ground upon which you predicate your faith and practice. "That the Lord Jesus Christ was God, equal with the Father; and that the second creation, that is, the Redemption wrought out by him, was as great or greater than the first." And you add, that you have heard me express myself to the same effect. Well, it is true, I adhered to this view as long as I could, but sensible the whole time that it was attended with difficulties. The weakness of the position I now clearly see. I would remark upon it, in the first place, that it is not true that the new creation and redemption are the same, though theological writers often very erroneously confound them. Redemption is the foundation of the new creation, but the new creation itself is a distinct work. It is a work which commences with the regeneration of the soul, and will be finally completed by the resurrection of the body, and the formation of the new heaven and new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness.—2 Pet. iii. 13. When this new creation shall be finished, then will commence that sabbatism that remains for the people of God. Heb. iv. 9. So then, even admitting that the new creation is greater than the old, and that the finishing of it requires a sabbath as a memorial of it, we must nevertheless wait until it is finished, before such a sabbath can be instituted.

I remark, secondly, that this doctrine is erroneous, because it supposes the work of redemption to have been finished on the first day of the week by the resurrection of Christ from the dead. But how does this correspond with Christ's dying words upon the cross. Jno. xix. 30. His crucifixion, you know, was on the sixth day of the week. This was always a difficulty in my mind, when I advocated the theory that you do, and I knew not what to do with it. A plain, illiterate woman, dwelling in the woods, once urged this passage as an objection to my theory, and I felt in my heart that she had the advantage of me. She could quote the word of God, and I could only advance human reasoning. I really felt ashamed of myself and my doctrine.

In the third place, I remark that if the Lord Jesus Christ was God, equal with the Father, yet he was not greater than the Father. Therefore the glory and work of the Father cannot be supposed to be eclipsed and hid by the glory and work of the Son. Or the work of the Son is to render the work and glory of the Father more conspicuous; to rub off the filthy daubing and smearing which sin has cast over it, and make it again shine forth in all its original glory. Wherefore, if the Father created the world, and thus manifested his glory and his handi-work, the work of the Son could not be to obliterate and destroy the Sabbath which is a memorial of all this glory; but rather to preserve and honor it. Thus Redemption, instead of arguing a new Sabbath, argues in the very strongest manner the continuation of the original one.—It adds no little strength to this idea, that He who is our Redeemer, is also our Creator. Jno. i. 3, 10. Heb. i. 2. Col. i. 16.—So that in honoring the Sabbath which is a memorial of creation, we honor Christ as much as we possibly could by observing the first day of the week. Observe also, that the work of creation is made an article of the Christian faith. Heb. xi. 3, and the idea receives yet farther support.

My fourth remark is, that we are taught by the types of the Old Testament that the work of Redemption may, with all propriety and fitness, be commemorated on the seventh day. For it will be observed, that while the Israelites are enjoined in one place to observe the sabbath as a memorial of the finishing of creation, Exod. xx. 11, they are in another place enjoined to keep it as a memorial of their redemption from Egyptian bondage. Deut. v. 15. This shows most conclusively, that creation and redemption may be brought together and celebrated on one and the same day. There is, therefore, no necessity whatever for the institution of another sabbath. In connection with this idea I would observe, that I think that the work of redemption, instead of making the old sabbath to fade away confers upon it new honor and glory. For you perceive the death of Christ goes immediately before it at the close of the sixth day of the week; and his resurrection follows immediately after it on the morning of the first day. Thus, here is the Sabbath flanked right and left by the two grand features in redemption upon which the salvation of a world depends. The Atonement—the great Sacrifice for sins on the one side,—the Resurrection, which is the honor that God puts upon the Sacrifice, on the other. My soul rejoices and exults that I can, upon God's holy sabbath, look on the one side and view my Jesus dying for my sins, and again look to the other side and behold him rising again for my justification. The sabbath thus has a glory to which the first day of the week can make no pretensions.

My fifth remark is, that even if it could be proved that the work of redemption was finished by the resurrection of Christ on the first day of the week, still that would not prove it to be a sabbath. For the analogy by which it is attempted to prove it, is defective. The reason which is given in the Divine Law for sanctifying the seventh day of the week, applies equally to every hour and moment of that day. For [illegible] from his creation-work is mentioned as covering over the whole of that day, which, like all the other days mentioned in the history, consisted of 24 hours. But the reason for sanctifying the Resurrection Day, cannot apply equally to every hour of the day, but only to the particular moment of time when Christ arose; for the Resurrection did not occupy the whole of the day, but only a small part of it. And if Christ arose at midnight, which is the common opinion, then the reason applies particularly and specially to that hour, when those who are supposed to be under obligation to observe it are asleep! You perceive, then, that the analogy is altogether defective, and consequently the argument based upon it, falls.

You have asked the following question. "Did you formerly labor to keep the first day, as you have since, the seventh?" My answer is unequivocally No. And for this simple reason, that there was nothing in the first day cause that bound my conscience to do so. If there is a conscience about any particular thing, it must be produced in the mind by the word of truth requiring that particular thing. But the first day has no materials to make conscience of. And herein the seventh-day cause has a power, which the first day never had, viz: that while the latter could not create in me any particular conscience with regard to keeping the day strictly, the former, by its powerful operation on my mind, has CREATED a conscience so that if I were now to do those things on the seventh-day, which I used to do on the first, I should feel that it would be flying in the face of the Almighty. Divine truth, my brother, has a two-fold operation on the mind. Its first operation is that of creating and making a conscience with respect to the particular duties it enjoins. Its second operation is that of enriching and blessing the soul that acts out conscience in the full performance of these duties. Your question was founded merely in view of this second operation of truth, whereas it ought to have been founded in view of the first mode of operation. The enquiry then should be, which of these two doctrines has most power to create and make a conscience? and such a conscience as, when acted out in a full discharge of duty, shall be productive of the greatest blessings to the soul? The answer to this enquiry, I am bold to say, will be in favor of the seventh-day.

Yours, in Christ,

HEARERS OF THE WORD.

In the parable of the sower, our Savior described the different kinds of hearers usually met with in religious assemblies; and the effects the preached word produced upon them. Then, he took occasion to give the exhortation, "Take heed how ye hear." This evidently implies that it is man's duty to hear the word; and that it is equally the duty of all men who have access to the preaching of the gospel. But it is a lamentable truth that many who live in Christian countries, seldom hear the word preached. They come not into the concourse where wisdom lifteth up her voice. "They forsake the assembling of themselves together." Their guilt is great, and unless they repent, it will be more tolerable for Sodom and Gomorrah, and for Tyre and Sidon in the day of judgment than for them." But our business at this time is not so much with those who neglect attendance upon the preached word, as with those who do externally wait upon it. Many such receive no saving benefit. And, even among them who are the children of God, at some times wax cold in their first love and bring forth but little fruit! Corrupt nature may frame excuses for unprofitable hearing; but the real reason is that these hearers do not wait upon the word preached in a proper manner. They do not sufficiently take heed how they hear.

In order to profitable hearing, it is enough that the preacher be authorized, orthodox and eloquent; the hearers must attend with diligence. Embrace every opportunity of hearing the word that can be done consistently with other duties, not suffering trifles, as many do, to keep them away from the house of God. Sitting under the sound of the preached gospel, the hearers ought to give heed to the word delivered. The Savior when he began his sermon concerning the sower, called upon his hearers to hearken; and several times gave the exhortation, "he that hath an ear to hear, let him hear." Paul, when about to address an assembly at Antioch, exhorted them to give strict attention. "Men of Israel and ye that fear God give audience." Without due attention, no hearer can be profited. To this fixed and diligent attention to the word while preached, there stands opposed every thing which has a tendency to divert and distract the mind. Wandering thoughts are hurtful and ought to be guarded against: also intrusions up[illegible] we observe that late attendance, coming in after Divine service is begun; unnecessarily leaving the house of God before worship is closed; drowsiness, sleeping, smiling, whispering and all levity are highly improper and criminal. Let the bare mention of these things suffice. These odious and abhorrent things offend God; vex the preacher; annoy the attentive hearer, and disgrace the practitioner in the eyes of all good men. God "is greatly to be feared in the assembly of the saints; and to be had in reverence by all them that are about him." And he hath said "I will be sanctified in them that come nigh me, and before all the people will I be glorified."

If hearers would take heed to the word and profit by it; they must prepare themselves for hearing. They ought seasonably to lay aside worldly business, and banish worldly thoughts from their minds. If worldly thoughts; thoughts of early riches, honors, pleasures and business, occupy the minds of worshipers in the house of God; they cannot reasonably expect to be profited by the word preached. Such thoughts will either exclude the word, or else choke it and render it unfruitful! How many gospel sermons are lost, and worse than lost, upon the ears of hearers, whose hearts are intent upon their farms, or their merchandize, or other means of gain; or upon their schemes of ambition and pleasure! Let professors of religion practice on that excellent plan of concluding worldly work timorously on Saturday evening; and make ready for the sabbath before it arrives. In the courts of the Lord, let them remember that he is a spirit and must be worshiped in spirit and in truth. That he searcheth the heart and trieth the reins and hath said 'son give me thine heart.' And "keep thy heart with all diligence for out of it are the issues of life." Let them consider their own necessities; and the fulness and excellency of the blessings which God dispenses in his house; that they may feel their own emptiness and seek to be filled out of that fullness that is in Christ Jesus. If hearers were to make due preparation, and then take heed how they hear the solemn truths of God, they would not go away unblessed and continue barren in the work of the Lord.

One important part of preparation for the right and profitable hearing of the word is prayer.—Paul may plant carefully and Apollos water zealously, but all in vain till God gives the increase. Nevertheless, the constitution which the Lord hath established is, "I will yet be inquired of by the house of Israel to do it for them." "Ask, and it shall be given you" &c. "Every one that asketh receiveth." Doubtles one great reason why some profit so little, under the preaching of the word is, they do not pray for the divine blessing. As the apostle James said, "Ye ask and receive not because ye ask amiss." Before entering the sanctuary, prayer ought to be offered to Almighty God for his blessing on the ministers of the word; that they have suitable messages, and good utterance, and great boldnes. Paul exhorted most of the churches to which he wrote, "Brethren pray for me—pray for us." The prayers of faith, in behalf of the ministers of God, are often times answered by blessings on the offerer. Every preacher needs, and each well exercised one desires the prayers of the hearers. Prayer ought to be made for a blessing on the word and ordinances; and for the out-pouring of the spirit upon the people. Especially let each hearer crave and beg a rich blessing for himself—even an open ear; a soft heart; a composed mind; spiritualized affections; and grace to apply what is heard and bring forth fruit unto eternal life.

The attentive, prayerful hearer knows that in "taking heed, to the word," he must receive it in faith, in love, in meekness and fear, and give it a lodgment in the heart, as well as practice in life. The word preached did not profit the Hebrews, "Not being mixed with faith in them that heard it." "Whatsoever is not of faith is sin." And want of love to the truth was one reason why some concerning whom Paul wrote failed of salvation. "They received not the love of the truth, that they might be saved." Some hearers hate the truth, cannot bear to hear it, and hate the preacher for uttering it. Thus, wicked Ahab said of Micaiah, who was a faithful prophet of the Lord and told the truth "I hate him, for he doth not prophesy good of me, but evil." In like manner the Jews were often offended at the prophets, at the blessed Savior himself, and at his apostles for telling them the truth; and this anger effectually prevented their profiting by the word. Hearers ought to receive the truth in love, however it may condemn them, whatever self-denial and sacrifice it may require. When the truth condemns them, they ought to condemn themselves and change their conduct, and not condemn the preacher and cavil at the truth. They ought to retain as much truth as possible in memory. "Thy word," said David, "have I hid in my heart that I might not sin against thee.

Every thing which may have a tendency to take away the word, or destroy the impressions which it has made on the mind, ought to be carefully avoided. Accordingly vain company or any company whose conversation does not savor of religion, ought to be avoided as much as possible when we come from the house of God.—The good seed of the word is easily rooted out; and the evil one stands ready to pluck it out of our hearts, lest it should produce a saving effect. Hearers should [illegible]. Our Savior said, "Whosoever heareth these sayings of mine and doeth them I will liken him unto a wise man which built his house upon a rock, and the rain descended, and the floods came, and the winds blew and beat upon that house; and it fell not for it was founded upon a rock. "And every one that heareth these sayings of mine and doeth them not, shall be likened to a foolish man which built his house upon the sand; and the rain descended and the floods came, and the winds blew and beat upon that house, and it fell and great was the fall of it." May the Lord be pleased to incline and enable hearers so to take heed how they hear, the word preached may prove an eternal benefit to their souls.

B. W.

THE WAY TO DO GOOD.—In estimating our means of doing good, we are prone to look too much to external circumstances, and too little to a proper preparation of the heart—to place the power of being useful, too exclusively in the possession of great talents and an extended range of influence, in the occupying of important posts, and the conducting of high enterprises of benevolence. Undoubtedly it is a great privilege to be placed in a wide sphere of christian activity; yet we must not imagine that here lies the main source of usefulness.—The scriptures place in it the intimate union of the soul with Christ by faith. "He that abideth in me, and I in him, the same bringeth forth much fruit."

They would have us understand that the resources of doing good lie within us rather than without. And we find it as a matter of fact, that a suitable preparation of heart always opens to the believer abundant opportunities of doing good in a noiseless and unostentatious sphere; and if these opportunities are faithfully improved they become the avenues to wider fields of influence, and wider still, in unlimited progression, so that the path of the humblest saint may be "as the shining of light that shineth more and more unto the perfect day." This is beautifully illustrated in the history of Harlan Page. He was not distinguished above the bulk of mankind either for talents, or education, or means of influence,—his station was that of an humble private individual. But he devoted himself with earnestness to the work of converting sinners from the error of their ways, and in this work he persevered to the end of life. Now hear his dying testimony. "I know that it is all of grace, and nothing that I have done; but I think that I have had evidence that more than one hundred souls have been converted to God through my own direct personal instrumentality.—How much better then this, even for the present life: than to have been, with Napoleon, the conqueror of more than one hundred fields of carnage and blood! And Oh! how much better for the life to come. —Ohio Observer.

A WORD TO CHRISTIANS.—Christian, art thou rich? set not thy affections on the things of earth. Thou wilt not need them long. Be charitable and bestow liberally. And though poor, so that thy life is not uncomfortable, desire not wealth. Be content. Thy stay here is but short. And if faithful to thy God, thy final home will be inexpressibly glorious.—Fuller.

Were men as jealous of God's honor as they pretend to be of their own, they would see the folly and madness of their wild pursuits of revenge, and learn to forgive as they expect to be forgiven.

Plato, speaking of passionate persons, says, "They are like men standing upon their heads; they see all things the wrong way."

Literary Department.

From the N. Y. Evangelist.

There are a few standard works in the English language, which every man should read thoroughly; works of great genius, & produced with great labor. Happily these works find their own way to the firesides of rural life. [illegible] we find wherever we go, a copy of Doddridge's Rise and Progress of true religion in the soul, Thomson's Seasons, and Cowper's Task. Works like these should be studied in the morning of life. They introduce the great concerns of the soul, they impart to the mind the purest associations, cultivate the most amiable emotions, and invigorate by sublime reflection. Every man should have some valuable work continually in the course of perusal. It is surprising how much information may be obtained, and how much may be accomplished by him who keeps constantly on hand some work well worthy of deep study, although he should spend but fifteen minutes, or one half hour of each day in actual reading. We know that multitudes avoid engaging in the perusal of heavy works, under the fear that they shall never have time to complete them. This is foolish. A small portion of knowledge is better than none. A thorough study of twenty pages of some masterly production, will sometimes impart to the mind vastly important principles. Take for instance such a work as Butler's Analogy. The mind that thoroughly masters the first twenty pages is furnished with a much larger amount of intellectual and moral power than it would ever have obtained without. [illegible] justice to every [illegible] advantages [illegible] him who has [illegible] go [illegible] every returning [illegible] ement testify that [illegible]—Go as far as possible, but always continue the onward movement.

We have spoken hitherto of the best works; of solid, learned, and profound compositions. Our reading, it would seem, might be confined to works of this character. Yet this would not be judicious. Works of a different character, as biographies, tours, sketches, practical exhortations, and ephemeral publications, may be profitably read to a great extent, if a person knows how to read them. There is a method of seizing upon the drift of such works without much time, and yet so as to furnish the mind with important knowledge. Of almost any useful book, it is better to know something than to be entirely ignorant. It may be said such reading will make a man superficial. So it will, if we have no other. The case is far different, however, with one who has formed the habit of holding some profound work in his hand until he has thoroughly mastered it. One such volume well read, will sometimes enable him to comprehend at a glance the scope of half a dozen others on the same subject.—It is so in all the great departments of learning, and very few are found either among the common readers, or the profound scholars of our country, who are aware how far this matter can be pushed, or how widely this principle will operate.

The remarks already made apply to all classes. Our desire is to excite as widely as we can, the desire for true knowledge, and for extensive knowledge. No avocation in life is without its leisure moments. Indeed, every American, whatever may be his calling, should especially secure for himself an opportunity for daily intellectual improvement.

The clergy will probably appreciate the truth of these remarks more than any other of our readers. The public teacher, who commences his labor with the advantage of a thorough education, has a foundation laid for rapid improvement. Having his mind already filled with settled principles, it is easy for him to master most of the works which the press of the present day furnishes which are worth perusing.—"Give attention to reading," is an apostolic injunction. The work of some powerful contemporary mind will tend to stimulate his own. We would neither depreciate the ancients or the moderns. We would have our minister accomplished in both.—We would have him able to gather fresh illustrations from those who have toiled in former days in the wide realms of thought, and from those who are toiling now. By this means his profiting will appear to all. His congregation will feel that he is able to defend the doctrines which he proclaims, and will listen with respect to annunciations which come fortified with the artillery of comprehensive intelligence.

De Ruyter, October 6, 1841.

Peace of the Gospel.

An argument in favor of our holy religion is the peace that the gospel imparts to every believer. If the child of God cannot offer reasons that are conclusive and clear to the mind of the unbeliever, so as to convince his understanding, or if he is not able to meet and answer the objections of the sceptic; yet he can refer to the effect of the gospel on his own heart, and say with the Psalmist, "Great peace have all they that love thy law, and nothing can offend them." For himself he feels sure though he may not convince the caviller. What he feels and enjoys himself he knows to be true. And if the unbeliever brings innumerable arguments against Divine revelation, yet all these cannot counterbalance what he feels in his own heart.

One of the richest blessings that the gospel yields to its votaries in this life, is the peace it brings in all circumstances. If slanderers rise up against him, and breathe out their cruelty and malice—if all his friends desert him—if all external circumstances are adverse, he retires within himself, and in his conscious integrity enjoys that peace which is represented as the smooth, gentle current of a river that pursues its noiseless way. Disappointments in worldly matters serve but to win him back to prize and enjoy the peace that the gospel brings.

> "In every condition, in sickness, in health,
> In poverty's vale, or abounding in wealth," the peace of the gospel is his richest inheritance, and the comfort and stay of his heart.

It is the more to be prized, from the fact that it is unlike the peace that may arise from any other source. It is possible for friends to offer consolation and relief to the wounded heart; and even the things of this life may afford temporary peace; but that is like the morning dew. Nothing, save the divine influences of the gospel can dissipate all fear and disquietude. If anger frown—if sickness invade—if slander is rife—or if death approach, the child of God rests immoveably secure on the veracity of God which is pledged for his never-failing help.

The Slanderer.

This character is by far the most uncomfortable member of any community. Happy would it be for the church of the living God, if such should cease to be. It is enough for any man to contend against the corruptions of his own heart, and the temptations of the enemy of God and man, without being traduced by designing men.

The slanderer comes as an extra pest to society, armed with his fiendish weapons, and urged on by the spirit of darkness.—His labor is to traduce and villify, to destroy the peace of individuals and society. He sows the seeds of discord, and is most pleased to see the virtuous and good writhing under his scorpion tongue. In the corners of the street, in places of public resort he makes unprovoked his thrusts at the character of those he envies. And withal is ever pleased to speak of his own good qualities and abhorrence of every evil trait which his slanderous tongue alone makes to exist in others. Mark the busy slanderer, and see how he selects the most worthy to assault. Common fame is left untouched, while those most envied are the subjects of his assault. Reader, do you wish to know how to detect this character? You may know from the fact that an honorable man will never report even the failings of others without first endeavoring to correct them, while the slanderer speaks of a man's faults only behind his back.

Reform.

The present degenerate state of the church, or members in the church, gives startling proofs of the want of vitality in the cause of purity and truth. When men can connive at sin, or remain inactive while the arch-enemy of the church is entrapping souls and destroying them, they give fearful evidence that they are christians in name more than in heart. The insinuating address the tempter has made to the natural feelings of the heart, has completely blinded the eyes of multitudes to his deadly assaults. There are many who give countenance to dram-drinking and licentiousness, or indulge it themselves, who are zealous in contending for things of less import, because less destructive in their consequences. Intemperance and licentiousness are the open broad roads to destruction, and there are few comparatively that will contend against their influences. Nothing is reprehended in the scriptures in stronger terms, than licentiousness; and yet multitudes are daily giving countenance to it, who hope they are enjoying the favor of God. Christ pronounces a blessing on the pure in heart, but denounces his curse against all uncleanness. God has made it the duty of all christians to contend against every sin.—But satan has taught them that it is indelicate to speak against some. And professors of godliness have even thought that the supposed (not real) indelicacy of denouncing every sin, is of more consequence than purity of heart and life, without which none can see God. On this subject there must be a reform, or myriads, who otherwise might be saved, will be carried down the polluted stream of vice, to have part with those that curse God and the Lamb, in unavailing despair.

S. D. B. Denomination.

It will be seen from the Minutes of the General Conference that in the denomination there are 50 churches, and about 5,500 communicants. There are about 40 ordained ministers, and 22 unordained. The additions to the denomination during the past year have been comparatively small. Yet, we are sufficiently numerous to hold up to the world some of the truths of the Bible which are neglected by the great mass of professing christians. If we were all as devoted and zealous as primitive christians (and surely we ought to be,) men would soon learn to call "the sabbath a delight," and that innovation in the dark ages of the church, which teaches men to observe the first, instead of the seventh day of the week for the sabbath would ere long cease to govern men. Though we are small there is a great work for us to do; and while we contend earnestly for the doctrines of the gospel, held in common with others, we must not forget that God requires us ever to exhibit that truth which characterizes us contained in the fourth command of the decalogue. Here, doubtless, is our field of labor; and while so many disregard God's holy sabbath, we can hardly be guiltless if we hold our peace.

Trial of McLeod.

The trial of ALEXANDER McLEOD is in progress now in Utica. It is thought that it will take nearly or quite two weeks before a decision will be made. Arrangements are made for preserving the strictest order and decorum during the trial.

We commend the article of Br. T. B. BROWN, on our first page, to an attentive perusal. This subject ought to receive more attention. The time will come when all men will delight in the Sabbath of the Lord thy God. Consistent efforts on the part of those that have the truth, will doubtless hasten that time.

At the adjourned annual meeting of the Stockholders of De Ruyter Institute, held on the 4th inst., ALEXANDER CAMPBELL, PERRY BURDICK, WILLIAM MAXSON, and HARRISON J. WILLIAMS, were elected Trustees for three years.

For the Register.

To Young Men.

To me there is no moral object so beautiful as a conscientious YOUNG MAN. I watch him as I do the stars in the heavens. Clouds may intervene before him, but we know that his light is behind them, and will beam again though the blaze of other prosperity may outshine him; but we know that though unseen he illumes his own sphere.

He resists temptation, not without a struggle, for that is not a virtue; but he does resist and conquer, he bears the sarcasm of the profligate, and it stings him, for that is the trial of virtue, and he heals the wound with his own touch. He heeds not the idle rabble of fashion if it leads to sin, and the proud Atheist who says not only in his heart, but with his lips, "there is no God," controls him not, for he sees in the earth beneath his feet, and the curtain-heavens over his head, the creating hand of an Almighty God, and reverences Him. As a certain writer says, "woman is sheltered by fond arms and guided by loving counsel; old age is protected by experience, manhood by its strength, but the young man stands amid the temptations of the world like a balanced tower, happy if he seek and gain the prop of Christianity."

Onward, then, conscientious youth! raise thy standard and nerve thyself to goodness. If thy Creator has given thee intellectual power, awake it in that cause, and never let it be said of thee—he helped to swell the tide of sin by casting his whole influence into its turbid channels.

News of the Day.

Remains of Commodore Perry.—It is stated in the Newport, R. I. Herald, that the remains of Commodore Perry were removed on Thursday from the grave, where they have remained since they were brought from Trinidad, to their new and final resting place, at the side of the Monument, which is to be at once completed, under the direction of a committee of the State.

A free negro man named Tom Johnson, was so beaten by a white man named Thos. Smith, at Georgetown, D. C., on Friday evening, last week, as to cause his death on Saturday. Smith has escaped.

The receipts of the Philadelphia, Wilmington and Baltimore Railroad and Steamboat lines, amounted to the sum of "sixty-four thousand three hundred and twenty dollars" for the month of August.

5,000 head of cattle, raised in Knox co., bordering upon Peoria, in the west, recently left that place, bound to Ohio, for sale.—Half a dozen years ago the same county used to bring cattle from Ohio. This export from Knox county is said to be one of the fruits of its agricultural society.

We learn from Plainfield, that two lads, belonging to that town, of 12 or 14 years of age, were one day last week preparing for hunting, when one of them, named Hicks, presented his gun to his companion's breast, almost touching it, and saying, "look out, or I'll shoot you," fired his piece, and instantly killed him! Report says that the discharge was not intended, and that the verdict of the Jury of Inquest was, accidental death. The name of the deceased was Rodman.—Hartford Eagle.

The Montreal Courier says, that His Excellency, Sir Richard D. Jackson, proceeds forthwith to Kingston, to assume the Government of the Province, which devolves upon him in consequence of the vacancy created by the death of the Governor General.

The news from Florida continues favorable. The Indians keep coming in, and every thing promises a favorable termination to the war.

The German Bank of Wooster, Ohio, has blown up, to the loss of the holders to the amount of more than one hundred thousand dollars. This explosion falls with most severity, indeed almost entirely, on the farmers of the neighborhood, many of whom have exchanged almost their entire crop of wheat for the trash.

The corner stone of a Monument to Gen HARRISON was laid at Hagarstown, Md. on the 17th inst.

Mr. CAMBRELENG, late Minister to Russia, arrived home in the Great Western.

The Imprisoned Abolitionists.—The three young men arrested at Palmyra, Mo., for an alleged attempt to entice away slaves, were recently brought up for trial. On bringing the case before the Grand Jury, it was found that there was no law for the punishment of any such offense as they had been charged with. They had only attempted to entice away slaves, against which there is no law. The general understanding was that they would not be indicted. But such was the excitement at the place, that it was feared that if liberated, the young men would fall victims to the brutal and lawless vengeance of the slaveholders, without trial. Yet this is called a free country! It could not be worse in Algiers.

Another of Rum's Victims.—A man named Valentine Wernell, 40 years of age, near Phila., last week was found dead within three hundred yards of his mother's residence, having laid there, it is supposed, some eight or nine days. He was found with his throat cut, and one of the veins of his right arm opened. The arm was bound tightly round with a piece of muslin. Near him was discovered a razor all bloody, and his pen-knife, with which, it is supposed, he opened the vein in his arm, open and bloody. His intemperate habits left no doubt of the cause of the deed.

Appropriations of the Extra Session.—The following sums were appropriated during the late Session of Congress, for the purposes specified:

For the Extra Session of Congress, $390,937 06; for the relief of Mrs. Harrison $25,000; for the pay, subsistence, &c. of a Home Squadron, $789,310; for pauper lunatics in the District of Columbia, $3,500; for the payment of Navy Pensions, $139,666 06; for the funeral expenses of Prest. Harrison, $3,000; for various fortifications, for ordnance, and for preventing Indian hostilities, $2,226,401 86; for placing the Statue of Washington in the rotunda of the Capitol, $35,200; for the P. O. Department, $497,657; for the purchase of naval ordnance, &c. $600,000; for outfits and salaries of diplomatic agents; (this act also gives extra pay to the messengers and servants of Congress, the amount of which is not specified, $72,800; for repairing the Potomac Bridge, $15,806; an appropriation of the proceeds of the public lands (estimated annually,) $3,000,000; a loan, which is appropriated to pay the debts of the Treasury department, many of them contracted under the late administration, $12,000,000; total, $19,799,277 98.

A New Fire Ship.—A Mr. Brown, of Ill. has invented a fire ship which is highly spoken of as worthy of the consideration of the government. The secret of its power he describes to be a chemical composition, which burns so fiercely, that water will not check its fury. It clings to whatever object it falls upon, with great tenacity, and if the object be inflammable will burn it to ashes past all prevention. An experiment has been tried, and proved successful. The ship with which this should be used, is to be some 75 feet in length, narrow, low in the water, and propelled by a single wheel, with the engine and crew wholly below the deck, which is to be guarded by a heavy rail of oak some two feet high, covered with iron, and so constructed of inclined planes that a shot could only strike it at an angle of at most fifteen degrees, and then, by glancing off, prove entirely powerless. Upon deck were to be placed two large hollow iron globes, connected by a tube provided with a stop-cock in the middle; one of these is to be filled with highly condensed air, and the other with the composition mentioned above, which, propelled by the escaping air, may be sent in any direction by tubes properly arranged. This ship could approach with perfect safety within one or two hundred yards of any armed vessel, and at that distance could most certainly and speedily burn it to the water.—Tribune.

The Washingtonians.—Regular Temperance meetings we believe are held on Sunday mornings in the street, at the Catherine market in this city. At the last meeting, among the number was a man of fine talents, who had been a preacher of the gospel, but had fallen through drink. A man and his wife joined together; the man formerly worked at Patterson, and left there about two years ago with $900 cash, and in six weeks afterwards he had not nine cents, having squandered the whole of it in dissipation. A sailor signed who was paid off on Friday last with $28; he went to bed that night sober, but on Saturday he got on a spree, and lost every cent. —Organ.

Villanies.—The Rochester Post says that thefts in that city, and in the neighboring towns have become frequent of late. A scoundrel, a few days since, broke into a barn of a Mr. Wheeler, at Rochester, and robbed a pedlar's wagon of goods to the amount of $1490.

A servant in the family of a Mrs. Goodel, recently eloped with some $60 belonging to her mistress; she was pursued and soon captured.

James Sibley, of Canandaigua, had his jewelry store broken open, and robbed of property to the amount of several hundred dollars.

Jews in Russia.—The Academician Kopper has lately published a statistical account of the Jews in Russia, by which it appears that there are in the empire 1,054,-349 of that nation. Probably in no portion of the globe are the Jews more accessible to evangelical instruction. Attention is every year more attracted towards them, and missionary efforts are put forth in their behalf by the pious of Great Britain. These efforts we hope to see greatly increased, from the interest lately awakened on the subject in the Scotch Presbyterian Church. —Bap. Adv.
